University Textbook Series

Especially Designed for Collateral Reading

HARRY W. JONES
Directing Editor
Professor of Law, Columbia University

AGENCY, PRINCIPLES OF
Merton L. Ferson, Dean Emeritus, University of Cincinnati College of Law.

COMMERCIAL TRANSACTIONS—Text, Forms and Statutes
Robert Braucher, Professor of Law, Harvard University.
Arthur E. Sutherland, Jr., Professor of Law, Harvard University.
Bertram F. Willcox, Professor of Law, Cornell University.

CONFLICT OF LAWS, Second Edition
George W. Stumberg, Professor of Law, University of Texas.

EVIDENCE: COMMON SENSE AND COMMON LAW
John M. Maguire, Professor of Law, Harvard University.

EVIDENCE, STUDENTS' TEXT ON THE LAW OF John Henry Wigmore.

JURISPRUDENCE: MEN AND IDEAS OF THE LAW
Edwin W. Patterson, Cardozo Professor of Jurisprudence, Columbia University.

LEGAL BIBLIOGRAPHY, Second Edition with Assignments and Problems
Arthur S. Beardsley, Late Member of Seattle Bar and Former Law Librarian, University of Washington.
Oscar C. Orman, Member of Missouri Bar and Former Law Librarian, Washington University.

THE STUDY OF LAW, INTRODUCTION TO
Bernard C. Gavit, Late Professor of Law, Indiana University.

TORTS
Clarence Morris, Professor of Law, University of Pennsylvania.

TRUSTS, Second Edition
Ralph A. Newman, Professor of Law, St. John's University.

University Casebook Series

University Casebook Series

ACCOUNTING AND THE LAW, Second Edition
James L. Dohr, Professor of Accounting, Columbia University,
George C. Thompson, Associate Professor, Columbia University Graduate School of Business, and William C. Warren, Dean of the Law School, Columbia University.

ACCOUNTING, MATERIALS ON, Second Edition
Robert Amory, Jr., Professor of Law, Harvard University, and W. Covington Hardee, Professor of Law, Harvard University.

ACCOUNTING, LAW AND
Donald Schapiro, Instructor in Law, Yale University, and Ralph Wienshienk, Visiting Lecturer in Law, Yale University.

ADMINISTRATIVE LAW
Walter Gellhorn, Professor of Law, Columbia University.
Clark M. Byse, Professor of Law, University of Pennsylvania.

ADMIRALTY
The late Stanley Morrison, Professor of Law, Stanford University, and George W. Stumberg, Professor of Law, University of Texas.

BUSINESS ORGANIZATION: AGENCY AND EMPLOYMENT RELATIONS
Alfred F. Conard, Professor of Law, University of Michigan.

BUSINESS ORGANIZATION: CORPORATIONS
A. A. Berle, Jr., Professor of Law, Columbia University, and William C. Warren, Dean of the Law School, Columbia University.

CIVIL PROCEDURE, see Procedure

COMMERCIAL AND INVESTMENT PAPER, Second Edition, with Statutory Materials
Roscoe T. Steffen, Professor of Law, University of Chicago.

COMMERCIAL TRANSACTIONS—Cases, Materials and Problems
Robert Braucher, Professor of Law, Harvard University.
Arthur E. Sutherland, Jr., Professor of Law, Harvard University, and Bertram F. Willcox, Professor of Law, Cornell University.

COMMON LAW ACTIONS—Introduction to Civil Procedure (Forms of Action)
Thomas E Atkinson, Professor of Law, New York University, and
James H. Chadbourn, Professor of Law, University of California at Los Angeles.

COMPARATIVE LAW
Rudolf B. Schlesinger, Professor of Law, Cornell University.

CONFLICT OF LAWS, Third Edition
Elliott E Cheatham, Professor of Law, Columbia University; Herbert F. Goodrich, formerly Dean of the Law School, University of Pennsylvania, Judge, U. S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Third Circuit; Erwin N. Griswold, Dean of the Law School, Harvard University; and Willis L. M. Reese, Professor of Law, Columbia University

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, Fifth Edition with 1955 Supplement
Noel T. Dowling, Harlan Fiske Stone Professor of Constitutional Law, Columbia University.

CONTRACT IN CONTEXT
Addison Mueller, Professor of Law, Yale University.

CONTRACTS AND CONTRACT REMEDIES, Third Edition
Harold Shepherd, Professor of Law, Stanford University.

CONTRACTS, Third Edition
Edwin W. Patterson, Cardozo Professor of Jurisprudence, Columbia University, and George W. Goble, Professor of Law, University of Illinois.

CONVEYANCES, Second Edition
Marion R. Kirkwood, Professor of Law Emeritus, Stanford University.

CORPORATE REORGANIZATION, with Statutory Supplement
The late E. Merrick Dodd, Professor of Law, Harvard University, and DeForest Billyou, Member of the New York Bar.

CORPORATIONS, Second Edition
The late E. Merrick Dodd, Professor of Law, Harvard University, and Ralph J. Baker, Professor of Law, Harvard University.

CREDITORS' RIGHTS, Fourth Edition, with 1953 Bankruptcy Act Pamphlet, Volume 1, Bankruptcy
John Hanna, Professor of Law, Columbia University and
James Angell MacLachlan, Professor of Law, Harvard University.

CREDITORS' RIGHTS, Fourth Edition, with 1953 Bankruptcy Act Pamphlet, Volume 2, Receivership and Corporate Reorganization
John Hanna, Professor of Law, Columbia University, and
James Angell MacLachlan, Professor of Law, Harvard University.

CREDITORS' RIGHTS, Consolidated Fourth Edition with 1953 Bankruptcy Act Pamphlet
John Hanna, Professor of Law, Columbia University, and
James Angell MacLachlan, Professor of Law, Harvard University.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE
Rollin M. Perkins, Connell Professor of Law, University of California at Los Angeles.

CRIMINAL LAW AND ITS ADMINISTRATION
The late Jerome Michael, Professor of Law, Columbia University and Herbert Wechsler, Professor of Law, Columbia University.

CRIMINAL LAW AND ITS ENFORCEMENT, Third Edition
John B. Waite, Professor of Law, University of Michigan.

DAMAGES, Second Edition
Charles T. McCormick, Professor of Law, University of Texas and William F. Fritz, Professor of Law, University of Texas.

DECEDENTS' ESTATES AND TRUSTS
John Ritchie, Dean and Professor of Law, University of Wisconsin, Neill H. Alford, Jr, Associate Professor of Law, University of Virginia, and Richard W. Effland, Professor of Law, University of Wisconsin.

DOMESTIC RELATIONS, Third Edition
Albert C. Jacobs, President, Trinity College, and Julius Goebel, Jr., Professor of Law, Columbia University.

EQUITY, Third Edition
Zechariah Chafee, Jr., Langdell Professor of Law, Harvard University, the late Sidney Post Simpson, Professor of Law, New York University School of Law and the late John Philip Maloney, Vice Dean of Law School, St. John's University.

ETHICS, see Legal Profession

EVIDENCE, Third Edition, with 1951 Parol Evidence Rule Supplement
Edmund M. Morgan, Professor of Law, Vanderbilt University, and John M. Maguire, Professor of Law, Harvard University.

FEDERAL COURTS, Second Edition, with 1952 Supplement
Charles T. McCormick, Professor of Law, University of Texas, and James H. Chadbourn, Professor of Law, University of California at Los Angeles.

FEDERAL COURTS AND THE FEDERAL SYSTEM, with Judicial Code Pamphlet
Henry M. Hart, Jr., Professor of Law, Harvard University, and Herbert Wechsler, Professor of Law, Columbia University.

FEDERAL TAXATION, see Taxation

FREE ENTERPRISE AND ECONOMIC ORGANIZATION
Louis B. Schwartz, Professor of Law, University of Pennsylvania.

FUTURE INTERESTS, Second Edition with 1952 Taxation Supplement
W. Barton Leach, Professor of Law, Harvard University.

INSURANCE, Third Edition
Edwin W. Patterson, Cardozo Professor of Jurisprudence, Columbia University.

INTERNATIONAL LAW
Edwin D. Dickinson, Professor of Law, University of Pennsylvania.

INTRODUCTION TO LAW, see Legal Method

JUDICIAL CODE: Rules of Procedure in the Federal Courts with Excerpts from the Criminal Code
Henry M. Hart, Jr., Professor of Law, Harvard University and Herbert Wechsler, Professor of Law, Columbia University.

JURISPRUDENCE (Temporary Edition, Bound)
Lon L. Fuller, Professor of Law, Harvard University.

LABOR LAW, Third Edition, with Statutory Supplement
Archibald Cox, Professor of Law, Harvard University.

LABOR LAW, Second Edition, with 1947 Supplement
James M. Landis, formerly Dean of the Law School, Harvard University, and Marcus Manoff, Member of the Massachusetts Bar.

LABOR RELATIONS
The late Harry Shulman, Dean of the Law School, Yale University, and Neil Chamberlain, Professor of Economics and Research Director of the Labor Management Center, Yale University.

LEGAL BIBLIOGRAPHY, Second Edition, with Assignments and Problems
By the late Arthur S. Beardsley, formerly Professor of Law and Law Librarian, University of Washington, and Oscar C. Orman, formerly Professor of Law and Director of Libraries, Washington University.

LEGAL DRAFTING
Robert N Cook, Professor of Law, Western Reserve University.

LEGAL METHOD, Second Edition
Noel T. Dowling, Harlan Fiske Stone Professor of Constitutional Law, Columbia University; Edwin W. Patterson, Cardozo Professor of Jurisprudence, Columbia University; and Richard R. B. Powell, Dwight Professor of Law, Columbia University—Second Edition by Harry W. Jones, Professor of Law, Columbia University.

LEGAL PROFESSION, Second Edition
Elliott E Cheatham, Professor of Law, Columbia University.

LEGISLATION
Horace E Read, Dean of the Law School, Dalhousie University, and John W MacDonald, Professor of Law, Cornell Law School.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT LAW
Jefferson B Fordham, Dean of the Law School, University of Pennsylvania.

MODERN REAL ESTATE TRANSACTIONS
Allison Dunham, Professor of Law, University of Chicago.

MODERN SOCIAL LEGISLATION
Stefan A. Riesenfeld, Professor of Law, University of California and Richard C. Maxwell, Professor of Law, University of California at Los Angeles.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS, Third Edition
The late Charles W. Tooke, Professor of Law, New York University, and John A. McIntire, Professor of Law, George Washington University.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS, see Local Government Law

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS, see Commercial and Investment Paper

PROCEDURE–CIVIL PROCEDURE
Thomas E. Atkinson, Professor of Law, New York University, and
James H. Chadbourn, Professor of Law, University of California at Los Angeles.

PROCEDURE–CIVIL PROCEDURE
Richard H. Field, Professor of Law, Harvard University, and Benjamin Kaplan, Professor of Law, Harvard University.

PROCEDURE–CIVIL PROCEDURE
Paul R. Hays, Professor of Law, Columbia University.

PROCEDURE–CIVIL PROCEDURE, Third Edition
Roswell Magill, Partner, Cravath, Swaine & Moore, New York City, and James H. Chadbourn, Professor of Law, University of California at Los Angeles.

PROCEDURE–THE ELEMENTS OF LEGAL CONTROVERSY: An Introduction to the Study of Adjective Law
The late Jerome Michael, Professor of Law, Columbia University.

PROCEDURE–INTRODUCTION TO CIVIL PROCEDURE (Forms of Action)
Thomas E. Atkinson, Professor of Law, New York University, and James H. Chadbourn, Professor of Law, University of California at Los Angeles.

PROPERTY
Howard R. Williams, Professor of Law, Columbia University.

PROPERTY—PERSONAL, Third Edition
Everett Fraser, Dean Emeritus of the Law School, University of Minnesota, and Professor of Law, Hastings College of Law—Third Edition by Charles W. Taintor, Professor of Law, University of Pittsburgh.

PROPERTY—REAL—INTRODUCTION, Third Edition
Everett Fraser, Dean Emeritus of the Law School, University of Minnesota, and Professor of Law, Hastings College of Law.

PROPERTY—REAL PROPERTY AND CONVEYANCING
Edward S Bade, Professor of Law, University of Minnesota.

PUBLIC UTILITY LAW, see Free Enterprise

RECEIVERSHIP AND CORPORATE REORGANIZATION, see Creditors' Rights

RESTITUTION
Edwin W. Patterson, Cardozo Professor of Jurisprudence, Columbia University.

SALES, Second Edition
George G. Bogert, Professor of Law, Hastings College of Law, and William E Britton, Professor of Law, Hastings College of Law.

SALES AND SALES FINANCING, with Statutory Supplement
John O Honnold, Professor of Law, University of Pennsylvania.

SECURITY, Re-Edited Second Edition
John Hanna, Professor of Law, Columbia University, and Reporter on Security, American Law Institute.

TAXATION, Fourth Edition
Roswell Magill, Partner, Cravath, Swaine & Moore, New York City, and John M. Maguire, Professor of Law, Harvard University.

TAXATION, FEDERAL, Fourth Edition
Erwin N Griswold, Dean of the Law School, Harvard University.

TAXATION, FEDERAL Roswell Magill, Partner, Cravath, Swaine & Moore, New York City.

TAXATION, FEDERAL ESTATE AND GIFT, with 1954 Supplement
William C. Warren, Dean of the Law School, Columbia University and Stanley S Surrey, Professor of Law, Harvard University.

TAXATION, FEDERAL INCOME, 1955 Edition
Stanley S. Surrey, Professor of Law, Harvard University and William C. Warren, Dean of the Law School, Columbia University.

TORTS, Second Edition
The late Harry Shulman, Dean of the Law School, Yale University and Fleming James, Jr., La Fayette S. Foster Professor of Law, Yale University.

TORTS
Young B. Smith, Kent Professor of Law, Columbia University.
William L. Prosser, Dean of the Law School, University of California.

TRADE REGULATION, Second Edition
Milton Handler, Professor of Law, Columbia University.

TRADE REGULATION, see Free Enterprise

TRUSTS, Second Edition
George G. Bogert, Professor of Law, Hastings College of Law and James Parker Hall Professor of Law, Emeritus, University of Chicago.

WILLS AND ADMINISTRATION, Fourth Edition
Philip Mechem, Professor of Law, University of Pennsylvania, and Thomas E. Atkinson, Professor of Law, New York University.

WORLD LAW, with 1953 Supplement
Louis B. Sohn, Professor of Law, Harvard University.

CASES AND MATERIALS

ON THE LAW OF

BUSINESS ORGANIZATION

(CORPORATIONS)

SELECTED AND EDITED

By

ADOLF A. BERLE
Professor of Law, Columbia University

and

WILLIAM C. WARREN
Dean and Professor of Law, Columbia University

Brooklyn

THE FOUNDATION PRESS, INC.

1948

FOREWORD

TWENTY years ago the Columbia Law School concluded that the study of corporation law had been too severely limited by tradition. It undertook to augment the classic corporations course by adding a new course called "Corporation Finance." In course of time this arrangement was widely accepted in many law schools. As it gained recognition, corporation finance established itself as a branch of coordinate standing with the conventional course in corporations.

Yet, from the beginning, it was clear that there was no real line between the principles of corporation law and the principles applicable to those financial situations which are conventionally a part of the life-experience of most corporations. In time the two courses could and should be integrated.

This collection of materials is an endeavor to accomplish that integration, and to present as a single course of study the basic data of both the conventional corporate field and of corporation finance. Taken together they cover the problems of modern corporation theory and practice with reasonable completeness.

A good course (like a good symphony) has both theme and countertheme.

The law of corporations (including corporation finance) arises out of the conception of private property investment within the outlines of finance capitalism. The historic theme of corporation law is that a corporation is a vehicle for profit-making investment: the handling by a group of corporate directors, officers or controlling interests of money or property turned over to them, for the purpose of carrying on an enterprise primarily designed to make profits. In this sense corporations become a branch of property, and the applicable law ranks coordinately with the law of Trusts. But modern financial and technological development has made the corporation into something extremely important from other aspects as well: a social institution, wielding enormous power, responsible in great part for providing employment, developing technique and resources, supplying necessary goods and services, influencing community development, gravely affecting the lives of great numbers of people, and appreciably influencing sociological and political evolution. In this latter sense the corporation is now a major subject of international controversy. When a Russian propagandist lets drive at "monopoly capitalism," he means precisely the system of production, employment and distribution carried on by large corporations.

It would therefore be unrealistic not to accept, as countertheme, the social and sociological implications of the modern corporate system, though each teacher will develop these aspects according to his own ideas and concepts. For instance, classic corporation law spent a tremendous amount of time on the doctrine of ultra vires, of which today only a vestigial remainder is of practical importance. Historically examined, the principal significance of law of limited powers is that it was an attempt at social control of corporations which failed; and this fact is pointed out.

The controversial questions of management policy today largely derive from the fact that modern corporations are now exerting and encountering social pressures on many fronts. The corporate system not only achieved paramount importance as a vehicle for property, production and investment; it also worked a revolution in property tenure and social organization whose implications are only beginning to be explored. No apology is needed for including in these materials notes and commentary relevant to the sociological as well as to the financial and property aspects of the corporate problem. More likely than not the great legal battles in corporation law in the next generation will be fought in this field, rather than in the financial field as in the past.

The brief discussion of corporate accounting is highly elementary. This is because experience unhappily shows that law students are all too frequently almost illiterate in accounting matters. Considerable experimental work has been done in endeavoring to adapt an appropriate accounting course to law school needs; but the problem seems as yet unsolved. It has to be assumed that only the exceptional student will know the difference between a balance sheet and an income statement, or whether surplus is an asset or a liability, until it is explained to him in a course in corporation law. But lest we unduly blame the student, it may be noted that more than one appellate court has written decisions indicating that some judges suffer almost equal confusion!

Though the editors follow the case method of teaching, they have found it useful to recommend the use by students of textbooks on corporation law, especially in connection with bodies of law which are well settled. The recent edition of Professor Ballantine's textbook on corporation law has proved excellent for that purpose. For students already trained in case reading, time can frequently be saved for more valuable discussion by permitting the student to familiarize himself through textbooks with the settled elementary legal rules. This practise, however, turns on the policy and teaching method pursued by each individual instructor, and it is offered here merely as a record of personal experience.

The editors acknowledge with gratitude the assistance of Dean Young B. Smith who placed many facilities of the Columbia Law School at our service; of Mr. Thorold J. Deyrup and Mrs. Helene Walters, both of the New York Bar, for services in editing, proof-reading and incidental research; and of Messrs. Eugene L. Bondy, Jr., Henry Bartow Farr, and Edgar Carroll Morrison for research assistance in preparing notes.

ADOLF A. BERLE, JR.
WILLIAM C. WARREN.

January 15, 1948

TABLE OF CONTENTS

PART I

CREATION OF THE CORPORATION

PART II

CAPITAL STOCK AND ITS PROPERTY OR CONTRACT RIGHTS

PART III

PUBLIC ISSUE OF STOCK

PART IV

FUNDED DEBT

PART VI

STOCKHOLDERS' REMEDIES FOR MISMANAGEMENT

PART VII

SALE, MERGER, CONSOLIDATION AND DISSOLUTION

TABLE OF CASES

References are to pages

CASES AND MATERIALS

ON THE LAW OF

BUSINESS ORGANIZATION (CORPORATIONS)

PART I

CREATION OF THE CORPORATION

Whatever the historical origin of the business corporation, there is little question about the theory of its creation and existence in Anglo-American law.

Under the accepted theory, the corporation was created by act of the sovereign (king, Parliament, or, in the United States, legislature). The right to exist as a corporation, and its power to carry on an enterprise, was obtained by grant or "franchise". Each such grant stood on its own bottom. General incorporation laws were unknown until the 19th Century. The grant, not infrequently, was accompanied by privileges other than those of corporate existence: the monopoly to trade in certain areas, or to operate a ferry, or a railroad, between definite points. The grant thus created or empowered the associates to create a legal personality; empowered them also to enter into an enterprise; and, as a general rule, if not in America, indicated the general outline of that enterprise. The policy of the sovereign or state was implicit, or sometimes explicit, in the entire proceeding.

Though the theory has not been seriously overhauled, the hundred years of corporate development from the middle of the 19th to the 20th Century has revolutionized the nature and content of corporate creation. Today special franchises and grants of corporate power are not only not usual, but are forbidden in many states except to highly specialised forms of corporations and these commonly do not have business purposes. In place of the old grant, general corporation laws exist, permitting any number of associates (in New York and Delaware, three as a minimum) to write their own charter, state their own purposes and powers which may be adequate to carry on an indefinite number of wholly diverse operations, to fix for themselves the capital stock they intend to have, and the characteristics which the shares of stock shall have; and so forth. These agreements, or charters, or certificates of incorporation—the lineal descendants of the old royal or legislative charter—are filed with a state official, usually the Secretary of State. Upon approval by him (which, in practice, means by an official in his office who scrutinizes the documents to see that the statutory form has been complied with), the corporation as a legal personality is authorized to come into existence.

The change in practice obviously has the effect of eliminating any implication that the existence or wording of a charter reflects the state policy—other than the very general state policy permitting business to be done in corporate form. The economic fact is that a corporate charter is an agreement under which associates can invest their money and act as a group in an enterprise and along lines which they themselves or their predecessors devised and accepted. The state may be said to permit this, but can hardly be considered an actor in the proceedings.

There follow, for illustrative purposes, definitions taken from the early commentators and a sample early legislative charter. Occasionally a modern practitioner will run into surviving corporations from this era—several railroad corporations still are in this class. The illustrations contrast with the modern general incorporation acts and charters of today, of which illustration is also given.

A. MAKING THE CONTRACT

1. HISTORICAL-CORPORATE DEFINITIONS

1612—Sutton's Hospital Case, 16 Co.Rep. 23a, 29b (1613).

Coke set out the following elements as necessary for the existence of a corporation:

"1st. Lawful authority of incorporation by 1.) the common law as the king himself, or 2.) authority of Parliament, or 3.) by king's charter; and by prescription."

"2nd. Persons to be incorporated, viz; persons natural, or bodies incorporate and political."

"3rd. Name by which they are incorporated."

"4th. Of a place, for without a place no incorporation can be made."

"5th. By words sufficient in law, but not restrained to any certain, legal, and prescript form of words."

1616—Coke on Littleton 250 a, I Thomas, A Systematic Arrangement of Lord Coke's First Institute of the Laws of England (Robert H. Small, Phila., 1st Am. Ed. from 19th London Ed., 1827) 213:

"A body politic is a body to take in succession, framed (as to that capacity) by policy, and therefore it is called by Littleton a body politic; and it is called a corporation or body incorporate, because the persons are made into a body, and of a capacity to take and grant, etc. And the body politic, or incorporate may commence, and be established thru manner of ways, viz. by prescription, by letters patent, or by Act of Parliament."

1702—Anonymous, The Law of Corporations (Cleve, London, 1702) 1:

"A Corporation or Incorporation is a Body framed by Policy or Fiction of Law, and it's therefore called a Body Politick; and it's called an Incorporation or Body Incorporate, because the Persons are made into a body which endureth in perpetual Succession; and are of Capacity to grant, sue, or be sued, and the like. * * * They cannot speak nor appear in Person but by Attorney.

"The general Intent and End of all Civil Incorporations is for better Government; either general or special. * * *

"Special Government is so called because it is remitted to the Managers of particular things, as Trade, Charity and the like; for Government whereof several Companies and Corporations for Trade were erected. * * *

"But a Corporation, or Body Politick, is not only as a Franchise. A Body Politick, is framed in similitude as a natural Body; with a capacity to take, hold, and enjoy, and act as a natural Body: it is a capacity framed to be and act as one Person. But Franchises, and Liberties of all other Natures are Estates and Inheritances grantable and conveyable from one to another, but a Corporation cannot be so. Other Franchises and Liberties convey either some profit from the King as Felon's Goods, Waifs, Strays, etc. or affect his Subjects, as Courts Gaols, Return of Writs, Fairs, Markets. But this of being a Body Politick, is only a Capacity to be a Person capable of having and holding what may be granted to it."

1766—1 Blackstone Commentaries On the Laws of England (George W. Childs, Phila. Sherwood's Ed., 1862) 467:

"* * * it has been found necessary when it is for the advantage of the public to have any particular rights kept on foot and continued, to constitute artificial persons, who may maintain a perpetual succession, and enjoy a kind of legal immortality.

"These artificial persons are called Bodies politic, bodies corporate (corpora corporatu) or corporations: of which there is a great variety subsisting, for the advancement of religion, of learning, and of commerce; in order to preserve entire and forever those rights and immunities, which if they were granted only to those individuals of which the body corporate is composed, would upon their death be entirely lost and extinct."

Page 471: "Corporations by the civil law, seem to have been created by the mere act, and voluntary association of their members; provided such convention was not contrary to law. * * *

"But, with us in England, the king's consent is absolutely necessary to the erection of any corporation, either impliedly or expressly given."

1780—3 Comyns, A Digest of the Laws of England (W. Strahan, London, 1780) 397:

"A corporation is a Franchise created by the King.

"A corporation is a Body constituted by Policy, with a Capacity to take, or to do.

"For by Incorporation it acquires Ius Personae and becomes Persona politica and is capable of all Civil Rights habendi and agendi".

1793—1 Kyd, Treatise On the Law of Corporations (J. Butterworth, London, 1793) 13:

"A corporation, or body politic, or body incorporate is a collection of many individuals united in one body, under a special denomination, having perpetual succession under an artificial form, and vested by the policy of the law, with a capacity of acting, in several respects, as an individual, particularly of taking and granting property, contracting obligations, and of suing and being sued; of enjoying privileges and immunities in common, and of exercising a variety of political rights, more or less extensive, according to the design of its institution, or the powers conferred upon it, either at the time of its creation, or at any subsequent period of its existence".

1819—Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518 (1819):

"A corporation is an artificial being, invisible, intangible, and existing only in contemplation of law. Being the mere creature of law, it possesses only those properties which the character of its creation confers upon it, either expressly, or as incidental to its very existence. These are such as are supposed best calculated to effect the object for which it was created. Among the most important are immortality, and if the expression may be allowed, individuality; properties by which a perpetual succession of many persons are considered as the same, and may act as the single individual."

1826—2 Kent Commentaries On American Law (O. Halstead, N. Y., 1st Ed., 1826) 215:

"A corporation is a franchise possessed by one or more individuals, who subsist as a body politic, under a special denomination, and are vested, by the policy of the law, with the capacity of perpetual succession, and of acting, in several respects, however numerous the association may be as a single individual".

P. 223: "In England, corporations are created and exist by prescription, by royal charter, and by Act of Parliament. With us they are created by authority of the legislature and not otherwise."

1882—Angell and Ames, Treatise On the Law of Private Corporations (Little, Brown & Co., Boston, 11th Ed., 1882) 23:

"According to the several definitions we have already offered of a corporation, it means an intellectual body, composed of individuals, and created by law; a body which is united under a common name, and the members of which are so capable of succeeding each other,

that the body (like a river) continues always the same notwithstanding the change of the parts that compose it. * * *

"* * * In the popular meaning of the term, nearly every corporation is public inasmuch as they are created for the public benefit."

TYPICAL SPECIAL INCORPORATION ACT

MASSACHUSETTS LAWS, 1818, CHAPTER CLXXIX

Chapter CLXXIX—February 24, 1818

An act to incorporate the Proprietors of the Maine Flour Mills

Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, in General Court assembled, and by the authority of the same, That Thomas Agry, John Agry, Chanceller Robbins, and William Oliver Vaughn, all of Hallowell be, and hereby are constituted a corporation and body politic, under the name of the Proprietors of the Maine Flour Mills, for the purpose of manufacturing corn and grain, of every description, into meal and flour; and with power and authority to do, in their corporate name and capacity, all things which are necessarily incident and proper to the purchasing and manufacturing of corn and grain into meal or flour, and vending thereof.

Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, That the said corporation be, and the same hereby is authorized and empowered to purchase and hold, in their corporate name, lands and tenements, within the county of Kennebec, not exceeding the value of thirty thousand dollars in the whole, and personal estate, not exceeding the value of twenty-thousand in the whole, which may be suitable and necessary to carry into effect the purposes intended by this act.

Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, That the corporate property shall be divided into five hundred shares, at one hundred dollars a share; and that the shares in said corporation shall be considered to be personal estate, and transferable in the same way and manner in which turnpike shares and bridge shares are transferred on the books of the corporation.

Sec. 4. Be it further enacted, That the said corporation shall never be indebted, at any one time, in an amount exceeding twenty-five thousand dollars; and that whenever any execution shall issue against such corporation, on any judgment rendered in any civil action, and the said corporation shall not, within fourteen days after demand thereof made upon the President or Treasurer of the corporation, by the officer to whom the writ or execution has been committed to be served, shew to such officer sufficient estate to satisfy such execution, the officer may then levy the same upon the estate of any person or persons who were members of said corporation, at the time when the debt was contracted, for which such execution was issued.

Sec. 5. Be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of said corporation to cause each and every barrel and half-barrel, or other vessel containing flour, or meal, manufactured and prepared for sale, by this corporation, to be branded with the name of the said corporation, durably and legibly; and that the said corporation shall be liable to a penalty of two dollars for each and every barrel of flour which shall be offered for sale, from the manufactory of the said corporation, without having been so branded; and the said penalty may be recovered in any Court having jurisdiction in such cases, with costs, by the Selectmen of the town, in which such manufactory may be situated, for the use of the poor of the town.

Sec. 6. Be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall counterfeit the brand of the said corporation, or use the brand of the said corporation, to mark any barrel or half-barrel, or other vessel containing flour or meal, not manufactured by the said corporation, or its agents or factors, or shall fraudulently use any barrel or half-barrel, or other vessel which may have been lawfully branded by said corporation, and emptied of its contents, such person or persons so offending, shall forfeit and pay the sum of twenty dollars for each and every such offense, to be recovered by action of debt, in any Court proper to try the same; one half of which sum shall be to the use of the person who shall sue for the same, and the other half to the use of the said corporation.

[Approved by the Governor, February 24, 1818.]

LAWS OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK PASSED AT THE THIRTY-SIXTH, THIRTY-SEVENTH AND THIRTY-EIGHTH SESSIONS OF THE LEGISLATURE, VOLUME III—THIRTY-SIXTH SESSION.

Chapter CXLI—Passed April 6, 1813

An Act to incorporate the Lenox Water Company

Whereas Moses H. Cook, together with sundry other citizens, have associated for the purpose of supplying that part of the town of Lenox, in the county of Madison, situated on the Seneca Turnpike road, called Federal Hill, with pure and wholesome water, for the use of such of the inhabitants thereof, and others, as may be inclined to take same: Therefore,

I. Be it enacted by the people of the state of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, That Moses H. Cook, and such others as may become interested in the association or company, formed for supplying that part of the town of Lenox, in the county of Madison, situated on the Seneca Turnpike road, called Federal Hill, with water by means of conduits or aqueducts, shall be and are hereby created and made a corporation and a body politic in fact and in name by the name of the "Lenox Water Company" and by that name shall be capable in law to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, in any court of record; but shall not be capable of holding any real estate, excepting such as may be necessary for such conduits or aqueducts, in any other place than in that part of the aforesaid town called Federal Hill aforesaid, or any real or personal estate exceeding the annual value in the whole, of five hundred dollars, exclusive of the profits or income of such conduits or aqueducts.

II. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for any three of the said persons so associated, or to be associated, by a notice to be given in writing, at two of the most public places in Federal Hill, five days at least previous to any meeting, to convene the said company or association at the most convenient and public place therein, and such of the members of the said association, being at least a majority of the whole number, as shall so convene, shall be and are hereby authorized by a vote of the majority present, to choose and appoint a treasurer, clerk, and collector of such association, and such other agents as may be necessary to carry into effect the objects of the association; to make and ordain all such by-laws, rules, and regulations, relative to the said conduits or aqueducts as they may be proper and necessary for the superintendence, regulation, and management of the same, and of such as may be added thereto; and for the alteration, preservation, and reparation thereof; or for the equal assessment and collection amongst the proprietors of the same aqueducts, in proportion to their respective rights or shares, of all costs and expenses arising in the execution of all such by-laws, rules, and regulations aforesaid: And further, to institute such suits in the name of such company or association as may be necessary to recover damages that may be done to the said aqueducts, or for any penalty imposed as aforesaid. Provided, That no penalty be imposed by virtue of any such by-laws or regulations as aforesaid, shall be contrary to the laws of this state, or exceed twenty dollars for any one offense.

III. And be it further enacted, That the said treasurer shall receive and pay out all monies collected by virtue of this act, agreeably to the orders and directions of the said association; and the said clerk shall enter in writing, all the proceedings of the same association or company, when convened as aforesaid, under this act; and the said collector shall levy and collect all such taxes and sums of money so as aforesaid to be voted in pursuance of this act, agreeably to such tax-list or assessment-roll as shall be made out and delivered him by the said clerk, the same being by him first certified and subscribed, and shall pay the same monies over to the treasurer of the said association; and the said collector shall have the like powers, and may proceed in like manner, in the said collection, as is by law prescribed to the collection of any town, in the collection of the contingent charges of the county.

IV. And be it further enacted, That all transfers of shares in the said association or company, shall be made and entered in a book to be by them provided for that purpose, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the said association.

NOTE

CORPORATIONS AS "PERSONS"

One result of the doctrine that a corporation was a "fictitious person" probably was entirely unforeseen. The Fourteenth Amendment protecting "persons" against being deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, was almost absentmindedly extended to corporations. This became an axiom (after the definition of Lewis Carroll in "Sylvie and Bruno": an axiom is a statement which everyone is too polite to deny). It remained for Justice Black in a famous dissenting opinion to challenge the statement.

This dissent is worth considering in all its implications. It has not changed and probably will not for some time change, the established doctrine. Yet it lies there, a thought which can emerge when economic or political pressures pile up.

Even if accepted, there are still individuals—natural persons—involved in the corporation. If the fictitious person is not within the protection of the Fourteenth Amendment, the natural persons nevertheless do have that protection; and to adopt Justice Black's doctrine may merely refer the problem of privation of property to an examination of the circumstances of the natural persons who, however low in visibility, do inhabit this multiple organism known as "the corporation".

CONNECTICUT GENERAL LIFE INSURANCE CO. v. JOHNSON.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1938. 303 U.S. 77, 58 S.Ct. 436.

Mr. JUSTICE STONE delivered the opinion of the Court.

Appellant is a Connecticut corporation, admitted to do an insurance business in California. In addition to its business conducted within that state it has entered into contracts with other insurance corporations likewise licensed to do business in California, reinsuring them against loss on policies of life insurance effected by them in California and issued to residents there. These reinsurance contracts were entered into in Connecticut where the premiums were paid and where the losses, if any, were payable. The question for decision is whether a tax laid by California on the receipt by appellant in Connecticut of the reinsurance premiums during the years 1930 and 1931, infringes the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. * * *

All that appellant did in effecting the reinsurance was done without the state and for its transaction no privilege or license by California was needful. The tax cannot be sustained either as laid on property, business done, or transactions carried on within the state, or as a tax on a privilege granted by the state.

Reversed.

Mr. JUSTICE BLACK (dissenting).

I do not believe that this California corporate franchise tax has been proved beyond all reasonable doubt to be in violation of the Federal Constitution and I believe that the judgment of the Supreme Court of California should be affirmed. Traditionally, states have been empowered to grant or deny foreign corporations the right to do business within their borders, and "may exclude them arbitrarily or impose such conditions as [they] will upon their engaging in business within [their] jurisdiction." * * *

But it is contended that the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits California from determining what terms and conditions should be imposed upon this Connecticut corporation to promote the welfare of the people of California.

I do not believe the word "person" in the Fourteenth Amendment includes corporations. "The doctrine of stare decisis, however appropriate and even necessary at times, has only a limited application in the field of constitutional law." This Court has many times changed its interpretations of the Constitution when the conclusion was reached that an improper construction had been adopted. Only recently the case of West Coast Hotel Company v. Parrish, 300 U.S. 379, 57 S.Ct. 578, 81 L.Ed. 703, 108 A.L.R. 1330, expressly overruled a previous interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment which had long blocked state minimum wage legislation. When a statute is declared by this Court to be unconstitutional, the decision until reversed stands as a barrier against the adoption of similar legislation. A constitutional interpretation that is wrong should not stand. I believe this Court should now overrule previous decisions which interpreted the Fourteenth Amendment to include corporations.

Neither the history nor the language of the Fourteenth Amendment justifies the belief that corporations are included within its protection. The historical purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment was clearly set forth when first considered by this Court in the Slaughter House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 21 L.Ed. 394, decided April, 1873 —less than five years after the proclamation of its adoption. Mr. Justice Miller, speaking for the Court, said:

"Among the first acts of legislation adopted by several of the States in the legislative bodies which claimed to be in their normal relations with the Federal government, were laws which imposed upon the colored race onerous disabilities and burdens, and curtailed their rights in the pursuit of life, liberty, and property to such an extent that their freedom was of little value, while they had lost the protection which they had received from their former owners from motives both of interest and humanity. * * *

"These circumstances, whatever of falsehood or misconception may have been mingled with their presentation, forced * * * the conviction that something more was necessary in the way of constitutional protection to the unfortunate race who had suffered so much. [Congressional leaders] accordingly passed through Congress the proposition for the *fourteenth amendment, and * * * declined to treat as restored to their full participation in the government of the Union the States which had been in insurrection,* until they ratified that article by a formal vote of their legislative bodies." 16 Wall. 36, at page 70, 21 L.Ed. 394.

Certainly, when the Fourteenth Amendment was submitted for approval, the people were not told that the states of the South were to be denied their normal relationship with the Federal Government unless they ratified an amendment granting new and revolutionary rights to corporations. This Court, when the Slaughter House Cases were decided in 1873, had apparently discovered no such purpose. The records of the time can be searched in vain for evidence that this amendment was adopted for the benefit of corporations. It is true that in 1882, twelve years after its adoption, and ten years after the Slaughter House Cases, supra, an argument was made in this Court that a journal of the joint Congressional Committee which framed the amendment, secret and undisclosed up to that date, indicated the committee's desire to protect corporations by the use of the word "person." [11] Four years later, in 1886, this Court in the case of Santa Clara County v. Southern Pacific Railroad, 118 U.S. 394, 6 S.Ct. 1132, 30 L.Ed. 118, decided for the first time that the word "person" in the amendment did in some instances include corporations. A secret purpose on the part of the members of the committee, even if such be the fact, however, would not be sufficient to justify any such construction. The history of the amendment proves that the people were told that its purpose was to protect weak and helpless human beings and were not told that it was intended to remove corporations in any fashion from the control of state governments. The Fourteenth Amendment followed the freedom of a race from slavery. Justice Swayne said in the Slaughter Houses Cases, supra: that: "By 'any person' was meant all persons within the jurisdiction of the State. No distinction is intimated on account of race or color." Corporations have neither race nor color. He knew the amendment was intended to protect the life, liberty, and property of human beings.

The language of the amendment itself does not support the theory that it was passed for the benefit of corporations.

The first clause of section 1 of the amendment reads: "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside." Certainly a corporation cannot be naturalized and "persons" here is not broad enough to include "corporations."

The first clause of the second sentence of section 1 reads: "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." While efforts have been made to persuade this Court to allow corporations to claim the protection of this clause, these efforts have not been successful.[12]

The next clause of the second sentence reads: "Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." It has not been decided that this clause prohibits a state from depriving a corporation of "life." This Court has expressly held that "the liberty guaranteed by the 14th Amendment against deprivation without due process of law is the liberty of natural, not artificial persons." [13] Thus, the words "life" and "liberty" do not apply to corporations, and of course they could not have been so intended to apply. However, the decisions of this Court which the majority follow hold that corporations are included in this clause in so far as the word "property" is concerned. In other words, this clause is construed to mean as follows:

---

11 San Mateo County v. Southern Pacific Railroad, 116 U.S. 138, 6 S.Ct. 317, 29 L.Ed. 589. See, Benj. B. Kendrick, "Journal of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction" (1914, New York); Howard J. Graham, "The 'Conspiracy Theory' of the Fourteenth Amendment," 47 Yale Law Journal 371; Donald Barr Chidsey, "The Gentleman from New York—A Life of Roscoe Conklin," Yale University Press (1935).

12 Selover, Bates & Co. v. Walsh, 226 U.S. 112, 126, 33 S.Ct. 69, 57 L.Ed. 146.

13 Western Turf Association v. Greenburg, 204 U.S. 359, 363, 27 S.Ct. 384, 51 L.Ed. 520.

"Nor shall any State deprive any human being of life, liberty or property without due process of law; nor shall any State deprive any corporation of property without due process of law."

The last clause of this second sentence of section 1 reads: "Nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." As used here, "person" has been construed to include corporations.[14]

Both Congress and the people were familiar with the meaning of the word "corporation" at the time the Fourteenth Amendment was submitted and adopted. The judicial inclusion of the word "corporation" in the Fourteenth Amendment has had a revolutionary effect on our form of government. The states did not adopt the amendment with knowledge of its sweeping meaning under its present construction. No section of the amendment gave notice to the people that, if adopted, it would subject every state law and municipal ordinance, affecting corporations, (and all administrative actions under them) to censorship of the United States courts. No word in all this amendment gave any hint that its adoption would deprive the states of their long-recognized power to regulate corporations.

The second section of the amendment informed the people that representatives would be apportioned among the several states "according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed." No citizen could gather the impression here that while the word "persons" in the second section applied to human beings, the word "persons" in the first section in some instances applied to corporations. Section 3 of the amendment said that "no person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress," (who "engaged in insurrection"). There was no intimation here that the word "person" in the first section in some instances included corporations.

This amendment sought to prevent discrimination by the states against classes or races. We are aware of this from words spoken in this Court within five years after its adoption, when the people and the courts were personally familiar with the historical background of the amendment. "We doubt very much whether any action of a State not directed by way of discrimination against the negroes as a class, or on account of their race, will ever be held to come within the purview of this provision." [15] Yet, of the cases in this Court in which the Fourteenth Amendment was applied during the first fifty years after its adoption, less than one-half of 1 per cent. invoked it in protection of the negro race, and more than 50 per cent. asked that its benefits be extended to corporations.[16]

If the people of this nation wish to deprive the states of their sovereign rights to determine what is a fair and just tax upon corporations doing a purely local business within their own state boundaries, there is a way provided by the Constitution to accomplish this purpose. That way does not lie along the course of judicial amendment to that fundamental charter. An amendment having that purpose could be submitted by Congress as provided by the Constitution. I do not believe that the Fourteenth Amendment had that purpose, nor that the people believed it had that purpose, nor that it should be construed as having that purpose.

14 Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Ellis, 165 U.S. 150, 154, 17 S.Ct. 255, 41 L.Ed. 666.

15 Slaughter House Cases, supra.

16 Charles Wallace Collins, "The Fourteenth Amendment and the States" Boston (1912), page 138.

I believe the judgment of the Supreme Court of California should be sustained.

2. MODERN CORPORATION STATUTES

(a) NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW (ORGANIZATION SECTIONS)

§ 5. Incorporation. Three or more persons may become a stock corporation for any lawful business purpose or purposes except to do in this state any business for which a corporation may be formed under or pursuant to the banking law, the insurance law, the railroad law, or the transportation corporations law, by making, subscribing, acknowledging and filing a certificate which shall be entitled and endorsed "Certificate of incorporation of ......, pursuant to article two of the stock corporation law" (the blank space being filled in with the name of the corporation) and which shall state:

1. The name of the proposed corporation.
2. The purpose or purposes for which it is to be formed.
3. Either the amount of the capital stock and the number and par value of the shares of which it is to consist, or, if the corporation is to issue shares without par value, the statements required by section twelve.
4. If the shares are to be classified, the number of shares to be included in each class and all of the designations, preferences, privileges and voting powers of the shares of each class, and the restrictions or qualifications thereof.

If any class of stock which is preferred as to dividends or assets is to be issued in series as provided by section eleven, either (a) the designations, preferences, privileges and voting powers of the shares of the first series of such class, and the restrictions or qualifications thereof, and that the board of directors is authorized to fix from time to time before issuance the designations, preferences, privileges and voting powers of the shares of each subsequent series of such class, and the restrictions or qualifications thereof, or (b) that the board of directors is authorized to fix from time to time before issuance the designations, preferences, privileges and voting powers of the shares of each series of such class, and the restrictions or qualifications thereof.

5. The city, village or town and the county, within the state, in which the office of the corporation is to be located, and the address, within or without the state, to which the secretary of state shall mail a copy of process in any action or proceeding against the corporation which may be served upon him.

6. Its duration.

7. The number of its directors, or that the number of directors shall be not less than a stated minimum nor more than a stated maximum. In either case the number of directors shall be not less than three.

8. The names and post-office addresses of the directors until the first annual meeting of the stockholders, and if such address shall be in a city, the street and number or other particular description thereof. The number of the directors so named must be the number stated pursuant to the last preceding subdivision of this section if a definite number be stated, or, if an indefinite number be provided for, not less than the minimum number.

9. The name and post-office address of each subscriber of the certificate of incorporation, and a statement of the number of shares of stock which he agrees to take. If the address of any such subscriber shall be in a city, the street and number or other particular description thereof.

10. That all of the subscribers of the certificate are of full age, that at least two-thirds of them are citizens of the United States, and that at least one of them is a resident of the state of New York; that at least one of the persons named as a director is a citizen of the United States and a resident of the state of New York.

11. That the secretary of state is designated as the agent of the corporation upon whom process in any action or proceeding against it may be served.

12. If meetings of the board of directors are to be held only within the state the certificate or by-laws must so provide.

(b) DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW (ORGANIZATION SECTIONS).

Article IX of the Delaware Constitution

Sec. 1. No corporation shall hereafter be created, amended, renewed or revived by special act, but only by or under general law, nor shall any existing corporate charter be amended, renewed or revived by special act, but only by or under general law; but the foregoing provisions shall not apply to municipal corporations, banks or corporations for charitable, penal, reformatory, or educational purposes, sustained in whole or in part by the State. The General Assembly shall, by general law, provide for the revocation or forfeiture of the charters of all corporations for the abuse, misuse, or non-use of their corporate powers, privileges or franchises. Any proceeding for such revocation or forfeiture shall be taken by the Attorney-General, as may be provided by law. No general incorporation law, nor any special act of incorporation, shall be enacted without the concurrence of two-thirds of all the members elected to each House of the General Assembly.

Sec. 2. No corporation in existence at the adoption of this Constitution shall have its charter amended or renewed without first filing, under the corporate seal of said corporation, and duly attested in the office of the Secretary of State, an acceptance of the provisions of this Constitution.

Sec. 3. No corporation shall issue stock, except for money paid, labor done or personal property, or real estate or leases thereof actually acquired by such corporation.

Sec. 4. The rights, privileges, immunities and estates of religious societies and corporate bodies, except as herein otherwise provided, shall remain as if the Constitution of this State had not been altered.

Sec. 5. No foreign corporation shall do any business in this State through or by branch offices, agents or representatives located in this State, without having an authorized agent or agents in the State upon whom legal process may be served.

Sec. 6. Shares of the capital stock of corporations created under the laws of this State, when owned by persons or corporations without this State, shall not be subject to taxation by any law now existing or hereafter to be made.

Delaware General Corporation Law

Article 1.

General Provisions Respecting Corporations

Sec. 1. Purposes for Which Formed:—Any number of persons, not less than three, may associate to establish a corporation for the transaction of any lawful business, or to promote or conduct any legitimate objects or purposes under the provisions of and subject to the requirements of this Chapter as hereinafter provided, excepting for such purposes as are excluded from the operation of the general law by Section 1 of Article 9, of the Constitution of this State, upon making and filing a Certificate of Incorporation in writing in manner hereinafter mentioned. Corporations for constructing, maintaining and operating public utilities outside of this State, may be formed under the general provisions of this Chapter, but corporations for constructing, maintaining and operating public utilities within this State shall be subject to the special provisions and requirements of this Chapter applicable to such corporations.

Sec. 5. What Certificate Shall Set Forth:—The Certificate of Incorporation shall set forth:

1. The name of the corporation which name shall contain one of the words, "association", "company", "corporation", "club", "incorporated", "institute", "society", "union", "syndicate", or "limited", or one of the abbreviations, "co.", "corp.", "inc.", or "ltd.", and shall be such as to distinguish it upon the records in the office of the Secretary of State from the names of other corporations organized under the laws of this State.

2. The name of the county and the city, town, or place within the county in which its principal office or place of business is to be located in this State, and the name of its resident agent which agent may be either an individual or a corporation. In towns or cities of over six thousand inhabitants, the street and number of such principal office or place of business shall be stated, and the address by street and number of said resident agent shall be stated. Should such resident agent be not a resident of, nor located in, an incorporated town or city, then the hundred of its or his location or residence, and postoffice address, shall be stated.

3. The nature of the business, or objects or purposes to be transacted, promoted or carried on.

4. If the corporation is to be authorized to issue only one class of stock, the total number of shares of stock which the corporation shall have authority to issue and (a) the par value of each of such shares, or (b) a statement that all such shares are to be without par value; or, if the corporation is to be authorized to issue more than one class of stock, the total number of shares of all classes of stock which the corporation shall have authority to issue and (a) the number of the shares of each class thereof that are to have a par value and the par value of each share of each such class, and/or (b) the number of such shares that are to be without par value, and (c) a statement of all or any of the designations and the powers, preferences and rights, and the qualifications, limitations or restrictions thereof, which are permitted by the provisions of Section 13 of this Chapter in respect of any class or classes of stock of the corporation and the fixing of which by the Certificate of Incorporation is desired, and an express grant of such authority as it may then be desired to grant to the Board of Directors to fix by resolution or resolutions any thereof that may be desired but which shall not be fixed by said Certificate. In each case the Certificate of Incorporation shall also set forth the minimum amount of capital with which the corporation will commence business, which shall not be less than one thousand dollars. The foregoing provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to corporations which are not organized for profit and which are not to have authority to issue capital stock. In the case of such corporations, the fact that they are not to have authority to issue capital stock shall be stated in the Certificate of Incorporation. The conditions of membership of such corporations shall likewise be stated in the Certificate of Incorporation or such Certificate may provide that the conditions of membership shall be stated in the by-laws.

5. The names and places of residence of each of the incorporators.

6. Whether or not the corporation is to have perpetual existence, if not, the time when its existence is to commence and the time when its existence is to cease.

7. Whether or not the private property of the stockholders, or in the case of a corporation which is to have no capital stock, if the members of such corporation, shall be subject to the payment of corporate debts, and if so, to what extent.

8. The Certificate of Incorporation may also contain any provision which the incorporators may choose to insert for the management of the business and for the conduct of the affairs of the corporation, and any provisions creating, defining, limiting and regulating the powers of the corporation, the directors and the stockholders, or any class of the stockholders, or, in the case of a corporation which is to have no capital stock, of the members of such corporation; provided, such provisions are not contrary to the laws of this State. * * *

10. The Certificate of Incorporation may also contain such provisions as may be desired limiting or denying to the stockholders the preemptive right to subscribe to any or all additional issues of stock of the corporation of any or all classes.

11. The Certificate of Incorporation may also contain provisions requiring for any corporate action the vote of a larger proportion of the stock or any class thereof than is required by this Chapter.

Sec. 7. When Corporate Existence Begins:—Upon making the certificate of incorporation and causing the same to be filed, and a certified copy thereof recorded as aforesaid, and paying the license tax therefor to the Secretary of State, the persons so associating, their successors and assigns, shall from the date of such filing be and constitute a body corporate, by the name set forth in said certificate, subject to dissolution as in this Chapter elsewhere provided.

Sec. 11. First Meeting:—The first meeting of every corporation shall be called by a notice signed by a majority of the incorporators named in the Certificate of Incorporation designating the time and place of the meeting, which place may be either within or without this State, and stating the purpose for which such meeting is called; and such notice shall, at least two weeks before the time of any such meeting, be published three times in some newspaper of the County where the corporation may be established or have its principal place of business, or said first meeting may be called without such publication of notice, if two days' notice be personally served on all the parties named in the certificate of incorporation, or if all the parties named in the certificate of incorporation shall, in writing, waive notice and fix a time and place of meeting, then no notice or publication whatever shall be required of such first meeting.

Sec. 12. By-Laws:—The original by-laws of a corporation may be adopted by the incorporators. Thereafter, the power to make, alter or repeal by-laws shall be in the stockholders, but any corporation may, in the certificate of incorporation, confer that power upon the directors.

3. MODERN CORPORATE ORGANIZATION PAPERS: THE CONSTITUTIVE DOCUMENTS

NOTE

THE FORMAL CONTRACT CREATING A CORPORATION

It has been observed above that charters evolved from the royal or legislative grant, implying policy, to formal contracts permitted and sanctified by the state. The sanctification is accomplished by filing the documents in an appropriate office, usually that of the Secretary of State, and performing certain other prescribed formalities. The following statutes give the requirements of formal organization and the scope of permission (which is extremely broad) extended to the parties who form the corporation.

A thoughtful person immediately will note that the actual parties in interest commonly do not appear at the incorporation stage. Three incorporators sign the certificate, writing in it the powers that they desire to have. In point of fact, the real stockholders do not emerge until later,—they subscribe for or buy the stock thereafter. They do not enter as contracting parties—at least in form—in any relationship with the state. Yet they are contemplated at the very time that the corporation is formed. The persons working up the incorporation papers necessarily have this in mind. Possibly indeed they may have duties towards the persons they expect to invite into the corporation as future stockholders: See Hayward v. Leeson (post, p. 929).

THE CORPORATE POWERS AND THE CORPORATE ENTERPRISE

Analysis of a certificate of incorporation and an incorporation act will disclose that a corporation has, among others, two distinct functions.

a. Operations

Since every business corporation is formed for the purpose of exploiting some enterprise, it must have power to do all the physical acts and make all of the legal arrangements necessary or convenient in connection with this enterprise. Hence the elaborate charter powers permitting a corporation to buy or sell, own land, operate power plants, or whatever may fall within the field of the work of the corporate operating staff.

b. Distribution of interests (Finance)

Likewise, the corporation must provide a mechanism by which capital is secured for its operations, which necessarily involves arrangements for distributing periodically to the contributors of capital the profit of the enterprise, and for distribution of the net assets of the concern in case of its dissolution and winding up. This latter function is distinctly a financial one; and requires determination of the property interests of the participants.

Historically, this latter function was extremely simple. Originally, corporations had only one class of stock. This stock had a par value so that the contribution of capital made by each shareholder was defined, or, at least, a minimum contribution was stated, in the certificate of incorporation. As soon as such stock was paid for it was "issued" to the subscriber (original purchaser from the corporation) and thus became "outstanding" (as distinguished from stock authorized to be issued but still unissued). The property interests could then be determined by a simple process of arithmetic, i. e., dividing the profits or net assets by the number of shares outstanding. The management of the corporation (board of directors and responsible executive officers) had no discretion in defining these interests.

Evolution of modern business has, however, blurred this distinction; indeed, it is now difficult, if not impossible, to separate the two functions. Thus, a corporation conducting an enterprise desires to buy an additional plant. In order to secure the money to do this, it seems necessary to add to the number of shares of stock outstanding, and to issue the additional stock to the owners of the plant in lieu of the purchase price. Buying and running the new plant is obviously a matter of operation. But the issuance of additional stock necessarily upsets the previous determination of property interests. Thus, if there were 100 shares of stock outstanding prior to the purchase, and the corporation prior to the purchase had $100,000 of net assets, the holder of every share participated to the extent of 1 per cent. of the net assets or $1,000 (known as "book value") and 1 per cent. of the net profits. It is proposed to buy the new plant for 100 additional shares of stock. At once, (1) the interest of each previous shareholder is diminished. He has ½ per cent. interest instead of 1 per cent. in respect of each share held. (2) The book value of his interest in the net assets may be shifted, depending on the valuation of the new plant. If the new plant is fairly worth $50,000 and the direc tors issue 100 shares of stock for it, each share represents a book value of $750 at the close of the transaction, whereas prior to that time each original share represented $1,000. Conversely, the book value might be increased if the new plant has a value higher than $100,000. The management of the corporation must determine the valuation of the plant; and this function at once permits them to enter the field of determining of property interests, though the form will consist of a resolution by the directors estimating the value of the new plant. At the same time their judgment as to whether the new plant should be added to the scope of the company's operations will turn, at least in part, on precisely this valuation.

As will be seen, when the directors are empowered not merely to issue additional stock of the same class for the plant, but to issue stock of a different class—say preferred stock—another step has been taken. Whereas before the shareholder had an interest in the entire profits, now he has an interest in so much of the profits as remain after deducting the preferred dividend requirements.

The problem, therefore, with which corporation lawyers, business men and courts have been wrestling for years is to grant to the management liberty of action in securing new capital so that they can make their operating power fully effective; but at the same time to restrict this liberty of action so that the holders of outstanding stock or securities do not leave the value of their holdings completely at the mercy of the management.

There is an economic interest in granting to the persons responsible for the operations of the company the fullest discretion in such operations. There is also, however, an interest in maintaining property rights on a stable and equitable basis. Reconciling these two is a fundamental problem.

The foregoing will serve as some guide in analyzing the statutes and certificate of incorporation constituting the corporate contract, and also cases having to do with the nature of the corporate contract. It must be remembered that the science of business organization is not more than forty years old; that neither legislatures, courts, nor business men had clearly in mind the distinction between operations and property interests noted above; and that a consideration of them by courts and lawyers was forced only when corporate structures began to become complex, especially through the invention of preferred stocks. The reasoning of the cases ought therefore to be considered from at least two angles. As a matter of business the decisions ought to be analyzed with a view to seeing whether they achieve a fair balance of the interests above noted. The reasons given by the courts, however, must be analyzed separately, with a view to determining the mechanics by which the courts achieve the results they consider as fair, and, indeed whether they consider that reaching a fair business result has anything to do with their decision.

FREEDOM TO CONTRACT IN CORPORATE CHARTERS

From the statutes it is obvious that, if and as necessary, the state has specifically recorded its permission to the participants in a corporation to make a wide range of contracts.

These permit agreements giving corporate managements, and/or groups of the participants having voting rights, apparently almost unlimited powers in determining property interests; in changing or redetermining interests already defined; in making agreements in the first instance and in altering agreements already made. A study of the Blue Network Company, Inc. charter (and of other charters) indicates the extent to which this permission has been availed of.

It is at present a point of contention between lawyers as to whether the agreement as made is the sole arbiter of the rights of the participants; or whether the law imposes limitations upon the powers, exemptions from liability and other faculties which may be given by the corporate contract to managements and/or groups of participants with respect to the interests of the parties to the corporate contract.

Freedom of contract is the principle insisted on by one school of thought. It is illustrated by the following quotation:

"While it may be conceded that draftsmen of corporate documents sometimes incorporate provisions purporting to grant to the corporation itself, or to the management, powers which so shock the conscience that they should be held to be invalid, and although it may also be conceded that courts of equity should be zealous to protect against, and find remedies for, abuse of powers by corporate managements or by one class of security holders as against another class, nevertheless it is at least questionable whether there is not more loss than gain in the development of rules of law disregarding the clear language of contracts made between competent adults, wholly without any element of coercion, or in the development of rules affecting the obligations of management so rigid in their standards as to make responsible men hesitate to assume the risk of adverse after-the-fact claims by disgruntled—or blackmailing—stockholders. Undoubtedly legal principles are constantly following the development of higher ethical standards, but should they not follow such developments? In other fields of law there is, and always has been, a substantial gap between the strict rules of law, or, indeed, the principles enforced by chancery, and the commonly accepted principles of etiquette and ethics." [Swaine, 38 Yale L.J. 1003, 1004 (1929)].

Equitable control over contracts to safeguard a dominant social interest is the opposite point of view. Protagonists of it point out that the common law has overridden freedom of private contract in numerous cases to reach a desirable result or to safeguard a paramount interest, for instance:

Agreements creating trusts,

Agreements clogging equities of redemption, in mortgages,

Agreements with carriers and public utilities,

Life insurance policies,

Agreements restraining alienation of personal property, and so forth.

To justify this latter position, it must appear (a) that there is a paramount interest in protecting participants' interests; (b) that free contract may reach lengths threatening such interest; (c) that equitable control accomplishes such protection without threatening other greater interests. These are questions of economics, government and sociology rather than law. Students of the subject must therefore consider such questions as (1) the proportion of wealth held by corporations; (2) the number of shareholders; (3) their relative interests in corporate property; (4) the relative desirability of encouraging savings as against rewarding management groups; and cognate problems.

It is not now open to question that to some extent the common law, acting through courts of equity, modifies power granted to corporate managements by the contract (which includes both the charter and statute). Nor do the protagonists of "freedom of contract" deny this. Among the problems to be considered are:

(a) Is this common law control a fundamental and underlying qualification of all corporate contracts; or

(b) Are the instances of presently-existing common law control merely isolated controls over particular devices; and, if so

(c) What other or new devices or situations may be expected to call into being such common law control?

In other words, are the rules subsequently to be examined, instances of a fundamental principle, or are they related rules?

As general reading on these topics, see:

Veblen, Thorstein: "Absentee Ownership."

Dewing, Arthur Stone: "Financial Policy of Corporations."

Sée, Henri: "Modern Capitalism" (Tr. by H. B. Vanderblue and Georges F. Doriot.)

Following is a modern (Delaware) certificate of incorporation.

CERTIFICATE OF INCORPORATION OF BLUE NETWORK COMPANY, INC.

ARTICLE I.

The name of the corporation is BLUE NETWORK COMPANY, INC. (hereinafter called "the Company").

ARTICLE II.

The principal office of the Company in the State of Delaware is located at No. 100 West Tenth Street, in the City of Wilmington, County of New Castle. The name and address of its resident agent in charge thereof are The Corporation Trust Company, No. 100 West Tenth Street, Wilmington, Delaware.

ARTICLE III.

The nature of the business and the objects or purposes for which, and for any of which, the Company is formed and its business is to be transacted, promoted or carried on are to do any or all of the things herein set forth to the same extent that a natural person might or could do, viz:

1. To engage in the business of radio broadcasting and radio network broadcasting, and to do all things incidental thereto; and

2. Without limitation of the generality of the provisions of paragraph 1 of this Article III,

(a) To broadcast, disseminate, distribute, transmit, retransmit, receive or collect, by means of electricity, magnetism or electromagnetic waves, variations or impulses, or otherwise, music, instruction, entertainment, news, speeches, sermons, advertising, educational and informative matter, photographs, pictures, scenes, plays, light, heat, and energy in any form, for the purpose of entertainment, instruction or information or to be so utilized by the persons receiving the same; and to provide and furnish for the use of others, facilities for any of such purposes;

(b) To originate, arrange, provide, buy, sell, and distribute, with or without compensation, programs consisting of or containing the matters or things enumerated in the preceding sub-paragraph, for broadcasting, dissemination or distribution, by means of electricity, magnetism or electromagnetic waves, variations or impulses, or otherwise; and to contract with and engage the services of artists and others for the purpose of providing such programs;

(c) To buy, hire, construct, establish, maintain and operate stations, studios, plants, wires, underground or other circuits and any and all machinery and apparatus incidental or necessary to the conduct of any of the purposes herein stated;

(d) To lease, sublease, or license others to use the lines, systems or circuits, stations, studios and any other facilities of the Company to persons, firms, associations or corporations, public or private, for compensation or otherwise, for such period of time and under such conditions as the Company may determine;

(e) To generate, produce, control, furnish, sell or otherwise utilize in any manner whatsoever, and for any and every purpose, electricity, magnetism and electromagnetic, radio and every other kind of waves, power, energy or force, variations and impulses; to create, install and operate systems or circuits of communication which may be intrastate, interstate or international; to engage in research and experimental work in and to develop and prosecute the art and business of electric communication, including each and every type of radio communication;

(f) To compose, print, publish, distribute, sell or otherwise dispose of programs, music, plays, magazines, books, pamphlets and other literature, and to acquire, hold, use, sell or in any manner dispose of, or deal with, copyrights or other rights connected with the same;

(g) To carry on advertising campaigns for the promotion of the good will of the public toward the Company's customers and to carry on a general advertising business;

(h) To apply for, obtain, register, purchase, lease or otherwise acquire, and to hold, own, use, develop, operate and introduce, and to sell, assign, grant licenses or rights in respect of, or otherwise to turn to account or dispose of, copyrights, trade marks, trade names, brands, labels, patent rights, letters patent of the United States or of any other country or government, inventions, improvements and processes, whether used in connection with or secured under letters patent or otherwise;

(i) To manufacture, purchase or otherwise acquire, own, mortgage, pledge, sell, assign and transfer, or otherwise dispose of, to invest, trade, and deal in, goods, wares, merchandise and personal property of every class and description;

(j) To acquire, and pay for in cash, stock or bonds of the Company or otherwise, the good will, rights, assets and property, and to undertake or assume the whole or any part of the obligations or liabilities, of any person, firm, association or corporation;

(k) To guarantee, purchase, hold, sell, assign, transfer, mortgage, pledge or otherwise dispose of shares of the capital stock of, or any bonds, securities or evidences of indebtedness issued by, any other corporation organized under the laws of any State or nation, and while the owner thereof to exercise all the rights, powers and privileges of ownership;

(l) To aid in any manner any corporation whose stocks, bonds, or other obligations are held or guaranteed by the Company or in which the Company is otherwise interested, and to do any other act or thing to preserve, protect, improve or enhance the value of any such stocks, bonds or other obligations.

(m) To enter into, make and perform contracts of every kind and description with any person, firm, association, corporation, municipality, county, State, or nation, territory, dependency or colony thereof;

(n) To borrow money and to draw, make, accept, endorse, execute and issue promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange, warrants, bonds, debentures and other negotiable or non-negotiable instruments and evidences of indebtedness, and to secure the payment of any such securities and of the interest thereon by mortgage upon or pledge, conveyance or assignment in trust of the whole or any part of the property of the Company, whether at the time owned or thereafter to be acquired, and to sell, pledge or otherwise dispose of such bonds or other obligations of the Company;

(o) To have one or more offices, to carry on all or any of its operations, and, without restriction or limit as to amount, to purchase or otherwise acquire, hold, own, mortgage, sell, convey, or otherwise dispose of real and personal property of every class and description, in each State, District, territory, or possession of the United States, and in each foreign country and colony thereof; and

(p) To carry on any other business in connection with the foregoing, and to have and exercise all the powers conferred by the laws of Delaware upon a corporation formed under the General Corporation Law of the State of Delaware.

The provisions of this Article III shall be construed both as objects and powers, and the foregoing enumeration of specific objects and powers shall not be held to limit or restrict in any manner the powers of the Company.

ARTICLE IV.

1. The total number of shares of stock which the Company shall have authority to issue is 1,000 shares, of the par value of $100 per share.
2. The minimum amount of capital with which the Company will commence business is $1,000.

ARTICLE V.

The name, place of residence and citizenship of each of the incorporators are as follows:

Name	Residence	Citizenship
Wm. R. Eberle	Mount Vernon, N. Y.	United States of America
Clifton J. Finch	New York, N. Y.	United States of America
Joseph V. Heffernan	New York, N. Y.	United States of America

ARTICLE VI.

The Company is to have perpetual existence.

ARTICLE VII.

The private property of the stockholders shall not be subject to the payment of corporate debts to any extent whatever.

ARTICLE VIII.

1. No person shall be eligible for election as a Director or officer of the Company who is not at the time of his election a citizen of the United States.

2. In furtherance and not in limitation of the powers conferred by statute, the Board of Directors is expressly authorized, subject to the provisions of Article IV hereof:

(a) To make, alter or repeal the By-Laws of the Company;

(b) To authorize and cause to be executed mortgages and liens upon the real and personal property of the Company;

(c) To set apart out of any of the funds of the Company available for dividends a reserve or reserves for any proper purpose and to abolish any such reserve;

(d) To fix and change from time to time the amount to be reserved as working capital over and above the capital stock paid in;

(e) To sell, exchange, assign, convey or otherwise dispose of a part of the property, assets and effects of the Company less than the whole or less than substantially the whole thereof, on such terms and conditions as the Board of Directors shall deem advisable and without the assent of the stockholders in writing or otherwise; and

(f) From time to time to determine whether and to what extent and at what times and places and under what conditions and regulations the accounts and books of the Company (other than the stock ledger) or any of them shall be open to inspection of stockholders; and no stockholder shall have any right to inspect any account, book or document of the Company, except as conferred by statute, unless authorized by resolution of the stockholders or Directors.

3. No holder of any class of stock of the Company shall be entitled, as of right, to subscribe for, purchase or receive any part of any new or additional issue of any class of stock of the Company, or of any issue of notes, bonds, debentures, or other securities convertible into any class of stock of the Company, or of any issue of warrants, options or other rights to subscribe to any class of stock of the Company or to notes, bonds, debentures, or other securities convertible into any class of stock of the Company; and any such issue of stock, notes, bonds, debentures, warrants, options, rights, or other securities may be sold by the Board of Directors, without prior offer to the stockholders for pro rata subscription by them, at such price, to such purchasers, and upon such other terms and conditions as the Board of Directors shall deem advisable.

4. No contract or other transaction between the Company and any other corporation, including an affiliate of the Company, shall be deemed affected or invalidated by reason of the fact that one or more of the Directors of the Company is a director or officer of, or are directors or officers of, or is or are interested in, such other corporation. Any Director or Directors of the Company, individually or jointly, may be a party or parties to, or may be interested in, any contract or transaction with the Company, or in which the Company is also interested; and no contract, act or transaction of the Company with any person, firm, association or corporation shall be deemed affected or invalidated by the fact that any Director or Directors of the Company is a party to, or are parties to, or interested in, such contract, act or transaction, if the fact that such Director or Directors was or were interested was disclosed to or known by the Board of Directors or a majority thereof at the time the contract was entered into or the act or transaction took place.

5. Each Director and officer of the Company shall be indemnified by the Company against expenses reasonably incurred by him in connection with any action, suit or proceeding to which he may be made a party by reason of his being or having been a Director or officer of the Company, except in relation to matters as to which he shall be finally adjudged in such action, suit or proceeding to have been derelict in the performance of his duty as such Director or officer. Such right of indemnification shall not be deemed exclusive of any other rights to which he may be entitled as a matter of law.

6. The Company reserves the right to amend, alter, change or repeal any provision contained in this Certificate of Incorporation in the manner now or hereafter prescribed by law, and all rights conferred upon stockholders herein are granted subject to this reservation.

We, the Undersigned, being each of the incorporators named in Article V of the foregoing Certificate of Incorporation, in order to form a corporation in accordance with the provisions of the General Corporation Law of the State of Delaware, do make this certificate, hereby declaring and certifying that the facts herein set forth are true.

In Witness Whereof we have hereunto set our hands and seals on January 9, 1942.

Wm. R. Eberle [Seal]
Clifton J. Finch [Seal]
Joseph V. Heffernan [Seal]

In presence of:
Virginia McCutcheon
as to all

STATE OF NEW YORK }
COUNTY OF NEW YORK } ss:

Be it Remembered, That on this 9th day of January, A.D. 1942, personally came before me Ella Stonebraker, a Notary Public for the State of New York, Wm. R. Eberle, Clifton J. Finch and Joseph v. Heffernan, all of the parties to the foregoing Certificate of Incorporation, known to me personally to be such, and severally acknowledge the said Certificate to be the act and deed of the signers respectively and that the facts therein stated are truly set forth.

Given under my hand and seal of office the day and year aforesaid.

Ella Stonebraker
Notary Public

Notary Public, New York County,
Clerk's No. 823, Register's No. 3S1298
Commission Expires March 30, 1943
[Notarial Seal]

NOTE

The certificate of organization papers of a corporation, in form, contemplate three or four incorporators, deciding to enter a business, determining the powers they need and capital they will get together by selling stock, and drawing up the arrangement as a certificate of incorporation.

Once this is filed or accepted by the state, they then hold a meeting; adopt by-laws; elect directors, and so forth, all in regular parliamentary procedure.

But in point of fact, more often than not, one or more businessmen talk matters over with a lawyer, and request that a corporation be formed. Their plans are frequently indefinite at this stage. The lawyer telegraphs the Secretary of State to inquire whether a particular name is available as a corporate name; and on discovering that it is, thereupon sits down and dictates a full set of papers, naming as incorporators three associates in his office. They are called in and invited to sign; the certificate is sent off; and a copy is enclosed which is returned with an official stamp indicating that it has been filed. The three associates thereupon get together (if the work is carefully done) and hold their meeting. If it is carelessly done, they may merely sign the papers where indicated, thus completing a perfect record of a meeting. In either case the process is often casual to the last degree.

Not infrequently the fictitious quality of the proceeding is perpetuated through the first Directors' meeting. When the businessman has not yet decided how he will constitute his Board of Directors, a group of "dummies" are often named—associates in the law office, or in the office of the businessman, who are expected to vote as the lawyer's papers indicate and resigning on request to make way for the definitive members of the Board. Almost every law clerk in a large law office has at one time or another been incorporator, dummy, director, or perhaps even dummy president or secretary of corporations which later appear as very substantial concerns.

There follow the minutes of the organization meetings.

MINUTES OF AN INCORPORATOR'S MEETING (DELAWARE)

(Courtesy of the Corporation Trust Co., New York City)

The meeting of the incorporators of ——— was held on the ——— day of ———, 19—, at —.M., at its principal office, No. 100 West Tenth Street, Wilmington, Delaware, pursuant to a written waiver of notice signed by all said incorporators, fixing said time and place, as follows:

WAIVER OF NOTICE

MEETING OF INCORPORATORS

We, the undersigned, being all the incorporators of ———, incorporated under the laws of the State of Delaware, ———, do hereby waive notice of the time, place and purpose of the first meeting of the said corporation and do fix the ——— day of ——— 19—, at ——— o'clock in the ——— noon, as the time, and the principal office of said corporation, No. 100 West Tenth Street, Wilmington, Delaware, as the place of said meeting.

And we do hereby waive all the requirements of the statutes of Delaware, both as to the notice of this meeting and the publication thereof; and we do consent to the transaction of such business as may come before said meeting.

Dated, ———, 19—.

The following incorporators were present in person:

---

being all of the incorporators.

NOTE.—If stock is subscribed for in certificate of incorporation change foregoing to show number of shares subscribed for.

Upon motion, Mr. ——— was chosen as chairman, and Mr. ——— was chosen as secretary of the meeting.

The chairman reported that the certificate of incorporation was filed in the office of the Secretary of State of Delaware, on the ——— day of ———, 19—, and that a certified copy thereof was recorded on the ——— day of ——— 19—, in the office of the Recorder of New Castle County, Delaware, and the secretary was instructed to cause a copy of such certificate of incorporation to be inserted in the minute book.

The secretary presented a form of by-laws for the regulation of the affairs of the corporation, which was read, section by section.

Upon motion, duly made, seconded and carried, it was

Resolved, That the by-laws submitted at and read to this meeting be, and the same hereby are, adopted as and for the by-laws of this corporation, and that the secretary be, and he hereby is, instructed to cause the same to be inserted in the minute book immediately following the copy of the certificate of incorporation.

The chairman stated that the next business before the meeting was the election of a board of directors.

Messrs. ——— and ——— were appointed inspectors of election and thereupon subscribed and swore to the following oath:

(Name of Corporation)

INSPECTOR'S OATH

STATE OF DELAWARE,
COUNTY OF NEW CASTLE, } ss.:

We, ——— and ———, being sworn upon our respective oaths, do severally promise and swear that we will faithfully, honestly and impartially perform the duties of inspectors of election, and will to the best of our skill and ability conduct the election to be held this day for directors of the above named corporation, and make a true report of the same.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this ——— day of ——— 19—.

Inspectors.

Messrs. ———

were nominated for directors of the corporation, to hold office for the ensuing year and until their respective successors are elected. No other nominations having been made, the polls were duly opened, and all the incorporators having voted by ballot, the chairman declared the polls closed. Thereupon the inspectors canvassed the vote cast and made and presented the following certificate showing the result of the election:

INSPECTORS' CERTIFICATE

We, the Subscribers, Inspectors of Election appointed to act at the meeting of the incorporators of ——— held this ——— day of ———, 19—, do report that, having taken an oath impartially to conduct the election for directors, we did receive the votes of the incorporators by ballot.

We report that ——— votes were cast for the election of directors and that the following persons received the number of votes set opposite their respective names, to wit:

For Directors	Number of Votes

Respectfully submitted,

Inspectors.

The chairman thereupon declared Messrs. ——————————
——————————————————————————
duly elected directors of the corporation to hold office for the ensuing year and until their respective successors are elected.

Upon motion, duly made, seconded and carried, it was

Resolved, That the board of directors be and it hereby is authorized, in its discretion, to issue the shares of the capital stock of this corporation to the full amount or number of shares authorized by the certificate of incorporation, in such amounts and for such considerations as from time to time shall be determined by the board and as may be permitted by law.

Upon motion, duly made, seconded and carried, the meeting thereupon adjourned.

——————————
Secretary of the meeting.

BY-LAWS

(NOTE: These by-laws may be altered to suit particular circumstances but the Delaware statutes should be considered in connection with any proposed change.)

OFFICES

1. The principal office shall be in the City of Wilmington, County of New Castle, State of Delaware, and the name of the resident agent in charge thereof is The Corporation Trust Company.

2. The corporation may also have an office in the City of ———, State of ———, and also offices at such other places as the board of directors may from time to time determine or the business of the corporation may require.

STOCKHOLDERS' MEETINGS

3. *All meetings of the stockholders for the election of directors shall be held at the office of the corporation in ———. Meetings of stockholders for any other purpose may be held at such place and time as shall be stated in the notice of the meeting, or in a duly executed waiver of notice thereof.

* NOTE.—A definite time and place should be fixed for the holding of annual meeting of stockholders.

4. *An annual meeting of stockholders, commencing with the year 19—, shall be held on the ——— of ——— in each year if not a legal holiday, and if a legal holiday, then on the next secular day following, at ——— o'clock —.M., at which they shall elect by a plurality vote, by ballot,† a board of directors, and transact such other business as may properly be brought before the meeting.

5. Written notice of the annual meeting shall be served upon or mailed to each stockholder entitled to vote thereat at such address as appears on the books of the corporation, at least ——— days prior to the meeting.

6. At least ten days before every election of directors, a complete list of the stockholders entitled to vote at said election, arranged in alphabetical order, with the residence of each and the number of voting shares held by each, shall be prepared by the secretary. Such list shall be open at the place where the election is to be held for said ten days, to the examination of any stockholder, and shall be produced and kept at the time and place of election during the whole time thereof, and subject to the inspection of any stockholder who may be present.

7. Special meetings of the stockholders, for any purpose or purposes, unless otherwise prescribed by statute or by the certificate of incorporation, may be called by the president and shall be called by the president or secretary at the request in writing of a majority of the board of directors, or at the request in writing of stockholders owning a majority in amount of the entire capital stock of the corporation issued and outstanding and entitled to vote. Such request shall state the purpose or purposes of the proposed meeting.

8. Written notice of a special meeting of stockholders, stating the time and place and object thereof, shall be served upon or mailed to each stockholder entitled to vote thereat at such address as appears on the books of the corporation, at least ——— days before such meeting.

9. Business transacted at all special meetings shall be confined to the objects stated in the call.

10. The holders of a ——— of the stock issued and outstanding and entitled to vote thereat, present in person or represented by proxy, shall be requisite and shall constitute a quorum at all meetings of the stockholders for the transaction of business except as otherwise provided by statute, by the certificate of incorporation or by these by-laws. If, however, such quorum shall not be present or represented at any meeting of the stockholders, the stockholders entitled to vote thereat, present in person or represented by proxy, shall have power to adjourn the meeting from time to time, without notice other than announcement at the meeting, until a quorum shall be present or represented. At such adjourned meeting at which a quorum shall

---

* NOTE.—A definite time and place should be fixed for the holding of annual meeting of stockholders.

† NOTE.—If charter provides that directors need not be elected by ballot this requirement may be eliminated.

be present or represented any business may be transacted which might have been transacted at the meeting as originally notified.

11. When a quorum is present at any meeting, the vote of the holders of a majority of the stock having voting power present in person or represented by proxy shall decide any question brought before such meeting, unless the question is one upon which by express provision of the statutes or of the certificate of incorporation or of these by-laws, a different vote is required in which case such express provision shall govern and control the decision of such question.

12. At any meeting of the stockholders every stockholder having the right to vote shall be entitled to vote in person, or by proxy appointed by an instrument in writing subscribed by such stockholder and bearing a date not more than three years prior to said meeting, unless said instrument provides for a longer period. Each stockholder shall have one vote for each share of stock having voting power, registered in his name on the books of the corporation,* and except where the transfer books of the corporation shall have been closed or a date shall have been fixed as a record date for the determination of its stockholders entitled to vote, no share of stock shall be voted on at any election of directors which shall have been transferred on the books of the corporation within twenty days next preceding such election of directors.

13. Whenever the vote of stockholders at a meeting thereof is required or permitted to be taken in connection with any corporate action by any provisions of the statutes or of the certificate of incorporation or of these by-laws, the meeting and vote of stockholders may be dispensed with, if all the stockholders who would have been entitled to vote upon the action if such meeting were held, shall consent in writing to such corporate action being taken.

DIRECTORS

14. The number of directors which shall constitute the whole board shall be ———.† The directors shall be elected at the annual meeting of the stockholders, and each director shall be elected to serve until his successor shall be elected and shall qualify. Directors need not be stockholders.

15. The directors may hold their meetings and keep the books of the corporation, except the original or duplicate stock ledger, outside of Delaware, at the office of the corporation in the City of ———, State of ———, or at such other places as they may from time to time determine.

---

* NOTE.—This provision should be changed if the certificate of incorporation provides for cumulative voting.

† NOTE.—In case provision is to be made for an indefinite number of directors this sentence may be replaced by the following: "The number of directors which shall constitute the whole board shall be not less than three nor more than ———. The first board shall consist of ——— directors. Thereafter, within the limits above specified, the number of directors shall be determined by the stockholders at the annual meeting."

16. If the office of any director or directors becomes vacant by reason of death, resignation, retirement, disqualification, removal from office, or otherwise, a majority of the remaining directors, though less than a quorum, shall choose a successor or successors, who shall hold office for the unexpired term in respect to which such vacancy occurred or until the next election of directors.

17. The property and business of the corporation shall be managed by its board of directors which may exercise all such powers of the corporation and do all such lawful acts and things as are not by statute or by the certificate of incorporation or by these by-laws directed or required to be exercised or done by the stockholders.

COMMITTEES OF DIRECTORS

18. The board of directors may, by resolution or resolutions passed by a majority of the whole board, designate one or more committees, each committee to consist of two or more of the directors of the corporation, which, to the extent provided in said resolution or resolutions, shall have and may exercise the powers of the board of directors in the management of the business and affairs of the corporation, and may have power to authorize the seal of the corporation to be affixed to all papers which may require it. Such committee or committees shall have such name or names as may be determined from time to time by resolution adopted by the board of directors.

19. The committees shall keep regular minutes of their proceedings and report the same to the board when required.

COMPENSATION OF DIRECTORS

20. Directors, as such, shall not receive any stated salary for their services, but, by resolution of the board a fixed sum and expenses of attendance, if any, may be allowed for attendance at each regular or special meeting of the board; provided that nothing herein contained shall be construed to preclude any director from serving the corporation in any other capacity and receiving compensation therefor.

21. Members of special or standing committees may be allowed like compensation for attending committee meetings.

MEETINGS OF THE BOARD

22. The first meeting of each newly elected board shall be held at such time and place either within or without the State of Delaware as shall be fixed by the vote of the stockholders at the annual meeting and no notice of such meeting shall be necessary to the newly elected directors in order legally to constitute the meeting provided a quorum shall be present, or they may meet at such place and time as shall be fixed by the consent in writing of all the directors.

23. Regular meetings of the board may be held without notice at such time and place either within or without the State of Delaware as shall from time to time be determined by the board.

24. Special meetings of the board may be called by the president on ——— days' notice to each director, either personally or by mail or by telegram; special meetings shall be called by the president or secretary in like manner and on like notice on the written request of two directors.

25. At all meetings of the board ——— *directors shall be necessary and sufficient to constitute a quorum for the transaction of business and the act of a majority of the directors present at any meeting at which there is a quorum shall be the act of the board of directors, except as may be otherwise specifically provided by statute or by the certificate of incorporation or by these by-laws. If a quorum shall not be present at any meeting of directors the directors present thereat may adjourn the meeting from time to time, without notice other than announcement at the meeting, until a quorum shall be present.

NOTICES

26. Whenever under the provisions of the statutes or of the certificate of incorporation or of these by-laws, notice is required to be given to any director or stockholder, it shall not be construed to mean personal notice, but such notice may be given in writing, by mail, by depositing the same in a post office or letter box, in a postpaid sealed wrapper, addressed to such director or stockholder at such address as appears on the books of the corporation, or, in default of other address, to such director or stockholder at the General Post Office in the City of Wilmington, Delaware, and such notice shall be deemed to be given at the time when the same shall be thus mailed.

27. Whenever any notice is required to be given under the provisions of the statutes or of the certificate of incorporation, or of these by-laws, a waiver thereof in writing signed by the person or persons entitled to said notice, whether before or after the time stated therein, shall be deemed equivalent thereto.

OFFICERS

28. The officers of the corporation shall be chosen by the directors and shall be a president, a vice-president, a secretary and a treasurer. The board of directors may also choose additional vice-presidents, and one or more assistant secretaries and assistant treasurers. Two or more offices may be held by the same person, except that where the offices of president and secretary are held by the same person, such person shall not hold any other office.

29. The board of directors at its first meeting after each annual meeting of stockholders shall choose a president from its members, and one or more vice-presidents, a secretary and a treasurer, none of whom need be a member of the board.

* NOTE.—The by-laws may provide that any number of directors, but not less than one-third of the total number of the board nor less than two, shall be a quorum.

30. The board may appoint such other officers and agents as it shall deem necessary, who shall hold their offices for such terms and shall exercise such powers and perform such duties as shall be determined from time to time by the board.

31. The salaries of all officers and agents of the corporation shall be fixed by the board of directors.

32. The officers of the corporation shall hold office until their successors are chosen and qualify in their stead. Any officer elected or appointed by the board of directors may be removed at any time by the affirmative vote of a majority of the whole board of directors. If the office of any officer becomes vacant for any reason, the vacancy shall be filled by the board of directors.

THE PRESIDENT

33. The president shall be the chief executive officer of the corporation; he shall preside at all meetings of the stockholders and directors, shall be ex officio a member of all standing committees, shall have general and active management of the business of the corporation, and shall see that all orders and resolutions of the board are carried into effect.

34. He shall execute bonds, mortgages and other contracts requiring a seal, under the seal of the corporation, except where required or permitted by law to be otherwise signed and executed and except where the signing and execution thereof shall be expressly delegated by the board of directors to some other officer or agent of the corporation.

VICE-PRESIDENTS

35. The vice-presidents in the order of their seniority shall, in the absence or disability of the president, perform the duties and exercise the powers of the president, and shall perform such other duties as the board of directors shall prescribe.

THE SECRETARY AND ASSISTANT SECRETARIES

36. The secretary shall attend all sessions of the board and all meetings of the stockholders and record all votes and the minutes of all proceedings in a book to be kept for that purpose and shall perform like duties for the standing committees when required. He shall give, or cause to be given, notice of all meetings of the stockholders and special meetings of the board of directors, and shall perform such other duties as may be prescribed by the board of directors or president, under whose supervision he shall be. He shall keep in safe custody the seal of the corporation and, when authorized by the board, affix the same to any instrument requiring it and, when so affixed, it shall be attested by his signature or by the signature of the treasurer or an assistant secretary.

37. The assistant secretaries in order of their seniority shall, in the absence or disability of the secretary, perform the duties and exercise the powers of the secretary and shall perform such other duties as the board of directors shall prescribe.

THE TREASURER AND ASSISTANT TREASURERS

38. The treasurer shall have the custody of the corporate funds and securities and shall keep full and accurate accounts of receipts and disbursements in books belonging to the corporation and shall deposit all moneys and other valuable effects in the name and to the credit of the corporation in such depositories as may be designated by the board of directors.

39. He shall disburse the funds of the corporation as may be ordered by the board, taking proper vouchers for such disbursements, and shall render to the president and directors, at the regular meetings of the board, or whenever they may require it, an account of all his transactions as treasurer and of the financial condition of the corporation.

40. If required by the board of directors, he shall give the corporation a bond (which shall be renewed every six years) in such sum and with such surety or sureties as shall be satisfactory to the board for the faithful performance of the duties of his office and for the restoration to the corporation, in case of his death, resignation, retirement or removal from office, of all books, papers, vouchers, money and other property of whatever kind in his possession or under his control belonging to the corporation.

41. The assistant treasurers in the order of their seniority shall, in the absence or disability of the treasurer, perform the duties and exercise the powers of the treasurer and shall perform such other duties as the board of directors shall prescribe.

CERTIFICATES OF STOCK

42. The certificates of stock of the corporation shall be numbered and shall be entered in the books of the corporation as they are issued. They shall exhibit the holder's name and number of shares and shall be signed by the president or a vice-president and the treasurer or an assistant treasurer or the secretary or an assistant secretary.* If any stock certificate is signed (1) by a transfer agent or an assistant transfer agent or (2) by a transfer clerk acting on behalf of the corporation and a registrar, the signature of any such officer may be facsimile.

* NOTE.—If the corporation has more than one class of stock or more than one series of any class add: The designations, preferences and relative, participating, optional or other special rights of each class of stock or series thereof and the qualifications, limitations or restrictions of such preferences and/or rights shall be set forth in full or summarized on the face or back of the certificates which the corporation shall issue to represent such class or series of stock.

The following may be added if desired: Certificates may be issued for partly paid shares and in such case upon the face or back of the certificates issued to represent any such partly paid shares, the total amount of the consideration to be paid therefor, and the amount paid thereon shall be specified.

TRANSFERS OF STOCK

43. Upon surrender to the corporation or the transfer agent of the corporation of a certificate for shares duly endorsed or accompanied by proper evidence of succession, assignment or authority to transfer, it shall be the duty of the corporation to issue a new certificate to the person entitled thereto, cancel the old certificate and record the transaction upon its books.

CLOSING OF TRANSFER BOOKS

44. The board of directors shall have power to close the stock transfer books of the corporation for a period not exceeding fifty days preceding the date of any meeting of stockholders or the date for payment of any dividend or the date for the allotment of rights or the date when any change or conversion or exchange of capital stock shall go into effect or for a period of not exceeding fifty days in connection with obtaining the consent of stockholders for any purpose; provided, however, that in lieu of closing the stock transfer books as aforesaid, the board of directors may fix in advance a date, not exceeding fifty days preceding the date of any meeting of stockholders, or the date for the payment of any dividend, or the date for the allotment of rights, or the date when any change or conversion or exchange of capital stock shall go into effect, or a date in connection with obtaining such consent, as a record date for the determination of the stockholders entitled to notice of, and to vote at, any such meeting, and any adjournment thereof, or entitled to receive payment of any such dividend, or to any such allotment of rights, or to exercise the rights in respect of any such change, conversion or exchange of capital stock, or to give such consent, and in such case such stockholders and only such stockholders as shall be stockholders of record on the date so fixed shall be entitled to such notice of, and to vote at, such meeting and any adjournment thereof, or to receive payment of such dividend, or to receive such allotment of rights, or to exercise such rights, or to give such consent, as the case may be, notwithstanding any transfer of any stock on the books of the corporation after any such record date fixed as aforesaid.*

REGISTERED STOCKHOLDERS

45. The corporation shall be entitled to treat the holder of record of any share or shares of stock as the holder in fact thereof and, accordingly, shall not be bound to recognize any equitable or other claim to or interest in such share or shares on the part of any other person, whether or not it shall have express or other notice thereof, except as otherwise provided by the laws of Delaware.

---

* NOTE.—An optional provision may be used by which the by-laws may fix a record date for the determination of the stockholders entitled to notice of, etc.

LOST CERTIFICATE

46. The board of directors may direct a new certificate or certificates to be issued in place of any certificate or certificates theretofore issued by the corporation alleged to have been lost or destroyed, upon the making of an affidavit of that fact by the person claiming the certificate of stock to be lost or destroyed. When authorizing such issue of a new certificate or certificates, the board of directors may, in its discretion and as a condition precedent to the issuance thereof, require the owner of such lost or destroyed certificate or certificates, or his legal representative, to advertise the same in such manner as it shall require and/or give the corporation a bond in such sum as it may direct as indemnity against any claim that may be made against the corporation with respect to the certificate alleged to have been lost or destroyed.

DIVIDENDS

47. Dividends upon the capital stock of the corporation, subject to the provisions of the certificate of incorporation, if any, may be declared by the board of directors at any regular or special meeting, pursuant to law. Dividends may be paid in cash, in property, or in shares of the capital stock, subject to the provisions of the certificate of incorporation.

48. Before payment of any dividend, there may be set aside out of any funds of the corporation available for dividends such sum or sums as the directors from time to time, in their absolute discretion, think proper as a reserve fund to meet contingencies, or for equalizing dividends, or for repairing or maintaining any property of the corporation, or for such other purpose as the directors shall think conducive to the interest of the corporation, and the directors may modify or abolish any such reserve in the manner in which it was created.

DIRECTORS' ANNUAL STATEMENT

49. The board of directors shall present at each annual meeting and when called for by vote of the stockholders at any special meeting of the stockholders, a full and clear statement of the business and condition of the corporation.

CHECKS

50. All checks or demands for money and notes of the corporation shall be signed by such officer or officers or such other person or persons as the board of directors may from time to time designate.

FISCAL YEAR

51. The fiscal year shall begin the first day of ——— in each year.

SEAL

52. The corporate seal shall have inscribed thereon the name of the corporation, the year of its organization and the words "Corporate Seal, Delaware". Said seal may be used by causing it or a facsimile thereof to be impressed or affixed or reproduced or otherwise.

AMENDMENTS

53. These by-laws may be altered or repealed at any regular meeting of the stockholders or at any special meeting of the stockholders at which a quorum is present or represented, provided notice of the proposed alteration or repeal be contained in the notice of such special meeting, by the affirmative vote of a majority of the stock entitled to vote at such meeting and present or represented thereat, or by the affirmative vote of a majority of the board of directors at any regular meeting of the board or at any special meeting of the board if notice of the proposed alteration or repeal be contained in the notice of such special meeting; provided, however, that no change of the time or place of the meeting for the election of directors shall be made within sixty days next before the day on which such meeting is to be held, and that in case of any change of such time or place, notice thereof shall be given to each stockholder in person or by letter mailed to his last known post office address at least twenty days before the meeting is held.

MINUTES OF FIRST MEETING OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS

The first meeting of the board of directors of ——— was held at ——— on the ——— day of ———, 19—, at —. M.

Present: Messrs: ————————————————————————————————

———————————————————————————————————————

constituting ——— of the board.

Mr. ——— was chosen temporary chairman and Mr. ——— was chosen temporary secretary of the meeting.

The secretary presented and read the following waiver of notice of the meeting, signed by all the directors:

WAIVER OF NOTICE

FIRST MEETING OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS

We, the undersigned, being all the directors of ———, do hereby waive notice of the time, place and purpose of the first meeting of the board of directors of said corporation.

We designate the ——— day of ———, 19—, at ——— o'clock in the ——— noon, as the time, and ——— as the place of said meeting, the purpose thereof being to elect officers, authorize the issue of the capital stock, complete the organization of said corporation, and to transact such other business as may be necessary or advisable.

Dated, ———, 19—.

The minutes of the meeting of incorporators were read and approved.

The following persons were nominated for officers of the corporation to serve until their respective successors are chosen and qualify:

President.

Vice-President.

Secretary.

Treasurer.

All the directors present having voted, the chairman announced that the aforesaid persons had been unanimously elected to the offices set before their respective names.

The president and the secretary thereupon entered upon the discharge of their duties.

(If it is desired that the treasurer give a bond, insert here necessary provision therefor.)

Upon motion, duly made, seconded and carried, it was

RESOLVED, That there shall be an Executive Committee of ——— members of the board of directors which shall have authority to exercise all the powers of the board in the current business of the corporation while the board is not in session.

FURTHER RESOLVED, That Messrs. ——— be and they are hereby designated as members of the Executive Committee (Mr. ——— to be chairman thereof).

Upon motion, duly made, seconded and carried, it was

RESOLVED, That the form of stock certificate presented and read be approved and adopted, and that the secretary be instructed to insert a specimen thereof in the minute book.

Upon motion, duly made, seconded and carried, it was

RESOLVED, That the seal, an impression of which is herewith affixed, be adopted as the corporate seal of the corporation.

The secretary was authorized and directed to procure the proper corporate books.

Upon motion, duly made, seconded and carried, it was † RESOLVED, That the treasurer be and he is hereby authorized to open a bank account in behalf of the corporation with the ——— Bank of ———.

FURTHER RESOLVED, That until otherwise ordered, said bank be and hereby is authorized to make payments from the funds of † Specific bank resolutions may be substituted in lieu of these resolutions.

---

this corporation on deposit with it upon and according to the check of this corporation signed by ———.

Upon motion, duly made, seconded and carried, it was

RESOLVED, That The Corporation Trust Company as the resident agent of this corporation, in charge of the principal office in Delaware and of the books required by law to be kept in that office, and as the agent upon whom process against this corporation may be served shall act under the direction and supervision of counsel for this corporation in all matters arising out of or pertaining to such agency, including the forwarding of process served, official notices and communications, and all service bulletins covering report and tax requirements, and the secretary is hereby authorized to sign a certificate in accordance with this resolution.

Upon motion, duly made, seconded and carried, it was

RESOLVED, That an office of the corporation be established and maintained at ———, in the City of ———, State of ———, and that meetings of the board of directors from time to time may be held either at the principal office in Wilmington, Delaware, or at such office in the City of ——— or elsewhere, as the board of directors shall from time to time order.

FURTHER RESOLVED, That, until otherwise ordered, regular meetings of the board of directors be held at said office in the City of ———, on the ——— day of each month at —. M.

[Use the following when stock has par value.]

[CASH]

The president stated that he had received subscriptions to ——— shares of the capital stock of this corporation at ——— Dollars ($———) per share.

The treasurer thereupon stated that he had received the sum of ——— Dollars ($———) in full payment at par for the stock subscribed.

Upon motion, duly made, seconded and carried, the president and the ——— were authorized to issue to the said subscribers full paid and non-assessable stock of this corporation to the amount of their respective subscriptions.

[PROPERTY]

The president stated that an offer had been made to the corporation to transfer to it certain property in return for the issuance of stock. Said offer, of which the following is a copy, was presented and read to the meeting:

To ——— Company:

I hereby offer to transfer to ——— Company complete title in fact and of record free from lien or incumbrance, to the following described real (or personal) property, to wit: ————————————

————————————————————————————————

in exchange for ——— shares of the ——— stock, the total value at par of which is ——— Dollars ($———).

If this offer is accepted, the above mentioned ——— shares of the capital stock are to be issued to my order upon the delivery to your company of the proper instruments of transfer and conveyance of the above mentioned property.

Dated at ———, 19—.

————————. (Seal).

Upon motion, duly made, seconded and carried, the following preambles and resolutions were adopted:

Whereas, ——— has offered to transfer to this corporation in full payment for ——— shares of the capital stock of this corporation, to be issued to him or his nominees, property as follows: ———

---

and

Whereas, In the judgment of this board said property is necessary for the business of this corporation and is of a value at least equal to the par value of the stock demanded therefor;

Now, therefore, be it

RESOLVED, That the offer of said ——— to transfer to this corporation the property hereinbefore described, which said property the board of directors does hereby adjudge and declare to be the value of at least ——— Dollars ($———), and necessary for the business of this corporation, be and it is hereby accepted and that the ——— and ——— of this corporation be and they hereby are authorized and directed to execute and deliver, in the name and on behalf of this corporation and under its corporate seal, such agreement or agreements as may be necessary for the purchase of said property in accordance with said offer and that the officers of this corporation be and they hereby are further authorized and directed to issue to the order of said ———, or his nominees, certificates of full paid and non-assessable stock of this corporation for the shares provided to be issued by the foregoing resolutions upon transfer of said property to this corporation.

The president stated the foregoing {payment of cash / transfer of property} constituted a payment of at least the amount of capital stated in the certificate of incorporation as the amount of capital with which this corporation would commence business.

NOTE.—Consider necessity of qualifying in state where property is located before sale.

[Use the following when stock without par value is issued.]

[CASH]

Upon motion, duly made, seconded and carried, it was

RESOLVED, That ——— Dollars ($———) per share be fixed as the amount of consideration to be received by this corporation for ——— shares of ——— stock without par value.

The president thereupon stated that he had received subscriptions to ——— shares of the ——— stock of this corporation without par value at ——— Dollars ($———) per share.

The treasurer thereupon stated that he had received the sum of ——— Dollars ($———) in full payment for the foregoing shares without par value and, upon motion, duly made, seconded and carried, the officers of the corporation were authorized to issue to said subscribers full paid and non-assessable stock to the amount of their respective subscriptions.

Upon motion, duly made, seconded and carried, it was

RESOLVED, That the sum of ——— Dollars ($———) received in payment for the foregoing shares be declared part of the capital of this corporation.

[PROPERTY]

The president stated that an offer had been made to the corporation to transfer to it certain property in return for the issuance of stock. Said offer, of which the following is a copy, was presented and read to the meeting:

To ——— Company:

I hereby offer to transfer to ——— Company complete title in fact and of record free from lien or incumbrance, to the following described real (or personal) property, to wit: ——————————— in exchange for ——— shares of the stock of no par value of said corporation.

If this offer is accepted, the above mentioned shares of the capital stock are to be issued to my order upon the delivery to your Company of the proper instruments of transfer and conveyance of the above mentioned property.

Dated at ———, 19—.

———————. (Seal).

Upon motion, duly made, seconded and carried, the following preambles and resolutions were adopted:

Whereas, ——— has offered to transfer to this corporation in consideration of the issuance to him or his nominees of ——— (———) shares of stock of this corporation without par value, the following described property: ———————————

and

Whereas, In the judgment of this board of directors such property is necessary for the business of this corporation and a proper consideration for the issue of the shares of stock of this corporation without par value;

Now, therefore, be it

RESOLVED, That this corporation accept the offer of said ——— to transfer the above described property, which said property the board of directors hereby declares to be necessary for the business of this corporation and a proper consideration for the issue of ——— (———) shares of stock without par value.

FURTHER RESOLVED, That the officers of this corporation be and they hereby are authorized and directed to execute in the name and on behalf of this corporation and under its corporate seal such agreement or agreements as may be necessary for the acquisition of said property in accordance with said offer and that the officers of this corporation be and they hereby are authorized to issue to the said ——— or his nominees certificates of full paid and non-assessable stock of this corporation for the shares provided to be issued by the foregoing resolutions upon transfer of said property to this corporation.

Upon motion, duly made, seconded and carried, it was

RESOLVED, That the consideration received for the foregoing shares of stock without par value be declared part of the capital of this corporation, and the board of directors does hereby adjudge and declare the said property to be of the value of at least ——— Dollars ($———) for the purpose of determining the Federal Tax on the original issue of this stock and for all other purposes where a valuation must be given or set forth.

The president stated the foregoing {payment of cash / transfer of property} constituted a payment of at least the amount of capital stated in the certificate of incorporation as the amount of capital with which this corporation would commence business.

Upon motion, duly made, seconded and carried, it was

RESOLVED, That for the purpose of authorizing the corporation to do business in any state, territory or dependency of the United States or any foreign country in which it is necessary or expedient for this corporation to transact business, the proper officers of this corporation are hereby authorized to appoint and substitute all necessary agents or attorneys for service of process, to designate and change the location of all necessary statutory offices and, under the corporate seal, to make and file all necessary certificates, reports, powers of attorney and other instruments as may be required by the laws of such state, territory, dependency or country to authorize the corporation to transact business therein and whenever it is expedient for the corporation to cease doing business therein and withdraw therefrom, to revoke any appointment of agent or attorney for service of process, and to file such certificates, reports, revocation of appointment, or surrender of authority as may be necessary to terminate the authority of the corporation to do business in any such state, territory, dependency or country.

Upon motion, duly made, seconded and carried, it was

RESOLVED, That the treasurer be and he hereby is authorized to pay all fees and expenses incident to and necessary for the organization of the corporation.

Upon motion, duly made, seconded and carried, the meeting thereupon adjourned.

———————,
Secretary.

4. CORPORATE POWERS

NEW YORK GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

(EMPOWERING PROVISIONS)

§ 13. Limitation of powers; provisions of certificates of incorporation. 1. A corporation shall not possess or exercise any powers unless given by law, or necessary to the powers so given.

2. The certificate of incorporation of a corporation may contain any provision for the regulation of its business and the conduct of its affairs, and any limitation upon its powers, or upon the rights of its stockholders or upon the powers of its directors and members, which does not exempt them from the performance of any obligation or duty imposed by law.

§ 14. Grant of general powers. Every corporation as such has power, though not specified in the law under which it is incorporated:

1. To have succession for the period specified in its certificate of incorporation or by statute, and perpetually when no period is specified.

2. To have a common seal, and to alter the same at pleasure. The presence of the seal of a corporation on a written instrument purporting to be executed by authority of the corporation shall constitute a rebuttable presumption that the instrument was so executed.

3. To acquire property for the corporate purposes by grant, gift, purchase, devise or bequest, and to hold and to dispose of the same, subject to such limitations as may be prescribed by law.

4. To appoint such officers and agents as its business shall require, and to fix their compensation, and

5. To make by-laws, not inconsistent with law, for the management of its business, the regulation of its affairs, the transfer of its stock, if it has any, and the calling of meetings of its members. Such by-laws may also fix the amount of stock, in the case of stock corporations, or the number of members, in the case of non-stock corporations, which must be represented at meetings of the stockholders or members to constitute a quorum, unless otherwise provided by law. By-laws duly adopted at a meeting of the members of the corporation shall control the action of its directors except as therein otherwise provided. * * *

(C) DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

(EMPOWERING PROVISIONS)

Sec. 2. Powers:—Every corporation created under the provisions of this Chapter shall have power:

1. To have succession, by its corporate name, for the time stated in its Certificate of Incorporation, and when no period is limited, it shall be perpetual.

2. To sue and be sued, complain and defend in any court of law or equity.

3. To have a corporate seal, which may be altered at pleasure, and to use the same by causing it or a facsimile thereof to be impressed or affixed or reproduced or otherwise.

4. To hold, purchase and convey real and personal estate, and to mortgage or lease any such real and personal estate with its franchises; the power to hold real and personal estate, except in the case of religious corporations, shall include the power to take the same by devise or bequest.

5. To appoint such officers and agents as the business of the corporation shall require and to allow them suitable compensation.

6. To make by-laws not inconsistent with the Constitution or laws of the United States or of this State, fixing and altering the number of its directors for the management of its property, the regulation and government of its affairs and for the certification and transfer of its stock with penalties for the breach thereof not exceeding twenty dollars.

7. To wind up and dissolve itself or to be wound up and dissolved in the manner hereinafter mentioned.

8. To conduct business in this State, other States, the District of Columbia, the territories and colonies of the United States and in foreign countries, and have one or more offices out of this State, and to hold, purchase, mortgage and convey real and personal property both within and without this State.

9. To co-operate with other corporations and with natural persons in the creation and maintenance of community funds or of charitable, philanthropic, benevolent or patriotic instrumentalities conducive to public welfare, and its directors or trustees may appropriate and expend for those purposes such sum or sums as they deem expedient and as in their judgment will benefit or contribute to the protection of the corporate interests.

10. To indemnify any and all of its directors or officers or former directors or officers or any person who may have served at its request as a director or officer of another corporation in which it owns shares of capital stock or of which it is a creditor against expenses actually and necessarily incurred by them in connection with the defense of any action, suit or proceeding in which they, or any of them, are made parties, or a party, by reason of being or having been directors or officers or a director or officer of the corporation, or of such other corporation, except in relation to matters as to which any such director or officer or former director or officer or person shall be adjudged in such action, suit or proceeding to be liable for negligence or misconduct in the performance of duty. Such indemnification shall not be deemed exclusive of any other rights to which those indemnified may be entitled, under any by-law, agreement, vote of stockholders, or otherwise.

Sec. 3. Additional Powers:—In addition to the powers enumerated in the second section of this Chapter, every corporation, its officers, directors and stockholders, shall possess and exercise all the powers and privileges contained in this Chapter, and the powers expressly given in its charter or in its certificate under which it was incorporated, so far as the same are necessary or convenient to the attainment of the objects set forth in such charter or certificate of incorporation; and shall be governed by the provisions and be subject to the restrictions and liabilities in this Chapter contained, so far as the same are appropriate to and not inconsistent with such charter or Act under which such corporation was formed; and no corporation shall possess or exercise any other corporate powers, except such incidental powers as shall be necessary to the exercise of the power so given. * * *

NOTE

THE DOCTRINE OF "ULTRA VIRES"

The doctrine of corporate existence assumed that a corporation was a fictitious person, created by the state. Such powers as it had proceeded from state grant. If the corporation assumed to act outside the range of powers granted to it by the state, a nice legal question was at once raised. Could such acts have any legal results at all? The phrase "ultra vires" (beyond its power) was applied to action in this field. A vast literature of texts and judicial information was built up around this question. As will be seen, the subject is of far less practical importance today.

A confusion in the use of the phrase ought to be noted. "Ultra vires" applied to the acts of a corporation is accurately used where the corporation has acted in a field in which it is not empowered to act by its charter, or by applicable statute. The question would be raised, for instance, if a corporation organized under an old, special charter with power to own and operate a knitting mill, thereupon engaged in running a tavern; or where a corporation which by its charter was empowered to hold real estate to the value of $100,000 and not more undertook to purchase and hold real estate beyond that limitation.

A second, but fundamentally improper use of the phrase, has crept into the newer cases. Certain acts or policies are forbidden by law or inhibited by settled public policy. For instance, most laws forbid an ordinary business corporation to engage in banking operations—these being reserved to specialized types of corporations, supervised or regulated by the State or Federal government. Individuals as well as corporations may not enter this field without special authorization. Yet it is commonly said, where a corporation wrongfully enters such a field, that the action is ultra vires,—meaning not that it is beyond its power, but that it is doing something forbidden to it.

Still a third and likewise unjustified use of the phrase is involved where the corporation has full power to do the act in question, but to do it must proceed in a prescribed manner. For instance, a corporation may have power to increase its capital stock upon authorizing vote by the Board of Directors and appropriate vote by the shareholders at a meeting called for the purpose. If, as occurred in one case, the increase of stock was authorized by a minority of the Board of Directors, the resulting stock issue is sometimes loosely said to have been "ultra vires"—but the term is plainly misused.

Again, the phrase is sometimes used to cover action by a corporate officer who has engaged in transactions outside the scope of his authority; and it is occasionally said that such a transaction is "ultra vires" the officer—which is accurate enough but applies to a quite different situation.

This note deals only with the body of doctrine built up under the first group mentioned.

Early corporations did have grant of limited powers only. The limitations were dictated by a definite public policy. The state definitely feared that corporations would grow to anti-social size; or would, by engaging in many activities, monopolize economic life. Limitation of power was thus a definite and clear-cut attempt to impose social control on the new form of business organization. The conception was that limitation and control could be achieved by making corporate action impossible beyond the field of activity marked out for it by the state.

Present day corporation acts almost completely abandoned this conception. In practice, the "grant of powers" to the corporation consists of approving a corporate charter written by the attorneys for the incorporators; and the charter may include practically any powers and purposes which the incorporators or their counsel agree to write into their documents. Limitations appear by prohibition of entering certain fields; notably banking and public utilities. Naturally, lawyers who incorporate corporations today draw charters so broad that they permit any conceivable type of activity, aside from those fields specifically prohibited. But even there, the charters commonly include powers covering the subject matter. Thus, an ordinary commercial corporation is commonly authorized by its charter to borrow and loan money. If the corporation then went into the business of borrowing and lending money, it might find itself in the banking business and thus in a prohibited field; though, as a commercial corporation, it would have power to make an occasional loan in connection with its other business. At all events, when a true question of "ultra vires" is raised under a modern charter, it is generally a proof of poor draftsmanship on the part of the incorporating lawyers. The state of Ohio indeed threw overboard the entire doctrine by providing in its incorporation act that corporations should have all the powers of "natural persons" (§ 8623-8, Throckmorton's Ohio Code Annot. 1940) which effectively limits all questions of corporate power; leaving only the problem of ascertaining legal relationships and results where the corporation, exercising its admitted power, has done acts prohibited by law or contrary to settled public policy.

The literature and development of the doctrine of "ultra vires" is thus really the history of the long struggle of businessmen and business corporations against limitations imposed by early plans of social control. The struggle resulted in a substantially complete victory for the businessman and the corporation. The phases of it are interesting as history; may have practical importance where a lawyer finds himself dealing with an ancient charter; and in occasional cases where he is struggling with a badly drafted certificate of incorporation or an unusual set of circumstances.

In Sutton's Hospital Case, 10 Coke 23A, 30B (1613), it was held that a corporation by its mere existence impliedly had certain powers. These were (1) the power of continuing existence irrespective of death or withdrawal of members, (2) of legal existence permitting the corporation to sue and be sued, (3) of having a common seal, and so forth. Practically all corporation acts give these powers to a corporation by direct statutory provision. But Sutton's case introduced the idea: corporate powers could be "implied" as well as explicit; and this offered an intriguing possibility to lawyers seeking to enlarge the scope of activity of corporations acting under limited powers.

Early attacks on the limitation of powers did not deal with the effects of acts outside those powers, but with an endeavor to prove that, despite the expressed limitation, there were added powers "implied" by the limited grant. Enlargement of expressly granted powers in the twilight-zone of implication proceeded merrily. If the thing done could be regarded as reasonably incidental to the corporation's authorized business, there was power to carry on the "understood" as well as the expressed object. Romilly, M. R., in Lyle v. Eastern Bengal Railway, 36 Beav. 10, dealt with a corporation empowered to run a railroad which had also bought a coal mine and was briskly selling coal. The Master of the Rolls thought that the power to run a railroad impliedly included the power to own and operate a colliery, if the chief intent was to secure a cheaper supply of fuel; and if that was its chief intent, the railway could as a side business market coal. The Supreme Court of the United States in 1896 (Jacksonville, Mayport, Pablo Railway & Navigation Company v. Hooper, 160 U.S. 514, 16 S.Ct. 379.) held that a Florida Railroad corporation had power to engage in transactions "incidental or auxiliary" to its main business, and that it might include leasing and operation of resort hotels. To this process there is, of course, no logical end. If the resort business is incidental to a railroad business, the railroad corporation should not find great difficulty in discovering that the food and produce business was incidental in supplying its hotels; and so forth. In Dodge v. Ford Motor Company, 204 Mich. 459, 170 N.W. 668 (1919), the court conceded that building and operating a smelter was "incidental" to the business of manufacturing motor cars, and left open the question whether purchase of an iron mine might not likewise be incidental. The tide of such cases came to an end because in the early part of this century legislatures abandoned any real attempt to limit powers and made it easy to resolve views by writing the appropriate charter or by securing an amendment to existing charters.

As a result, when a problem of ultra vires is raised, the first recourse of the lawyer is to consider whether the activity or act complained of, though not specifically covered in a grant of power, may not be considered as "implied in" or "incidental or auxiliary to" the actual grant. And indeed, there is powerful logic behind this, though the logic is not that of the lawyer. Business activities are dynamic, and not static. Almost any enterprise in action will develop in unforeseeable directions. The businessman will perceive and follow a related opportunity. The technician will develop new and related processes. The public will demand additional and related services (for instance, that the electric light company shall also service and supply household appliances: Commonwealth of Pennsylvania ex rel. Thomas J. Baldridge v. The Philadelphia Electric Company, 300 Pa. 577, 151 A. 344, affirming 18 Pa. Corp. Rep. 243.). The bicycle garage designing the early motor vehicle insisted on growing into the huge automotive company; the chemical plant found itself carried by its technical staff out of the business of standard chemical supplies and into fields as divergent as plastic appliances and nylon stockings. Social control by limitation of corporate power met and was decisively defeated by the explosive technical and industrial development of the past century.

But there were cases in which, even with the developing doctrine of "implied and incidental" powers, the activity plainly could not be reconciled to the corporate grant. The corporation had in fact assumed to act outside the powers granted to it. Then the legal question was, what were the results of such activities:

(1) Was the corporation bound on a resulting contract or debt?

(2) Was the outsider bound to the corporation?

(3) If the transaction was completed, could either the corporation, the outsider, or a third party challenge or upset the transaction later?

Invariably the atmosphere of these cases was heavily laden against the strict application of the logic of ultra vires. Logically, it ought to be said that the corporation having no power in this field could not act at all; that no results could be produced; that the whole transaction was a nullity. Yet the fact was that something had happened: money was paid, goods delivered, agreements entered into, and so forth. The party, be it corporation or outsider, who invoked the doctrine was commonly endeavoring to escape from an obligation or transaction to the results of which, as a matter of ordinary commercial ethics, he ought to be bound. However perfect the logic, he presented no case for sympathy. In consequence we find courts struggling to uphold the transaction without denying its ultra vires quality, by building up a series of fictions of "estoppel" which really come to the proposition that courts, conceding the transaction was ultra vires, nevertheless deny to one or the other party the right to plead that fact as an element of recovery or defense. Thus an early New York case, Steam Navigation Company v. Weed, 17 Barb. (N.Y.) 378 (1853) held that only the corporation could plead ultra vires: it was not available to the other party as a defense. This probably is no longer law.

A second and somewhat later group of cases took the problem in detail. It is often said that the defense of ultra vires could not be admitted where the contract had been fully executed on one side: See 14A Corpus Juris 319, 19 C.J.S., Corporations, p. 430; Schlitz Brewing Company v. Missouri Poultry & Game Company, 287 Mo. 400, 229 S.W. 813 (1921).

But even where the contract is not "executed", and, as a companionate doctrine, that where the contract had been fully executed on both sides, no one could challenge the transaction except the state; though the holdings are not consistent.

Clearly there is a different rule which would prevail in either case where the contract or act is merely "beyond the powers" of a corporation, but is prohibited by statute or settled policy.

There is conflict of authority as to whether an ultra vires transaction is fully validated by the "stockholders". The general rule is that if all the stockholders have consented, the corporation is bound in the absence of objection by the state: though again this rule is not applied where the transaction is not only beyond the powers, but is actually prohibited.

The doctrine of ultra vires thus has been cut down to a point at which it commonly can apply only to fully executory contracts; and even there cases are not wanting in which a contract at least partially executory is upheld: Mutual Life Insurance Company v. Stephens, 214 N.Y. 488, 108 N.E. 856 (1915).

A modern corporation does not have limited powers; where it acts ultra vires, the usual reason is bad draftsmanship on the part of the lawyer drawing the certificate of incorporation. Where a corporation is prevented from including certain powers (for instance, the power to conduct banking operations) and therefore does not include such powers in its charter, there is involved, usually, not only the fact that the corporation does not have a grant of power to conduct the operation but also a positive prohibition against conducting it contained in some statute or settled policy of the state.

"Ultra vires" was the result of an attempt to limit the corporation as a matter of social policy. It failed: corporations today are substantially unlimited. There remains merely the occasional case which may occur in a lawyer's practice. A student should know that the problem exists, and the outlines of the huge body of case material dealing with it, so that he can deal with the unusual case should it arise. But ultra vires, once the principal preoccupation of corporation lawyers, is today confined to the occasional anachronism which one finds where an ancient corporate charter has been carried forward from an earlier year.

Problems arising out of lack of corporate power because the state has prohibited action are, of course, not unusual. But the rules are far more likely to be those applying to contracts contrary to public policy than rules merely relating to the lack of corporate power.

The decisions which follow indicate the chief areas in which the doctrine of ultra vires is still important.

BRINSON v. MILL SUPPLY CO., INC.

Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1941. 219 N.C. 498, 14 S.E.2d 505.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County.

Affirmed.

Civil action instituted by W. T. Brinson in behalf of himself and all the stockholders and creditors of The Mill Supply Company against The Mill Supply Company, alleging insolvency and seeking the appointment of a receiver and the liquidation of the corporation.

When the original action came on to be heard on the motion for the appointment of a receiver, E. F. Smallwood was appointed receiver and placed in charge of the assets of the defendant corporation to the end that the corporation might be liquidated and the assets applied to the payment of creditors.

The claimant, Laura H. Harvey, executrix of the last will and testament of Harriet L. Hyman, filed claim with the receiver in the amount of $2,318.97, representing the balance due on a note in the sum of $5,000, executed by Albert F. Patterson, who was, at the time of the execution thereof, president of the defendant company. The facts in respect thereto are as follows:

On March 14, 1931, Albert F. Patterson borrowed from Harriet L. Hyman the sum of $5,000, evidenced by his note which, under the terms thereof, was payable in stipulated monthly instalments. Fifty shares of the capital stock of The Mill Supply Company was deposited with the payee as collateral security and the note contained the stipulation "that upon payment of the sum of $1,000 on the principal of this note that $1,000 of the par value of said stock shall be released to the maker of this note and upon payment of each subsequent $1,000 a like amount of collateral shall be released to the maker.

"The payment of this note is guaranteed by The Mill Supply Company in accordance with a separate contract of guaranty of even date herewith executed by The Mill Supply Company."

On April 2, 1931, A. F. Patterson, president, and the secretary of the defendant corporation, executed, in the name of the corporation, a contract of guaranty of said note, which contract of guaranty was executed pursuant to a resolution duly adopted by the executive committee, March 14, 1931. This contract contains a similar stipulation to the effect that upon the payment of $1,000 upon the principal of the note, $1,000 par value of the stock deposited as collateral is to be released to A. F. Patterson, the maker.

The executive committee in adopting the resolution authorizing the execution of the contract of guaranty acted by virtue of a resolution of the board of directors vesting it, during the interim between meetings of the board, "with the same power and authority as is vested in the Board of Directors and by any act of said committee taken between the meetings of the Board of Directors shall be as equally binding on the company as though said action had been taken by the Board of Directors".

The receiver denied the claim and the claimant appealed to the Superior Court. Upon hearing in the Superior Court the judge found the facts and concluded that the contract of guaranty was ultra vires. It thereupon adjudged that the claimant recover nothing of the receiver. The claimant excepted and appealed.

BARNHILL, JUSTICE. Was the act of the officers of the defendant corporation, in authorizing and executing the contract of guaranty, ultra vires as contended by the receiver? The court below so concluded. In this conclusion we concur.

For a contract executed by the officer of a corporation to be binding on the corporation it must appear that (1) it was incidental to the business of the corporation; or (2) it was expressly authorized; and (3) it was properly executed.

The charter of the defendant corporation vests it with general authority to acquire, own, mortgage, sell and otherwise deal in real estate, chattels and chattels real without limit as to amount; to deal in mortgages, notes, shares of capital stock and other securities; to acquire the good will, rights, property and assets of all kinds and to undertake the whole or any part of the liabilities of any person, firm, association or corporation, and to pay for the same in cash, stock, bonds, debentures, notes or other securities of this corporation, or otherwise; to purchase or acquire its own capital stock from time to time to such an extent and in such manner and upon such terms as its board of directors shall determine; to borrow or raise money for any purpose of its incorporation, and to issue its bonds, notes or other obligations for money so borrowed, or in payment of or in exchange for, any real or personal property or rights of franchises acquired or other value received by the corporation and to secure such obligations by pledge or mortgage; and "to do all and everything necessary, suitable, convenient or proper for the accomplishment of any of the purposes, or the attainment of any one or more of the objects herein enumerated, or incident to the power herein named, or which shall at any time appear conducive or expedient for the protection or benefit of the corporation, either as holders of or interest in, any property, or otherwise; with all the powers now or hereafter conferred by the laws of North Carolina upon corporations." There are other powers granted which are in nowise pertinent to the question here presented.

The powers thus granted do not expressly authorize the corporation to issue accommodation paper or to guarantee the obligations of a third party.

It is true that in a letter addressed to the payee of the note the treasurer of the defendant corporation recited the conditions of the note, including the provision in respect to the surrender of the collateral, and says in the letter that such stock "shall be released and turned over to The Mill Supply Company, free and discharged of the lien of said note." But this letter was merely one of transmittal. It constitutes no part of the contract. The guaranty enclosed, as well as the note, which together form the contract, provides that such stock, on compliance with the condition, is to be surrendered to the maker A. F. Patterson. Furthermore, there is no evidence tending to show that any of the stock was ever delivered to the corporation. Hence the contract was not a method adopted for the purchase by the defendant of its own stock as authorized by its charter. Claimant's contention in that respect cannot be sustained.

The provision in the charter authorizing the corporation "to undertake the whole or any part of the liabilities of any person, firm, association or corporation and to pay for the same in cash, stock, bonds, debentures, notes or other securities of this corporation or otherwise" is in connection with, related to and a part of the power granted "to acquire the good will, rights, property and assets of all kinds of any other person", etc. The power granted is the power to assume the liabilities of such firm or corporation whose rights, property and assets are acquired by the corporation. This provision may not be construed to mean that the corporation was vested with power to issue accommodation paper or to become guarantor upon the obligation of a third party.

The contract of guaranty was no part of a transaction in which the corporation was borrowing or raising money for the purposes of its incorporation. It was clearly and exclusively an act in aid and for the accommodation of its president as an individual. From it the corporation received no benefit.

Hence, it appears that the undertaking of the corporation was not directly "necessary, suitable, convenient or proper for the accomplishment of" either of these or of any other purpose authorized by the charter.

Was the contract of guaranty incidental to or in furtherance of the powers expressly granted? If not, it was ultra vires and unenforceable.

A corporation is an artificial being, created by the State, for the attainment of certain defined purposes, and, therefore, vested with certain specific powers and others fairly and reasonably to be inferred or implied from the express powers and the object of the creation. Acts falling without that boundary are unwarranted—ultra vires. * * *

Ordinarily, the power to endorse or guarantee the payment of negotiable instruments for the benefit of a third party is not within the implied powers conferred upon a private business corporation.

The general rule is that no corporation has the power, by any form of contract or endorsement, to become a guarantor or surety or otherwise lend its credit to another person or corporation. 19 C.J.S., Corporations, p. 917, § 1230, and numerous authorities cited in note 14; 7 Fletcher on Corps. 647; 7 R.C.L. 675.

In the absence of express statutory authorization, a corporation has no implied power to lend its credit to another by issuing or endorsing bills or notes for his accommodation, where the transaction is not related to the business activity authorized by its charter as a necessary or usual incident thereto. 14A C.J. 732, sec. 2781, 19 C.J.S., Corporations, p. 914, § 1228.

A corporation is without implied power to guarantee for accommodation the contract of its customers with third persons on the ground that it may thus stimulate its own business. Such use of its credit is clearly beyond the power of an ordinary business corporation. Bowman Lumber Co. v. Pierson, 110 Tex. 543, 221 S.W. 930, 11 A.L.R. 547; North Side R. Co. v. Worthington, 88 Tex. 562, 30 S.W. 1055, 53 Am.St.Rep. 778. It has no authority to use its credit for the benefit of a stockholder or officer. Hunter v. Garanflo, 246 Mo. 131, 151 S.W. 741; First Sav. & T. Co. v. Romadka, 7 Cir., 216 F. 113, 132 C.C.A. 357.

A claim of the holder of promissory notes made by an officer of a corporation against the corporation as accommodation endorser thereon, which endorsement was authorized by the stockholders, is not provable against the corporation in subsequent bankruptcy proceedings, In re Amdur Shoe Co., D.C., 13 F.2d 147.

Trustees of Charlotte Tp. v. Piedmont Realty Co., 134 N.C. 41, 46 S.E. 723, and other cases to the same effect, holding that where the contract is executed by the other party to the contract and the corporation has received the benefit thereof it is estopped from setting up the defense that it was ultra vires, are not in point.

The question here presented is not whether there was sufficient consideration to support the note. The question is, Was there sufficient consideration moving to the corporation to support the contract of guaranty? The liability of the individual upon the note (which was not signed by the corporation) is not contested. It is the liability of the corporation which is at issue. Hence, the rule that where the corporation has received the benefits under a contract which is not incidental, it will be held liable under the doctrine of estoppel, for the reason that it should not be permitted to accept and retain the benefits and at the same time disavow the contract on the plea of ultra vires, has no application. It is when the corporation has received the full benefit of the contract that it will not be relieved of liability because the contract was ultra vires. Farmers Atlantic Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 198 N.C. 477, 152 S.E. 403; Indiana Quarries Co. v. Angier Bank & Trust Co., 190 N.C. 277, 129 S.E. 619. See also Cameron County Lumber Co. v. Al & Lloyd Parker, Inc., 122 Tex. 487, 62 S.W.2d 63; Brand v. Eastland County Lumber Co., Tex.Civ.App., 77 S.W.2d 600; 14A C.J. 329 note 16, 19 C.J.S., Corporations, § 977, note 73. This rule does not impose liability upon the corporation when no benefit has accrued to it by reason of its contract—here the contract of guaranty.

"If it shall be found that the notes were executed by the president of defendant corporation, not in pursuance of or as an incident of the corporate business, wholly without consideration or benefit of any kind to the corporation, then such execution and delivery of the notes would be an ultra vires act". Lentz v. Johnson & Sons, Inc., 207 N. C. 614, 178 S.E. 226, 228, and cases cited. Commissioners of Brunswick v. Bank of Southport, 196 N.C. 198, 145 S.E. 227.

The contract of guaranty was executed for the benefit of an individual. No part of the consideration moved to the defendant corporation. It was not either expressly or impliedly authorized by its charter to enter into contracts for the accommodation of a third party. To permit the payment of the claim would clearly result in an invasion of the assets of the defendant corporation in the hands of the receiver as a trust fund for the payment of legitimate creditors. See 7 R.C.L. 198. The defendant's plea of ultra vires must be sustained.

The judgment below is affirmed.

JACKSONVILLE, M. P. RY. & NAV. CO. v. HOOPER et al.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1896. 160 U.S. 514, 16 S.Ct. 379.

In the circuit court of the United States for the Northern district of Florida, on the 4th day of December, 1889, Mary J. Hooper, Henry H. Hooper, her husband, and William F. Porter, for the use of said Mary J. Hooper, citizens of the state of Ohio, brought an action against the Jacksonville, Mayport, Pablo Railway & Navigation Company, a corporation of the state of Florida. The plaintiffs' amended declaration set up causes of action arising out of the covenants contained in a certain indenture of lease between the parties. This lease, dated July 10, 1888, purported to grant, for a term of two years, certain lots of land situated at a place called "Burnside," in Duval county, Fla., whereon was erected an hotel known as the "San Diego Hotel." In consideration of this grant, the railroad company agreed to pay, in monthly installments, a yearly rent of $800, and to keep the premises insured in the sum of $6,000.

It was alleged that on November 28, 1889, during said term, and while the railway company was in possession, the hotel and other buildings were wholly destroyed by fire; that the defendant had failed and neglected to have the same insured; and that there was an arrearage of rent due amounting to the sum of $106.67. For the amount of the loss occasioned by the absence of insurance, and for the back rent, the action was brought.

The defendant denied that the railway company had duly executed the instrument sued on; denied that Alexander Wallace, the president of the company, and who had executed the lease as such president, had any authority from the company so to do. The defendant also alleged that such a lease, even if formally executed, was ultra vires; also, that the covenant to insure was an impossible covenant, as shown by ineffectual efforts to secure such insurance.

The case was tried in April, 1891, and resulted in a verdict and judgment against the defendant in the sum of $6,798.70. On errors assigned to certain rulings of the court and in the charge to the jury, the case was brought to this court.

MR. JUSTICE SHIRAS, after stating the facts in the foregoing language, delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

It is, however, further claimed that the contract sued on was not within the legitimate powers of the company.

This is not a case in which, either by its charter or by some statute binding upon it, the company is forbidden to make such a contract. Indeed, the public laws of Florida, referring to the powers of railroad companies, provide that every such corporation shall be empowered "to purchase, hold, and use all such real estate and other property as may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of its road and canal and the stations and other accommodations necessary to accomplish the objects of its incorporation, and to sell, lease, or buy any land or real estate not necessary for its use." McClel. Dig. Laws Fla. p. 278, § 10. They are likewise authorized "to erect and maintain all convenient buildings, wharves, docks, stations, fixtures, and machinery for the accommodation and use of their passengers and freight business."

Although the contract power of railroad companies is to be deemed restricted to the general purposes for which they are designed, yet there are many transactions which are incidental or auxiliary to its main business, or which may become useful in the care and management of the property which it is authorized to hold, and in the safety and comfort of the passengers whom it is its duty to transport.

Courts may be permitted, where there is no legislative prohibition shown, to put a favorable construction upon such exercise of power by a railroad company as is suitable to promote the success of the company, within its chartered powers, and to contribute to the comfort of those who travel thereon. To lease and maintain a summer hotel at the seaside terminus of a railroad might obviously increase the business of the company and the comfort of its passengers, and be within the provisions of the statute of Florida above cited, whereby a railroad company is authorized "to sell, lease, or buy any land or real estate not necessary for its use," and to "erect and maintain all convenient buildings * * * for the accommodation and use of their passengers."

Courts may well be astute in dealing with efforts of corporations to usurp powers not granted them, or to stretch their lawful franchises against the interests of the public. Nor would we be understood to hold that, in a clear case of the exercise of a power forbidden by its charter or contrary to public policy, a railroad company would be estopped to decline to be bound by its own act, even when fulfilled by the other contracting party. Davis v. Railroad Co., 131 Mass. 258; Thomas v. Railroad Co., 101 U.S. 71; Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Palace Car Co., 139 U.S. 24, 11 S.Ct. 478. So, too, it must be regarded as well settled, on the soundest principles of public policy, that a contract by which a railroad company seeks to render itself incapable of performing its duties to the public, or attempts to absolve itself from its obligation without the consent of the state, is void, and cannot be rendered enforceable by the doctrines of estoppel. Railroad Co. v. Winans, 17 How. 30; Thomas v. Railroad Co., 101 U.S. 71; Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman Car Co., 139 U.S. 24, 11 S.Ct. 478.

We do not seek to relax, but rather to affirm, the rule laid down by this court, in Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman Car Co. (above cited), that "a contract of a corporation which is ultra vires, in the proper sense,—that is to say, outside the object of its creation, as defined in the law of its organization,—and therefore beyond the powers conferred upon it by the legislature, is not voidable only, but wholly void, and of no legal effect. The objection to the contract is not merely that the corporation ought not to have made it, but that it could not make it. Such a contract cannot be ratified by either party, because it could not have been authorized by either. No performance on either side can give the unlawful contract any validity, or be the foundation of any right of action upon it." 139 U.S. 59, 60, 11 S.Ct. 478.

But we think the present case falls within the language of Lord Chancellor Selborne in Attorney General v. Great Eastern Ry. Co., 5 App.Cas. 478, where, while declaring his sense of the importance of the doctrine of ultra vires, he said: "This doctrine ought to be reasonably, and not unreasonably, understood and applied; and that whatever may fairly be regarded as incidental to, or consequential upon, those things which the legislature has authorized, ought not, unless expressly prohibited, to be held, by judicial construction, to be ultra vires." In the application of the doctrine, the court must be influenced somewhat by the special circumstances of the case. As was said by Romilly, M. R., in Lyde v. Railway Co., 36 Beav. 10, where was in question the validity of a contract by a railway company to work a coal mine: "The answer to the question appears to me to depend upon the facts of each particular case. If, in truth, the real object of the colliery was to supply the railway with cheaper coals, it would be proper to allow the accidental additional profit of selling coal to others; but, if the principal object of the colliery was to undertake the business of raising and selling coals, then it would be a perversion of the funds of the company, and a scheme which ought not to be permitted, however profitable it might appear to be. The prohibition or permission to carry on this trade would depend on the conclusions which the court drew from the evidence."

The principle upon which we may safely rule the present question is within the case of Brown v. Winnisimmet Co., 11 Allen, 326. There a contract, made by the treasurer of a ferry company, to lease one of the company's boats for a certain money consideration, was alleged to be void for want of antecedent authority given by the company to the treasurer, and also because such a contract was not made in the legitimate exercise of the company's powers. On the first point it was ruled that, from evidence showing ratification by the company, it was proper for the jury to infer that the treasurer had been duly authorized to make the contract, and, disposing of the second question, the court, through Chief Justice Bigelow, said: "We know of no rule or principle by which an act creating a corporation for certain specific objects, or to carry on a particular trade or business, is to be strictly construed as prohibitory of all other dealings or transactions not coming within the exact scope of those designated. Undoubtedly, the main business of a corporation is to be confined to that class of operations which properly appertain to the general purposes for which its charter was granted. But it may also enter into and engage in transactions which are auxiliary or incidental to its main business, which may become necessary, expedient, or profitable in the care and management of the property which it is authorized to hold under the act by which it was created." See, also, Davis v. Railroad Co., 131 Mass. 258, 272.

The contract between the parties hereto was for leasing an hotel at the terminus of the railroad, situated at a beach, distant from any town. If not fairly within the authority granted by the statute of Florida "to erect and maintain all convenient buildings * * * for the accommodation and use of their passengers," it certainly cannot be said to have been forbidden by such laws. Nor can it be said to have been, in its nature, contrary to public policy.

To maintain cheap hotels or eating houses, at stated points, on a long line of railroad through a wilderness, as in the case of the Pacific railroads, or at the end of a railroad on a barren, unsettled beach, as in the present case, not for the purpose of making money out of such business, but to furnish reasonable and necessary accommodations to its passengers and employés, would not be so plainly an act outside of the powers of a railroad company as to compel a court to sustain the defense of ultra vires, as against the other party to such a contract.

But, even if the railroad company might be answerable for the rent of the premises, it is contended that the covenant to procure insurance was so far outside of the company's powers as not to be enforceable.

No one could deny that it would not be competent for a railroad company, without the authority of the legislature, to carry on an insurance business. But this covenant to keep the premises insured is correlative to the obligation of the lessors to rebuild in case the hotel should be destroyed by fire, and to the provision that, in such an event, the rents should cease until the hotel should be put in habitable condition and repair by the lessors. Such mutual covenants are quite usual in leases of this kind, and are merely incidental to the principal purpose of the contract. * * *

* * * The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA ex rel. THOMAS J BALDRIDGE, Attorney General v. THE PHILADELPHIA ELECTRIC COMPANY.

Court of Common Pleas of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia County, 1929. 18 Pa. Corp. Rep. 243; affirmed, 300 Pa. 557, 151 A. 344.

BY THE COURT, June 7, 1929:

This case was tried by the Court without a jury.

It is a quo warranto proceeding, wherein the suggestion is made that the respondent, The Philadelphia Electric Company, has exercised powers and franchises that are not within the corporate grant, or incidental or auxiliary thereto.

A petition was addressed to the Attorney General by the Merchant & Evans Company, averring that the sale by the respondent of certain electrical appliances was not within the latter's corporate powers. The Attorney General permitted the use of the name of the Commonwealth.

Findings of Fact

From the pleadings and the proofs we find the facts to be as follows:

1. The respondent, The Philadelphia Electric Company, is a corporation incorporated under the laws of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania on October 27, 1902, for the purpose of "supplying light, heat and power by electricity to the public in the city and county of Philadelphia, and to such persons, partnerships and corporations residing therein or adjacent thereto as may desire the same."

2. Electricity is a commodity which can only be used through the medium of some sort of an appliance and before it can be successfully sold prospective customers must necessarily be supplied with appliances which in one form or another consume electricity.

3. During the entire period of its corporate existence it has been the practice of the respondent in common with practically all other electric light, heat and power companies throughout the Commonwealth, to merchandise and sell electrical appliances as a part and branch of its business incidental to the development of its business generally, and this practice of respondent and others has always been considered to be an important and essential incident to the continued growth and success of respondent's main corporate purpose of supplying electricity to the public.

4. The appliances so merchandised and sold by the respondent include, inter alia, such devices as vacuum cleaners, washing machines, electric refrigerators, curling-irons, heaters, sewing machines, hair dryers, heating pads, bread mixers, percolators, toasters, grills, waffle irons, dish washers, ranges, fans and radios.

5. Respondent added electrical refrigerators to its general line of appliances more than eleven years ago, and until the commencement of the present proceeding the Commonwealth never questioned respondent's corporate right to do so.

6. Respondent has eleven branch offices or places of business in its territory where these appliances are demonstrated and offered for sale in connection with the business of selling electric current at these branch offices.

7. These safe appliances, including specifically electric refrigerators, are also being continually and generally sold throughout the respondent's territory by the manufacturers thereof, as well as by department and other stores in direct competition with respondent.

8. It has been found that the efforts of the respondent in popularizing and demonstrating these appliances has resulted in a considerable benefit to other distributors and dealers in such appliances.

9. The volume of merchandising business thus done by respondent itself amounts to approximately only five per cent of respondent's entire business, and the volume of respondent's business in the sale of electric refrigerators amounts to approximately only one per cent of its said entire business.

10. The primary object of respondent in merchandising electrical appliances is to stimulate in every proper way a demand for the use and consumption of electric current which in turn promotes the respondent's business generally by increasing the sale of such current.

11. An increase in the respondent's sales of electric current is a distinct advantage to the customer because in its final effect such increase produces and makes possible a lower energy cost rate to the customer.

12. One of the duties of respondent, essential to its continued success in business, is to maintain a thoroughly satisfactory service to its customers and the nature of the commodity sold is such that this involves from a practical standpoint the maintenance in good condition of the appliances on its lines.

13. This present action was initiated by the Attorney General only after the filing with him of a petition for the institution of same by Merchant & Evans Company, a private corporation engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling a certain kind of electric refrigerator which is not one of the kinds sold by respondent.

Discussion

The plaintiff correctly states the general propositions of law which govern the case: A Pennsylvania corporation cannot engage in any business except that expressly authorized by its charter, and has no powers except those which are necessary to enable it to carry out an express grant. Penna. R. R. v. Canal Commissions, 21 Pa. 9; Solar Electric Co.'s Appeal, 290 Pa. 156, 138 A. 845; Bangor Electric Co.'s Petition, 295 Pa. 228, 145 A. 128; Article XVI, Section 6, Constitution of Pennsylvania.

This being the conceded rule, the problem we face is the interpretation of the respondent's grant.

This was: That it be incorporated "for the purpose of supplying heat, light and power by electricity to the public."

This grant was made in 1902 and the phrase used was no doubt intended to include, in a general way, all of the conveniences that could be produced by the use of the electric current. The relator's objections do not raise any question arising out of any particular use, but they dispute the right of the respondent to do anything more than supply electric current, and particularly they dispute its right to engage in merchandising the devices needed for converting electricity.

This interpretation, however, runs counter to the express language of the grant, which is not a power to "supply electricity," but certain things produced by electricity. Far from preventing the Company from dealing in the converting devices needed, it would be our inclination to insist that it is part of its duty to furnish them to its customers. It is unimportant whether the converting device is supplied separately, by means of a sale or a bailing and a charge specially made for it, or whether the bill rendered the customer for the service includes also the use of the converting device.

A grant very similar to the one before us was passed upon by the Supreme Court in the case of Malone v. The Lancaster Gas Light Company, in 182 Pa. 309, 37 A. 932. The company in that case, as the name indicates, was a gas company. There is a close analogy between the supply of heat, light and power by electricity and their supply by means of gas. Both gas and electricity are useless until they are converted into some form of activity, and for this in both cases mechanical devices are needed.

In Malone v. The Lancaster Gas Light Company, the grant was "for the purpose of manufacturing and supplying illuminating and heating gas."

Plaintiff's counsel is not correct in his brief in saying that the company in the case cited "was chartered to supply light and heat." The power was to supply gas.

If the Lancaster Company had been chartered to supply light and heat by means of gas, the analogy of the two charters would be complete. Yet, notwithstanding the fact that the express words of the Lancaster grant were only "to supply gas," the Supreme Court held that it "might not only supply gas itself, but may also incidentally deal in such appliances and conveniences as will induce new customers to use gas or old ones to use more." "It is argued for plaintiff," said Mr. Justice Mitchell, "that the charter purpose of the gas company is limited by the words 'manufacturing and supplying illuminating and heating gas,' and that nothing can be included which it (sic) not a necessary part or appliance for manufacturing or supplying. This is too narrow and literal a construction, and overlooks the fundamental object of the corporation, the manufacture and supply of gas to customers for profit. It would be no use to manufacture gas if there were not customers to buy, and hence the company may fairly supply not only the gas itself, but incidentally such appliances as will induce new customers to use gas, and old customers to use more."

It is plain that the instant case is much stronger for the respondent than the case cited, because in the latter the power was to "supply gas," while here it is to supply certain conveniences "by means of electricity." As we have pointed out, this must include the supply of any device that will be needed to turn electricity into the convenience desired.

It is not wandering too far afield to point out, and it appears in the proofs, that in 1902 the industry in which the respondent was and still is engaged, was comparatively new. The public had not been educated with regard to the multitude of conveniences which the electric current will supply. To furnish the housekeeper with the electric current alone would have resulted in neither profit to the company nor convenience to the customer. What the latter wanted, and what the Legislature intended to grant when it authorized the respondent to furnish light, heat and power by electricity, was something more than furnishing the customer with the end of an insulated copper wire, that he did not know how to use, or had not the appliances to use. It was intended that he should have and the company should furnish the conveniences that could be obtained by the use of the electric current.

For these reasons we come to the following

Conclusions of Law

1. The sale by respondent of electrical refrigerators and other electrical appliances is in furtherance of its main corporate purpose of "supplying light, heat and power by electricity to the public," in the territory covered by respondent's charter.

2. A verdict and judgment thereon should be entered in favor of the respondent.

JOSEPH SCHLITZ BREWING COMPANY v. MISSOURI POULTRY & GAME COMPANY et al.

Supreme Court of Missouri, 1921. 287 Mo. 400, 229 S.W. 813.

Action by the Joseph Schlitz Brewing Company against the Missouri Poultry & Game Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants and plaintiff both appeal. Affirmed.

JAMES T. BLAIR, J. Plaintiff is a Wisconsin corporation which formerly brewed and sold beer. Defendant Missouri Poultry & Game Company is a Missouri corporation. In August, 1905, F. W. Brockman went to Milwaukee and orally agreed with plaintiff to purchase beer from it; that he would form a corporation for that purpose; that he would go into the business and finance it, furnish a bond signed by himself and August Gehner, and in due time notify plaintiff when to commence shipping its product. On August 26, 1905, the bond was signed. * * *

I. The total amount of beer sold to the Poultry & Game Company was very large. The gross amount billed during one month, which, it seems, is illustrative of the business done, was over $14,000. The net price was over $6,300. The balance sued for probably represents the net due for the last few weeks before the notice of termination was given by plaintiff. It is not contended the sale of beer was illegal at that time nor that it ran counter to the then public policy. It is argued the contract to purchase was ultra vires of the Poultry & Game Company. The charter of that company, as incorporated in 1893, disclosed it was then incorporated to deal in dressed poultry, game, and country produce. The representation as to the formation of a corporation in 1905 seems to have been untrue. The charter does not expressly invalidate transactions outside the charter powers. St. Louis Drug Co. v. Robinson, 81 Mo. loc. cit. 26. The contract has been fully executed by plaintiff. The Poultry & Game Company has received and had full benefit of the shipments of beer represented by the sued for balance.

With respect to estoppel to plead ultra vires to a contract fully executed on one side defendants rely upon the federal rule, in the main. This court and the Courts of Appeals of this state long since adopted the rule in force in most of the states which we said in Millinery Co. v. Trust Co., 251 Mo. loc. cit. 579, 158 S.W. 359, had been tersely stated by Rombauer, P. J., in Winscott v. Inv. Co., 63 Mo.App. loc. cit. 369, to be that:

"The defense of ultra vires is not admissible where the contract has been fully executed on one side, unless it is a contract expressly prohibited by law." * * *

In Anglo-American Land, M. & A. Co. v. Lombard, 132 F. loc. cit. 741 et seq., 68 C.C.A. 89, the United States Circuit Court of Appeals was considering an executory feature of the contract before it when it discussed the rule in this state. The court said:

"Of course, the present question is whether the Missouri company's acquisition of the stock of the Kansas company and the incurrence of the stockholder's liability, which is inseparable from ownership of the stock—a liability which has not been discharged and remains an executory obligation—was void in toto or only voidable; in other words, whether the act of a corporation which is not within the scope of its corporate powers, and is therefore prohibited [citations], can have or be given the effect of placing upon the corporation an enforceable executory obligation." 132 F. loc. cit. 742, 68 C.C.A. 89.

It is clear this was understood in the case of Millinery Co. v. Trust Co., supra, and that the case was not given approval as authority for the broad doctrine it is here contended it announced. In fact, in the Millinery Co. Case the exact contrary was expressly stated to be the rule in this state.

It is argued the provisions of section 9749, R.S.1919, and section 7 of article 12 of the Constitution of the state to the effect that "no corporation shall engage in business other than that expressly authorized in its charter or the law under which it may have been or may hereafter be organized" preclude a holding that defendants are estopped to set up that the contract in this case was ultra vires of the Poultry & Game Company. The provisions quoted were in existence at the time the cited decisions of this court were made, and the doctrine of estoppel has been applied when the constitutional provision mentioned was before the court. Summet v. Realty & Brokerage Co., 208 Mo. loc. cit. 512, 513, 106 S.W. 614. In fact, the violation of some restriction upon the exertion of power by a corporation is the essence of ultra vires action. It would be strange if this court and the Courts of Appeals would so often apply the doctrine of estoppel in the face of the provisions quoted if their effect is to render that doctrine inapplicable in this state. Such is not the case. The question is one often decided. Those provisions but incorporate the applicable common law, which is that corporations are restricted to the powers given by their charters. The exception to the general rule of estoppel made in case a charter or provision of law "expressly" prohibits the making of a contract by a corporation cannot be grounded upon the common law or provisions declaratory of it, as are those quoted. The question under these same Missouri provisions was discussed by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for this circuit in St. Avit v. Kettle River Co., 216 F. loc. cit. 875, 876, 133 C.C.A. 76, and a conclusion adverse to appellants' present claim was reached. In National Bank v. Matthews, 98 U.S. loc. cit. 629, 25 L. Ed. 190, the record under review was that of this court in Matthews v. Skinker et al., 62 Mo. 329, 21 Am.Rep. 425. In one paragraph of its opinion the Supreme Court of the United States assumed the correctness of the holding of this court that a deed of trust acquired by a national bank by the purchase of the note it secured was thereby brought within section 5137, U.S.R.S.1899 (13 Stat. 99 [Comp.St. § 9674]), which prohibited a national bank from holding "the possession of any real estate under mortgage," but nevertheless held the debtor could not be heard to say the security was unenforceable because ultra vires of the bank. * * * The judgment of this court in that case was reversed. In Michigan a statute provided that the articles of association should state "the purpose or purposes for which the corporation is formed, and it shall not be lawful for said corporation to divert its operations or appropriate its funds to any other purpose, except as hereinafter provided." Pub.Acts 1885, No. 232, § 2. It was held (Butterworth & Lowe v. Milling Co., 115 Mich. loc. cit. 3, 72 N.W. 990) that a transgression of this prohibition might subject the offending corporation to action by the state "or other appropriate proceeding," but did not prevent the application of the doctrine of estoppel to contracts ultra vires of the corporation. In Texas a statute provided:

"No corporation created under the provisions of this title shall employ its stock, means, * * * or other property, directly or indirectly, for any other purpose * * * than to accomplish the legitimate objects of its creation." Rev.St.1879, art. 589.

A corporation organized to manufacture and vend cotton and woolen goods loaned money to one Bond and took his note. When sued, Bond pleaded ultra vires. After approving the general rule that the execution by one party to an ultra vires contract estops the other to plead ultra vires as a defense, the court (Bond v. Mfg. Co., 82 Tex. loc. cit. 313, 18 S.W. 693) dealt with the question of the effect of the quoted statute as follows:

"It is true that a distinction is made between the act of a corporation which is merely without authority and one which is illegal. In the one case, it is a question of authority; in the other, of legality. A corporate act becomes illegal when committed in violation of an express statute on a specific subject, or when it is malum in se or malum prohibitum, or when it is against public policy. Beach on Priv. Corp. § 438; Taylor on Priv. Corp. §§ 293–295. If, therefore, the transaction here engaged in by appellee was * * * beyond its powers, but was also illegal, in the sense stated, the contention of appellants should prevail. It will be noted that article 589, * * * is a general statute. It is merely declaratory of the common law, by which corporations are strictly confined in their powers to the limits and fixed purposes for which they were created. The language of the statute at most emphasizes the doctrine of the common law. To such 'general prohibitions, against the doing by corporations of acts beyond the scope of the corporate powers, courts appear to give little effect.' Taylor on Corp. § 295; Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N.Y. 54; Halstead v. Mayor, 3 N.Y. 430–433. And in many cases (and these in our opinion the most authoritative) where the statute has a specific, but at the same time an implied, application, the doctrine of estoppel against the beneficiary of an executed contract is not changed."

The court cites National Bank v. Matthews as typical of this last-mentioned class. A like holding was made with respect to a similar statute in Harris v. Gas Co., 76 Kan. loc. cit. 762, 92 P. 1127 (13 L.R.A.,N.S., 1171). The court quoted and approved 1 Clark & Marshall, Priv. Corp. § 225b, to the effect that:

"A provision in a general corporation law that no corporation created thereunder shall employ its assets for any other purpose than to accomplish the legitimate objects of its creation is merely declaratory of the common law, * * * and does not amount to such an express statutory prohibition of ultra vires loans and other transactions as to render them illegal instead of ultra vires merely."

In 2 Morawetz on Corporations, § 558, it is stated that provisions in charters of corporations and in general laws "prohibiting corporations from exercising any powers except those conferred by their charters" are "merely declaratory of the general common-law prohibition against any exercise of corporate powers which has not been authorized by the Legislature; and there is no reason for supposing that the Legislature intends to give it any greater force or effect than the common-law rule." He points out that statutes of the kind are generally so construed or "ignored" by the courts. In Erb v. Yoerg, 64 Minn. loc. cit. 465, 67 N.W. 355, it was held that one who had sold and delivered goods to a corporation on an ultra vires contract could not replevin them, since the corporation was estopped to plead ultra vires, though a statute made an offense of any "diversion of corporate property to other objects than those specified in the articles." While the quoted constitutional provision would prevent any general legislative authorization contrary to its terms, yet its restrictive effect upon corporations is no greater than its language imports when given its ordinary meaning. Black on Interpretation of Laws (2d Ed.) § 11, p. 25; Sedgwick on Constr. of State & Const. Law (3d Ed.) p. 19. It is argued the decision in Orpheum Theater Co. v. Brokerage Co., 197 Mo.App. 661, 199 S.W. 257, is in conflict with these views. That it contains language apparently justifying such a suggestion cannot be denied. Yet that case involved the enforceability of a voluntary subscription by a brokerage corporation to a theater corporation to aid in building a home for the latter. The court stated the brokerage company had "no interest in the matter which could be subserved" by the erection of the theater building. In other words, as held by the superior court of Kentucky in a like case (L. & N. R. R. v. Literary Society of St. Rose, 11 Ky.Law Rep. 861) the brokerage company received no benefit peculiar to it, and therefore had not received anything from the contract which could render applicable the doctrine of estoppel. In so far as the remainder of the opinion in the case cited is concerned, it is, if not obiter, out of accord with the settled rule in this state. It results that this point is ruled against appellants. * * *

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

TEXAS COMPANY v. Z. & M. INDEPENDENT OIL COMPANY, Incorporated.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Second Circuit, 1946. 156 F.2d 862.

Action by the Texas Company against Z. & M. Independent Oil Company, Inc., for specific performance of an option agreement whereby the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiff the physical properties used by the defendant in its business, wherein the defendant filed a counterclaim. From an adverse judgment, 66 F.Supp. 957, the defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

SWAN, CIRCUIT JUDGE. This litigation concerns an option to purchase granted under date of September 20, 1929, by Z. & M. Independent Oil Company, Inc. (hereafter called Z & M), to The Texas Company (hereafter called Texas). Texas gave notice on August 29, 1944 that it elected to exercise the option and thereafter brought the present action for specific performance of the resulting contract. Federal jurisdiction rests on diverse citizenship, Texas being a Delaware corporation and Z & M a New York corporation. The case was tried to the court without a jury and judgment was given for the plaintiff, with a reference to a special master to find the present fair value of the properties covered by the option, that is, the price to be paid for them. * * *

Execution of the sales contract and the option agreement was authorized by resolutions of the directors of Z & M on September 18, 1929; and on September 23, 1929 identical resolutions were unanimously adopted at a special meeting of Z & M's stockholders, all of whom were present in person or by proxy.[2] After the making of the sales contract of September 20, 1929, frequent renewals or modifications thereof were effected by the exchange of letters between the parties which changed the seller's prices, established new rates of discount to Z & M, added new products and named new points of shipment and distribution. On December 27, 1941, Z & M notified Texas that it elected to terminate as of June 30, 1942 the sales contract of September 20, 1929, and all renewals or modifications thereof, as well as the option agreement. But as a result of negotiations this attempted cancellation was withdrawn and the sales contract and option agreement were extended to June 30, 1944 and from year to year thereafter, subject to termination by either party by 180 days prior notice, with an express stipulation that Texas should not have the privilege of exercising the option before June 30, 1944, or until the expiration of six months after the cessation of hostilities between the United States and Germany and Japan, but might exercise it "at any time after June 30, 1944, according to the terms and conditions of said option, upon giving 180 days written notice to" Z & M.

In April 1944 all of the stock of Z & M was purchased by the Gulf Oil Corporation. Texas did not learn of this transaction until August 28, 1944. The following day Texas notified Z & M by letter that it exercised the option of September 20, 1929 and demanded a statement of the property covered and of the value of each item thereof. Z & M replied denying the existence of any option agreement. The Gulf Oil Corporation, which knew of the sales contract and option agreement before purchasing the Z & M stock, likewise informed Texas that it repudiated the option agreement and did not consent to such a sale. Thereupon Texas brought the action now before us.

Several of the appellant's contentions are based on section 20 of the Stock Corporation Law of New York. This statute permits a corporation to sell and convey all its property with the consent of two-thirds of its stockholders obtained at a meeting called pursuant to section 45. The appellant argues that the consent of stockholders to the granting of an option is not a consent to a sale or conveyance, and consequently the Z & M stockholders' resolution of September 23, 1929 was "an unnecessary and meaningless act." If this were sound, it would mean that a corporation could never grant a valid option to purchase all its property. No authority is cited which supports this extraordinary interpretation of section 20. An option is an irrevocable offer to sell which becomes a binding contract of sale on acceptance by the optionee. If two-thirds of the stockholders can authorize the officers to enter into a contract of sale, we can conceive of no possible reason why they cannot authorize the making of an irrevocable offer, as well as a revocable offer, of such a contract. In either case the objecting minority may have its stock valued and retired under section 21. See Matter of Goelet, 289 N.Y. 735, 46 N.E. 2d 349; Matter of Thomas, 259 App.Div. 736, 18 N.Y.S.2d 314.

---

[2] Mr. Zuber owned more than two-thirds of Z & M's stock from January 1, 1929 to December 21, 1941 when he made a gift of 800 shares each to his wife and daughter. At all material times 97% of the stock was owned by members of the Zuber family and Mr. Zuber exercised full control over Z & M's affairs with the acquiescence of each of its shareholders.

The appellant also contends that the resolution of September 23, 1929 did not authorize the option agreement actually made; and certainly did not authorize the modifications of July 6, 1942. Neither objection is tenable. The statute does not require any particular form of consent; hence the stockholders' resolution need not set out the agreement in extenso. See Greenpoint Sugar Co. v. Whitin, 69 N.Y. 328, 334; Lincoln Sterling Corp. v. State Theatre Dunkirk, 256 App.Div. 1035, 10 N.Y.S.2d 813. It was sufficient that the resolution made plain the stockholders' intention to consent and that the officers acted within the scope of the authority conferred upon them. As to the modifications of July 6, 1942, they put no added burdens on Z & M; they merely required Texas to forbear from exercising the option until June 30, 1944 and lengthened the notice to be given of election to exercise it. Conceivably any extension of the option might be thought a new irrevocable offer requiring a new consent by the stockholders, but we think not in view of the provision that the original option might be exercised during the term of the sales contract of September 20, 1929 "or any renewal or other agreement in lieu thereof." But regardless of that, by the law of New York, if the contract is not positively forbidden for reasons of public policy independent of protection of shareholders (Berkey v. Third Avenue R. Co., 244 N.Y. 84, 91, 92, 155 N.E. 58, 50 A.L.R. 599), shareholders may not complain of any contract of which they have individually approved regardless of the absence of statutory formalities. Kent v. Quicksilver Mining Co., 78 N.Y. 159, 185–187; Sheldon H. B. Co. v. Eickemeyer H. B. M. Co., 90 N.Y. 607; Giles D. M. Co. v. Klauder-Weldon D. M. Co., 233 N.Y. 470, 476, 135 N. E. 854. One of the main reasons for the enactment of section 20 was to protect minority stockholders, Matter of Timmis, 200 N.Y. 177, 93 N.E. 522; Matter of Drosnes, 187 App.Div. 425, 175 N.E. 628; the section was not intended to enable corporations to avoid their contractual obligations. If two-thirds of the stockholders individually consented it was as effective as if they had voted at a formal meeting. In the case at bar more than the necessary number have consented to all that Zuber did on behalf of Z & M; it would be monstrous to allow their successors to repudiate their consent by invoking a statute intended merely for their protection. * * *

Affirmed.

B. PRE-INCORPORATORS

NOTE

"PREINCORPORATORS" AND "PROMOTERS"

It has been made sufficiently plain that before the corporation comes into existence, one or more businessmen have worked on a project for which the corporation is to be a vehicle. The work of assembling the various elements of the enterprise may precede the phase of actual incorporation. Broadly speaking, assembly involves two distinct categories of work: the arrangements to secure property, personnel, supplies and so forth, with which the business is to be done; and the work of assembling the capital necessary to start the enterprise. In the following section only the first aspect is considered. The name "preincorporators" as distinct from the older name, "promoters", is due to Professor E. Merrick Dodd of the Harvard Law School.

Preincorporators are, by assumption, persons working together on a project, for which the corporate form is eventually to be planned. They may have a relationship between themselves if they so agree—but not otherwise, and then only in accordance with their understanding.

They may make agreements with outsiders; and the problem then is whether the outsider is bound to them or they to the outsider; whether, when the corporation later comes into existence, the corporation is bound to them or they to the corporation; and whether in the event that the corporation enters liability on preincorporation arrangements, the preincorporators are released.

Clearly in all of these problems, the parties are able to determine, by careful agreement, how the rights and liabilities shall fall. A preincorporator, for instance, can make an agreement with an outsider that the outsider shall deliver goods to the enterprise, and he can put in a clause that as soon as the corporation shall be formed and shall assume the liability, the incorporator shall automatically be released; or he can make an agreement with the outsider by which the outsider agrees to deliver to the corporation, when formed, and that the outsider will look only to the corporation for his pay; or any other arrangement. But businessmen are apt to move rapidly and without spelling out their full intent. The courts not infrequently have the problem of trying to work out, after the fact, from stated circumstances, what the parties really did have in mind—or, possibly, what they would have had in mind if they had thought of it.

These cases stand in a quite different category from the cases of true "promotion" (which by custom is more usually applied to the financial relations entered into by a preincorporator with the corporation or with others) and which is separately discussed in a later section.

(A) New York Stock Corporation Law, § 69: "No corporation shall issue either shares of stock or bonds, except for money, labor done or property actually received for the use and lawful purposes of such corporation * * *"

"The statute requires that stock shall be paid for either by cash or property. Services rendered in bringing a corporation into existence is neither cash nor property. If it were, then the entire capital stock could be thus disposed of, and the only asset which the corporation would have would be its naked existence." Herbert v. Duryea, 34 App.Div. 478, 480, 54 N.Y.S. 311, 1st Dep't., 1898, aff'd without opinion 164 N.Y. 596, 58 N.E. 1088, 1900.

(B) Corporate directors may be held liable to stockholders in an accounting proceeding, for permitting promoters to receive excessive commissions for the sale of stock. "Neither the stock nor the property of a corporation may be issued or paid out to a promoter for his services in organizing the corporation." Ludlam v. Riverhead Bond and Mortgage Corporation, 244 App.Div. 113, 119, 278 N.Y.S. 487, 2d Dep't., 1935; order modified and aff'd, 248 App.Div. 908, 290 N.Y.S. 648, 2d Dep't., 1936.[1]

(C) "* * * not every banker's or promoter's profit, taken by way of stock, is open to attack. The labor and acumen required to conceive and organize a modern corporation is far greater than the general public realizes; and it is fair and necessary that those who take long risks and expend much time in the negotiation, preliminary financing, estimating, and assembling of diverse and adverse elements, should be adequately rewarded. A genuine service is performed here, both to the public at large and to the incoming shareholders in particular; and it would be a grossly impracticable rule which denied compensation for such services. But it is here contended that the promoter and the banker are not the sole judges of the reasonableness of the compensation." Berle, Compensation of Bankers and Promoters Through Stock Profits, 1929, 42 Harv.L.Rev. 748, 759. See, also, Brockelbank, The Compensation of Promoters, 1934, 13 Ore.L.Rev. 195; Note, 1935, 20 Marq.L.Rev. 95; 1918, 31 Harv.L.Rev. 895.

(D) On occasion, options to purchase stock are given promoters for their services. Possible objections to such options, by stockholders and creditors are discussed, Note 1929, 29 Col.L.Rev. 491. See, also, Brockelbank, The Compensation of Promoters, 1934, 13 Ore.L.Rev. 195, 221–225, and pp. 379 to 381, infra, on stock purchase warrants.

1. THE RELATIONSHIP OF PRE-INCORPORATORS INTER SESE

HASKINS v. RYAN.[2]

Court of Chancery of New Jersey, 1906. 71 N.J.Eq. 575, 64 A. 436.

On demurrer to bill.

STEVENS, V. C. To the bill in this case a general demurrer is pleaded. The bill alleges, in substance, that during the years 1898, 1899, 1900 and 1901 the complainant devoted a large part of his time to the study of industrial conditions connected with the output of pig lead in the United States, and had conceived the plan of uniting the outstanding lead interests, which had not already become a part of the National Lead Company, into one company, and had either procured options thereon or had opened negotiations for their purchase; that in the spring of 1901

"he had crystallized and formulated a complete plan for the combination of the white lead industries in the United States not already in the National Lead Company; that he laid such plan before the defendant, a capitalist; that he sought his cooperation and aid, and himself agreed to contribute, if necessary, as much as $200,000, if the defendant would join him therein, and also contribute enough to carry the enterprise through."

[1] For possible bases of liability of corporate officers who act as promotors of allied or subsidiary corporations, see Berle, Promotors' Stock in Subsidiary Corporations, 1929, 29 Col.L.Rev. 35.

[2] For an illustration and discussion of the promotion of a corporation, see, Note, High Finance in the Twenties: The United Corporation (I), 1937, 37 Col.L.Rev. 785; Dewing, The Financial Policy of Corporations, 4th Ed., 1941, Vol. I, 407–477; Masslich, Financing a New Corporate Enterprise, 1910, 5 Ill.L.Rev. 70.

The bill alleges, further, that defendant, to quote from the bill, "expressed a willingness to join your orator therein, provided an examination of the plan and papers by the attorneys and experts of said Ryan [the defendant] confirmed the statements of your orator made to him."

The bill then alleges that the complainant submitted the plan to Ryan's attorney, and was subsequently told by him that he had submitted it to Ryan, and had indorsed it "as comprehensive, feasible, and attractive"; that through the efforts of Ryan's agents, options had been obtained upon most, if not all, of the properties upon which the complainant had options, and that on January 20, 1903, the United Lead Company was organized as a corporation under the laws of New Jersey, and under the direction and control of Ryan proceeded to acquire and now owns the interests in nearly all the companies, firms, and individuals named in complainant's plan, and is capitalized with a capital stock of $15,000,000 and has issued bonds for $17,000,000; that in the formation and exploitation of this company the defendant, Ryan, "has made an enormous profit, the amount of which is unknown to complainant," and that a combination substantially as planned by complainant has taken place, or is about to take place, with the result of great profits to said Ryan.

The bill then charges that Ryan's act of availing himself of the information complainant had collected and had only disclosed to Ryan

"upon the agreement and understanding on the part of the said Ryan that he would join your orator in the said scheme and share with him in the profits arising therefrom is contrary to equity."

But I do not understand that by this general charge it is intended to allege any other understanding or agreement than that contained in the stating part of the bill, viz., that Ryan had expressed a willingness to join complainant in his project, provided an examination of it by Ryan's attorneys and experts should confirm complainant's statements. The bill asks for a discovery and account of Ryan's profits and a decree that complainant is entitled to a share of them. Ryan is the sole defendant.

It is perfectly plain that no recovery can be had in this case on the basis of a completed agreement broken by Ryan. The plan, a copy of which is appended to the bill, contemplates the raising of $15,000,000 for the purpose of acquiring the properties of the various concerns, 22 in number, other than that of the National Lead Company. The raising of a fund with which to purchase these properties was of the essence of the plan, but complainant had not bound himself to contribute any definite sum, and Ryan had not bound himself to contribute anything. Even if, without direct averment, we should infer that an examination of the plan and papers had been made by Ryan's experts, and that such examination confirmed complainant's statements to Ryan, nothing more is shown than that Ryan agreed to join in the plan; that is, agreed to enter into a definite and explicit agreement on the subject. But nothing is better settled than that equity will not compel the specific performance of an agreement to make an agreement. Lane v. Calvary Church, 59 N.J.Eq. 413, 45 A. 702 (affirmed on appeal).

An account on the basis of a completed agreement is, therefore, quite out of the question.

As I understand the complainant's argument, he does not rest his case on any such basis. His contention is this: "The plan is my property. The defendant has appropriated it to his own use. I claim an account of the profits arising from its appropriation."

If, in point of fact, the plan has been wrongfully taken or appropriated, the remedy, if any, would appear to be an action on the case for damages; the amount of damages being its fair value. But the plaintiff does not, and in this court could not, demand damages. He asks for a discovery and an account of profits.

The fact that he has not been able to cite any precedent for the claim he makes is not, of itself, conclusive, if he can bring himself within the principle upon which an account is given.

The complainant has, undoubtedly, the right to claim protection in this court for his manuscript. It would seem that, without any reference to whether the plan is or is not open to the objection that it seeks to create a monopoly (Kerr on Inj. p. 186; Oliver v. Oliver, 11 C.B.N.S., 139), he would have the right to restrain its publication or to prevent its use; and, in the case of an author the law does more than protect the manuscript, regarded as a material thing of ink and paper. The combination of words of which it is composed (whether written down or acted, or sung before an audience admitted on payment of a fee) is also protected, and publication is restrained, even if the manuscript be destroyed and an attempt be made to reproduce it from a copy rightfully in the possession of another, or even from memory. The work is protected indefinitely before publication by the common law (Aronson v. Baker, 43 N.J.Eq. 366, 12 A. 177; N. J. State Dental Ass'n v. Denticura Co., 57 N.J.Eq. 594, 41 A. 672; Denticura Co. v. New Jersey State Dental Soc., 58 N.J.Eq. 582, 43 A. 1898), and for a limited time after publication by the statutory law of copyright. The law has never attempted to go beyond this, and to enjoin, for the benefit of the author, after publication, the use of the ideas contained in his work.

In the case of secret processes of manufacturing, the law does, to a certain extent, enjoin the use of ideas. It would, of course, on the same principle on which it affords protection to the unpublished manuscript in the hands of the author, enjoin the publication or exhibition of the paper containing the formula; but it does more. In enjoining the use of the formula, it restrains the wrongdoer from putting the idea formulated to practical account. * * *

I now come to the precise question here involved. It is this: Has the complainant a property right in the scheme or idea to be found in his plan, as contradistinguished from the property right which he has in his manuscript, regarded as a combination of words and figures—a thing of ink and paper?

A right is defined to be that interest which a person actually has in any subject of property, entitling him to hold or convey it at pleasure. But that can hardly be styled "property," over which there is not some sort of dominion. Now, as I have already said, the combination of words and figures contained in complainant's plan belongs to him absolutely. Its publication or reproduction or exhibition in any form may be enjoined. But the idea contained in the plan differs from the ideas to which I have already called attention in this important respect: It involves the voluntary action and co-operation of many different men. When I say voluntary action, I mean action not constrained by contract; for the allegation that complainant had "options" is altogether too vague to warrant an inference that they are still subsisting, or that complainant had the means of availing himself of them without the aid of outside capital. Besides, the allegation is, not that he has procured options on all the properties which it was proposed to combine, but that he either had options on them or had "opened negotiations for their purchase." The means of carrying out the plan, of giving effect to the idea, lay, therefore, beyond his control. It was an idea depending for its realization upon the concurring minds of many individuals, each of them unbound by contract and free to act as he chose. Such a project or idea can scarcely be called "property." It lacks that dominium, that capability of being applied by its originator to his own use, which is the essential characteristic of property. It differs fundamentally from the secret process or patented invention which is capable of material embodiment at the will of the inventor alone. It is worthless unless others agree to give it life. It was, as far as complainant was concerned, an idea pure and simple. Now, it has never, in the absence of contract or statute, been held, so far as I am aware, that mere ideas are capable of legal ownership and protection. Says Lord Brougham, in delivering his judgment in Jeffreys v. Boosey, 4 H.L.Cas. 965: " 'Volat irrevocabile verbum,' whether borne on the wings of the wind or the press, and the supposed owner instantly loses all control over it. * * * He has produced the thought and given it utterance, and eo instante it escapes his grasp." * * *

I am therefore of opinion that complainant has no property right in his plan regarded as an idea. Having no property right, he has no right to an account.

But, if a court of equity cannot treat complainant's idea as property, it is also incapable of giving him the remedy of account on another ground. The charge of the bill is that Ryan should account for complainant's share of any profits reaped by him from or in connection with the promotion and exploitation of the United Lead Company. Now, what profits could the defendant reap therefrom? The suggestion is that he might reap the profits of a promoter. A promoter may sometimes get shares, not issued for money or property purchased. Such shares, viewed from a legal standpoint, are not of much value. But he may also get, by contract, fully paid shares. It is presumably of such shares that the complainant desires an account. Now, on what basis could there be an equitable division of such shares? The complainant charges that it was part of his plan personally to contribute up to $200,000, if necessary. He has in fact contributed nothing. The plan contemplated the raising of $15,000,000. Ryan's interest in the company would depend in part upon the extent to which he had himself contributed, and in part upon other considerations having no relation to complainant. This being so, it would seem to be utterly impossible, on any recognized basis of apportionment, to take from Ryan a part of his shares and give them to complainant. Complainant, no doubt, expected to secure shares, partly in return for the money to be put in by him and for the services to be performed by him, and partly for the prior work done in formulating the scheme. How much his collaborators in the undertaking, had they taken him in, would have allowed him for what he had done, or would do, is altogether conjectural. It would naturally have been a matter of express contract. I am quite unable to see how a court of equity could make him an allowance by way of account of profits, based upon a condition of affairs wholly unanticipated and wholly unprovided for. Manifestly, the only way of compensating him on any rational basis would be to ascertain what his plan was reasonably worth and then to give him damages. This, of course, would presuppose a property right in the plan. Conceding such right, the damages, if recoverable at all, would be recoverable in a court of law in an action on the case, and not in equity.

I think the complainant's bill should be dismissed.[3]

BROWN v. LEACH et al.

Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Division, First Department, 1919. 189 App.Div. 158, 178 N.Y.S. 319.

Appeal by plaintiff, Charles T. Brown, from a judgment of the Supreme Court in favor of defendants, entered upon a decision of the court after a trial at the New York Special Term.

PAGE, J. Richmond Levering & Company, Inc., prior to June 27, 1917, owned all the issued stock of the Island Oil and Transportation Corporation of the par value of $22,500,000. The latter corporation owned or controlled valuable oil properties and a concession for building a pipe line for the transportation of oil from the well to the seacoast for shipment. This well was of great intrinsic value producing from 70,000 to 100,000 barrels of oil a day. The Island Oil and Transportation Corporation did not have the money necessary to properly develop its oil properties, build the pipe line and proper buildings and tanks for the storage of the oil, and also was obligated to make certain payments on the purchase of its property and for concessions held by it. Prior to June 1, 1917, Richmond Levering, the president of Richmond Levering & Company, Inc., called on the plaintiff and explained to him the situation of the company and its need for immediate financial assistance. The plaintiff loaned to Richmond Levering & Company, Inc., the sum of $9,000 and a further sum of $10,000 for the purpose of protecting its properties and rights, and had procured a further sum of $15,000 by indorsing and securing the discount of its note. The plaintiff suggested a scheme for financing the Island Oil and Transportation Corporation, and secured from Levering the privilege of financing the corporation. Levering first authorized the plaintiff to secure loans of money for the use of the corporation, and the plaintiff made persistent but futile efforts to obtain the loans from trust companies with which he had business dealings. He then brought the matter to the attention of Arthur B. Leach of the banking firm of A. B. Leach & Co., and made a proposition to him for the financing of the Island Oil and Transportation Corporation. He informed Leach of the properties, rights and securities of the corporation and their value, and later introduced him to Levering, and there was discussed between the three the financing of the corporation. Prior to that time Leach had never heard of the Island Oil and Transportation Corporation or of its properties and securities, and had not met Levering. Plaintiff had suggested to Levering the plan of selling short time obligations of the corporation secured by its debentures, and repaying the loans out of the proceeds of the sale of its stock and bonds. The plaintiff endeavored to interest Leach because his firm was able to finance enterprises in which it was interested, and sell to the public the obligations or securities of corporations of which it approved.

[3] Aff'd without opinion, 75 N.J.Eq. 623, 73 A. 1118, 1909. An amended bill was dismissed for the reasons stated in the principal case, 75 N.J.Eq. 330, 1908.

After several interviews the parties arrived at an agreement which was reduced to writing and signed on the 27th day of June, 1917. The agreement is quite lengthy but may be summarized as follows: It was between Richmond Levering & Company, Inc., party of the first part, and A. B. Leach & Co. and the plaintiff, parties of the second part. The parties of the second part agreed to advance to the party of the first part $50,000 upon receipt of a note of the Island Oil and Transportation Corporation for $300,000 in favor of the party of the first part and to be indorsed by it and Richmond Levering individually, payable in sixty days with interest at five per cent., and to be secured by fifty-one per cent. of the stock of the Island Oil and Transportation Corporation and $160,000 face value of the debentures of said corporation. Within thirty days the parties of the second part were to advance the further sum of $250,000, or such part thereof as the directors of such corporation might require. The parties of the second part to have the privilege of sending to Mexico their representatives to investigate and test the oil well and the properties of the Island Oil and Transportation Corporation for the purpose of obtaining a full report of the same. To cover the expense of this investigation and as compensation for the advance of $300,000, $500,000 par value of the stock of the Island Oil and Transportation Corporation was to be delivered with the said note to the parties of the second part and retained by them. Within sixty days the parties of the second part agreed to notify the party of the first part, in writing, whether they elected to exercise the option which was thereby granted to them, to advance to the Island Oil and Transportation Corporation $1,000,000 in such amounts and at such times as the board of directors thereof might require. In that event the Island Oil and Transportation Corporation was to issue notes in such denomination and to such payees as the parties of the second part might designate, all payable three years after their date, with interest at six per cent., aggregating $1,300,000, secured by $2,600,000 face value of the debentures of the said corporation, and thereupon the $300,000 note was to be canceled. In the event that the parties of the second part gave notice that they would not exercise the option, thereafter the $300,000 should become due and payable within sixty days. If, however, the parties of the second part decided to exercise the option, they would be entitled to receive $11,500,000 par value of the stock of the Island Oil and Transportation Corporation.

The plaintiff and Leach agreed to indorse and discount the $300,000 note. Leach was to sell the securities of the corporation and thus secure the money to pay the note and furnish the $1,000,000 called for by the contract. The profits of the transaction were to be divided between them, A. B. Leach & Co. receiving two-thirds and the plaintiff one-third. It was thus contemplated that the corporation could be financed without the furnishing of cash by the Leach firm or the plaintiff in excess of the initial payments made by each of them. Plaintiff experienced difficulty in arranging the discounting of the $300,000 note. Leach proposed that instead of one note for $300,000, there should be two notes, one for $200,000, which he would take and advance the money, and the other for $100,000 which plaintiff could get discounted, Leach agreeing to indorse the note and furnish from the common fund such collateral as might be necessary. Plaintiff thereupon arranged to have the note discounted by a trust company, but when he called upon Leach to indorse the note as he had agreed, Leach declined, but having recently incorporated his copartnership, offered to indorse the note in the name of the corporation. The president of the trust company refused to accept such indorsement, as a corporation would have no power to become an accommodation indorser. Leach thereafter, although refusing to indorse the note, demanded that the plaintiff should advance the $100,000, which plaintiff could not do. In the meantime an expert engineer had been sent to examine the property of the Island Oil and Transportation Corporation in Mexico. To the expense of this examination the plaintiff and A. B. Leach & Co. contributed. On August 14, 1917, Leach received the report of this engineer, which was favorable except that it stated that the cost of the pipe line would be greater than estimated. On the fifteenth of August, Leach had an interview with plaintiff in which he demanded that plaintiff decrease his share of the compensation from thirty-three and one-third to five per cent. Upon plaintiff's refusal of this offer, Leach offered to go on with the enterprise, if plaintiff would accept seven and one-half per cent. as his share. The plaintiff refused and Leach then gave notice that he would not exercise the option to further finance the Island Oil and Transportation Corporation, and immediately thereafter so notified Richmond Levering. Leach wrote plaintiff on August sixteenth informing him that he would not exercise the option and closing with the statement: "It is the understanding that we are each free to take such further steps in the matter as we may elect, without prejudice." Plaintiff in response wrote that it had been brought to his attention that Leach was contemplating dealing with Levering and ignoring his rights in the premises and protested that they were not free to act separately. Again on the twenty-first of August plaintiff wrote Leach: "The termination of this option, I am advised, will not leave you free to take such further steps in the matter as you may elect. You cannot use the incident of terminating the option to eliminate me from the situation, and then avail yourself of the information, introductions and suggestions I have given you for your sole profit." Leach knew before the end of August that there was a payment of $90,000 due from the Island Oil and Transportation Corporation upon its Mexican properties. Richmond Levering represented to plaintiff that A. B. Leach & Co. was definitely out of the negotiations and that it would be necessary for him to secure money from other parties in order to save the property to the Island Oil and Transportation Corporation. Believing this representation, the plaintiff was induced to release Richmond Levering & Company, Inc., from all obligation to him under the contract between Richmond Levering & Company, Inc., A. B. Leach & Co. and himself. This release was evidenced by a letter dated August 24, 1917. On Sunday, August 26, 1917, Levering made by telephone an appointment to, and did, meet Leach at a golf club on Long Island, then showed him the letter which he had obtained from plaintiff, and made an appointment to meet Leach at his office in New York the next day. Negotiations were then carried on between Levering and Leach on the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth of August which resulted in a contract dated August 30, 1917, for the financing of the Island Oil and Transportation Corporation on substantially the same lines and for the same compensation as theretofore provided in the contract of June 27, 1917, except that the plaintiff was eliminated therefrom and A. B. Leach & Co. was to receive all the profits of the transaction.

A. B. Leach & Co. became joint adventurers with the plaintiff in the enterprise, and A. B. Leach & Co. could not exclude the plaintiff from the enterprise for the purpose of securing the entire benefit of the profits to itself. A joint adventure is subject to the same rules as a technical partnership. Where the partnership has for its object the completion of a specified piece of work, or the effecting of a specified result, it will be presumed that the parties intended the relation to continue until the object has been accomplished. Until that time arrives one partner cannot terminate the partnership and continue the enterprise for his own benefit, nor can one partner exclude the other without his consent. It may be terminated at any time by consent, but the consent must be mutual. Hardin v. Robinson, 178 App.Div. 724, 729, 162 N.Y.S. 531, affirmed 223 N.Y. 651, 119 N. E. 1047. When A. B. Leach notified the plaintiff that he had elected to terminate the adventure, and that either party was free to go on with the enterprise, plaintiff protested and specifically and repeatedly notified A. B. Leach that he could not use the incident of the termination of the option to eliminate the plaintiff from the situation and proceed with the matter for his sole profit.

Leach first attempted to put the plaintiff in default by refusing to indorse the note for $100,000 and then demanding that plaintiff advance the $100,000 then notifying the plaintiff that he refused to exercise the option and significantly stating that either party could continue the matter; then Levering by representing that Leach was definitely out of the matter and that he must take up the matter with other parties which was impossible while the agreement with plaintiff was outstanding, obtained from plaintiff a release therefrom. We find Levering as soon as he could locate Leach resuming negotiations. Not content to await Leach's return to the city, Levering follows him to his golf club, on Sunday, and exhibits to him the release that he has induced the plaintiff to sign and then resumes the enterprise with the understanding that Leach alone should receive the profit.

It is a well-settled rule that copartners and joint adventurers owe the duty of utmost good faith to their copartners and coadventurers, and that until the copartnership is terminated or joint adventure is abandoned a copartner or joint adventurer cannot act for himself. If he does and thereby obtains for himself the benefits that otherwise would accrue to the partnership or joint adventurers, he would be held liable in equity to account to his copartner or coadventurers. May v. Hettrick Brothers Co., 181 App.Div. 3, 13, 167 N.Y.S. 966; Stem v. Warren, 185 App.Div. 823, 831, 174 N.Y.S. 30.

It is my opinion that A. B. Leach did not observe that good faith with the plaintiff that the law requires of coadventurers, and that with full knowledge of the conditions and with the sole design of excluding the plaintiff from participation in the profits of the enterprise, which the report of the engineer showed to be reasonably certain, he ostensibly withdrew from the enterprise, knowing full well not alone that without his assistance the plaintiff could not carry out the contract of June 27, 1917, but also that in the limited time between the notification of his withdrawal and the day when large payments must be made upon the properties of the Island Oil and Transportation Corporation, Levering would be unable to arrange with others to finance the corporation; that his refusal to go on with the enterprise was for the purpose of eliminating plaintiff from participation in the profits and securing them for himself. The defendants should be required to account to the plaintiff for one-third of the profits of the transaction. Therefore, the judgment and the findings inconsistent with this opinion will be reversed, with costs to the appellant, and an interlocutory judgment entered requiring the defendants to account for one-third of the net profits received by them, from the transactions set forth in the complaint, and appointing a referee to take such account and to report to the court at Special Term with his opinion. Order containing findings and interlocutory judgment to be settled on notice.

CLARK, P. J., DOWLING, SMITH and PHILBIN, JJ., concurred.

Judgment reversed, with costs, and interlocutory judgment directed to be entered as stated in opinion. Order to be settled on notice.[4] [4] Motion to dismiss appeal on ground judgment appealed from was interlocutory and no permission to appeal was obtained, granted, without opinion, 228 N.Y. 612, 127 N.E. 909, 1920.

---

Note, A Partnership and Joint Adventure Distinguished, 1920, 33 Harv.L.Rev. 852; 1920, 33 Harv.L.Rev. 868.

2. CONTRACT LIABILITY OF THE CORPORATION UPON PRE-INCORPORATION AGREEMENTS

(a) Without Corporate Adoption of The Contract

O'RORKE v. GEARY.

Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1903. 207 Pa. 240, 56 A. 541.

[Assumpsit to recover the amount alleged to be due on a contract for building a bridge.

Rule for judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense. MCCLUNG, J., filed the following opinion:]

"This suit is upon a written agreement, and the main defense is that the defendant did not, in executing the contract, act for himself, but for a corporation to be formed, and that the corporation, and not D. J. Geary, is now liable to the plaintiff for what is due him on said contract. The contract was executed on June 19, 1901. It was between plaintiff, as party of the first part, and 'D. J. Geary for a bridge company to be organized and incorporated,' as party of the second part. It was for the building of a bridge, which it recites the party of the second part 'desires to build across the Allegheny river, and in accordance with specifications and plans * * * heretofore submitted to the party of the first part by the party of the second part.' The work was to be subject to the inspection and approval of P. H. Melvin, his decision to be binding, etc. An estimate was to be made August 1, 1901, and 75 per cent. paid 'by the party of the second part,' and monthly thereafter. Work was to be commenced within 10 days, and completed on or before October 1, 1901. The agreement concludes, 'In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands and seals,' etc., but is signed simply by plaintiff and defendant without any seal or scroll. * * *

"We have, then, simply the question as to whether or not Geary bound himself or the company to be incorporated for the building of this bridge. When a party is acting for a proposed corporation he cannot, of course, bind it by anything he does at the time, but he may (1) take on its behalf an offer from the other, which, being accepted after the formation of the company, becomes a contract; (2) make a contract at the time binding himself, with the stipulation or understanding that if a company is formed it will take his place, and that then he shall be relieved of responsibility; or (3) bind himself personally without more, and look to the proposed company, when formed, for indemnity. It seems to us that Geary in this case comes within No. 3. The writing is not a mere naked offer to be submitted to the corporation not yet either organized or incorporated, because work was certainly to be begun, and probably completed, before it was possible that this corporation should come into existence. Geary certainly intended himself to pay the 75 per cent. monthly on the estimates. The affidavit of defense says that the company was incorporated before the bridge was completed, but it does not say that it was incorporated before October 1, 1901, when, by the contract, it was to be completed. It is just as clear that there is no provision for a substitution of responsibility. The corporation might be accepted by O'Rorke and by novation become the party of the second part, or it might, under certain circumstances, become liable to plaintiff without releasing Geary; but there is nothing in the writing which authorizes Geary to substitute at any time another for himself as the responsible party. The bridge company is not mentioned in the contract save when the party of the second part is described as 'D. J. Geary for the bridge company to be formed,' etc.

"In his opinion in Hopkins v. Mehaffy, 11 Merg. & R. 126, Judge Gibson calls attention to the difference between the covenant of an agent who describes himself as contracting for his principal, and the covenant of a principal through the means and by the instrumentality of an agent. We have here no covenant of a principal through an agent, as is shown by the language used, and for the further reason that the alleged principal was not then in existence.

"In many of the discussions of this subject, 'ratification of the act of an unauthorized agent' and 'the responsibility of an undisclosed principal' are spoken of. These references serve in some cases as illustrations of the nature of the responsibility incurred, but, when applied loosely, confuse rather than enlighten. We have no question of ratification, because that implies the existence at the time of a principal who might have given the agent authority. Nor do we have any such thing as an undisclosed principal. There was nothing undisclosed. We have a case that is sui generis. The bridge was for a company that did not then exist, but was to be afterwards organized and incorporated. O'Rorke might have built the bridge and taken the chances of the company paying him, or he might have made a contract by which Geary was to be liable until the company was formed, and then the company was to step into his shoes and relieve him. Neither of these things was done. A third course was adopted whereby Geary became liable personally on the contract, he taking the chances of the incorporation of the company and of its indemnifying him. He is liable to the plaintiff in the present action. * * *

PER CURIAM. On a rule for judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense the court below entered judgment for plaintiff (see opinion filed) for the larger part of his claim. That opinion sufficiently vindicates the judgment.

The assignments of error are overruled, and the judgment affirmed, for the reasons given in the opinion of the court below.

NOTE

(A) "There is a general rule that persons dealing with promoters of corporations to be thereafter formed are allowed the double security of the promoters and the corporation when it comes into being; but where it appears * * * that the contract was made solely on behalf of, and that the credit was extended solely to, a corporation which was then in process of formation and which shortly thereafter procured its charter, the rule does not apply. * * *" Carle v. Corhan, 127 Va. 223, 234, 103 S.E. 699, 1920; Warren, The Progress of the Law: Corporations, 1921, 34 Harv.L.Rev. 282, 289–292. See, also, Ehrich and Bunzl, Promoters' Contracts,

1929, 38 Yale L.J. 1011, 1012–1024; Isaacs, The Promoter: A Legislative Problem, 1925, 38 Harv.L.Rev. 887, 895–898; Note, 1940, 38 Mich.L.Rev. 1266.[5]

(B) Where a promoter induces a person to contract with a corporation he fraudulently represents is to be organized, he is not personally liable on the contract if the other party knew the promoter was not contracting on his own behalf, although the promoter may be liable in tort, for breach of warranty. Weiss v. Baum, 218 App.Div. 83, 217 N.Y.S. 820, 2d Dep't., 1926, Ehrich and Bunzl, Promoters' Contracts, 1929, 38 Yale L.J. 1011, 1018; 1927, 12 Corn.L.Q. 192; 1927, 40 Harv.L.Rev. 780; 1927, 36 Yale L.J. 709.

(C) Promoters may be held liable for damages for breach of contract where they do not organize the corporation within a reasonable time. Kirschmann v. Lediard, 61 Barb. 573, N.Y.Sup.Ct.1872. See, also, Detwiler v. Clune, 77 Cal.App. 562, 247 P. 264, 1926, 1927, 25 Mich.L.Rev. 571.

(D) Promoters may be penalized under the Martin Act (N.Y.General Business Law, art. 23-A, § 352) for making false and misleading statements in the prospectus. "Promoters are under a duty to make reasonable investigation before issuing a prospectus and to the extent that they fail in the performance of their duty, lack of scienter will not relieve them from liability under the Martin Act." People v. The Federated Radio Corporation et al., 244 N.Y. 33, 41, 154 N.E. 655, 1926, 1927, 31 Law Notes 24. See, also, Note, Rex v. Kyslant—A New Golden Rule for Prospectuses, 1932, 45 Harv.L.Rev. 1078; 1931, 40 Yale L.J. 987.

(E) On the liability of promoters for fraud, to persons subscribing to shares after the corporation is formed, see Downey v. Byrd, 171 Ga. 532, 156 S.E. 259, 72 A.L.R. 345, 1930, 1931, 31 Col.L.Rev. 890; 1931, 2 Ga.Lawyer 42; 1931, 26 Ill.L.Rev. 340; accord, Georgia Portland Cement Corporation et al. v. Harris et al., 178 Ga. 301, 173 S.E. 105, 1934. See, also, Note, 1931, 72 A.L.R. 355. The corporation may be held liable for the fraud or misrepresentations of its promoters, as well. See, Note, 1922, 8 Va.L.Rev. 525.

RAMSEY v. BROOKE COUNTY BUILDING & LOAN ASSOCIATION.

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia, 1926.
102 W.Va. 119, 135 S.E. 249, 49 A.L.R. 668.

Action by R. L. Ramsey against the Brooke County Building & Loan Association. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error.

MILLER, J. Plaintiff, an attorney at law, sued defendant for alleged professional services rendered prior and subsequent to its organization, and for the value of services which, as its attorney elect, he was entitled to render, but which by the wrongful conduct of its officers and directors he was prevented from performing subsequent to such organization.

On the trial below, on a plea of nonassumpsit, plaintiff recovered a verdict and judgment for $850, to reverse which, for alleged errors committed therein, the defendant was granted the present writ of error.

In his bill of particulars filed, two specific items on which plaintiff based his right of action were presented, viz.:

---

5 A recent statute enacted in Kansas [Kan.Gen.Stat.Ann., Corrick, Supp.1939, tit. 17, § 2807] relieves a promoter from liability on a contract made on behalf of the corporation once the corporation comes into existence, unless, within thirty days after its organization, the corporation disaffirms the contract. This statute has been criticized, Legis., 1940, 54 Harv.L.Rev. 154.

(1) For legal services rendered as attorney for Brooke County Building & Loan Ass'n from February 1, 1924, to December 31, 1924, for organization of the company, obtaining its charter and the four amendments thereto, drawing the by-laws, and for other services as such attorney, $700.

(2) For failure and neglect of the defendant to procure plaintiff to make abstracts of title and deeds of trust and mortgages in fifty loans made by defendant to borrowers and owners of real estate, as provided in his contract of employment, between the ——— day of February, 1924, and the ——— day of December, 1925, by which he was damaged, $500. * * *

We are aided very little by the briefs and arguments of counsel on the real questions presented by the record, as we conceive them. First, is the defendant liable for the services of counsel rendered in procuring the charter, attending meetings of stockholders and directors, and in the preparation of the constitution and by-laws, such as were rendered by plaintiff, and shown by the record? In the promotion of a corporation, these preliminary services are of course necessary and all important, and there can be no doubt that the promoters, if they employ counsel, are themselves liable therefor personally; but does the corporation itself, in its corporate entity, when its organization is completed and it has adopted or appropriated the work and services of one thus employed, become liable for the reasonable value thereof? We think it is generally so understood, and that corporations so organized do in actual practice assume and pay all the reasonable incorporation expenses, so as to impose the burden on all stockholders alike, and not wholly upon those who promote the organization. It seems to be well settled that a corporation is not bound by contracts made by the promoters on its behalf, unless after organization it ratifies the same. 7 R.C.L. § 59, p. 80, and notes. In England, according to some early cases, contracts of promoters though relating to the organization, and thereafter accepted, became the obligations of the corporation. See a collation of the cases in note to Oakes v. Cattaraugus Water Co., 143 N.Y. 430, 38 N.E. 461, reported and annotated in 26 L.R.A. 544. But this general rule then proving unsatisfactory was modified, and various distinctions were made in subsequent English cases, as the same note shows. The apparent exception to the modified English rule and recognized and followed in a number of our American cases is that when the contract of the promoters relates to the formation of the corporation, obtaining its charter and its subsequent organization, the corporation is liable upon an implied contract for the necessary expenses incurred therein, and which inure to its benefit. Among the cases we will cite are, Little Rock & Ft. Smith R. Co. v. Perry, 37 Ark. 164; Farmers' Bank of Vine Grove v. Smith, 105 Ky. 816, 49 S.W. 810, 88 Am.St.Rep. 341; Low v. Connecticut & Passumpsic Rivers R. R. Co., 45 N.H. 370; Bell's Gap R. R. Co. v. Christy, 79 Pa. 54, 21 Am.Rep. 39. These cases are directly in point on the very proposition relied on here and covered by plaintiff's instructions to the jury as given by the court, and we think are sound in principle. The rule is based on the familiar principle, that one who knowingly accepts the benefits of the labor or services of another or of a contract made in his behalf is bound in law and morals to pay the one rendering the services reasonable compensation therefor. * * *

The plaintiff's instructions to the jury given by the court correctly propounded the law applicable to the case, as herein announced; those of the defendant rejected did not do so. Wherefore we find no substantial error in the judgment, and the same will be affirmed.[6]

NOTE

(A) "Since a corporation before its organization cannot have agents, and is unable to contract or to be contracted with it is not liable upon any contract which a promoter attempts to make for it, unless it becomes so by its own act after its incorporation is completed. * * * But there are cases where a corporation becomes bound for the contracts of its promoters. While there are many decisions holding corporations liable in such cases, the courts have had great difficulty in finding a scientific or rational basis for sustaining such liability. The usual grounds that have been suggested are ratification, adoption, novation, and that the proposition made to the promoters is a continuing offer to be accepted or rejected by the corporation when it comes into being, and upon acceptance becomes an original contract on its part; and the liability has also been sustained on the ground that the corporation, by accepting the benefits of a contract, takes it cum onere, and is estopped to deny its liability on the contract. * * * But, whatever may be the proper legal theory by which corporations may be bound by the contracts of their promoters, it is necessary in all cases that the corporation should have full knowledge of the facts, or at least should be put upon such notice as would lead, upon reasonable inquiry, to knowledge of the facts. It is obvious that if corporations could be held bound by all the secret undisclosed contracts of their promoters, few men would care to risk subscribing to their capital stock. Such, however, is not the law; and all the cases that we have been able to find held that there must be knowledge on the part of the corporation. * * *" Clifton v. Tomb, 21 F.2d 893, 900, C.C.A.W.Va.1927. See, I Williston, Contracts, Rev.Ed.1936, § 306; Ehrich and Bunzl, Promoters' Contracts, 1929, 38 Yale L.J. 1011, 1024–1046; Richards, The Liability of Corporations on Contracts Made by Promoters, 1905, 19 Harv.L.Rev. 97; Notes, 1922, 17 A.L.R. 452; 1926, 49 A.L.R. 673; 1939, 123 A.L.R. 726; 1918, 3 Corn.L.Q. 292; 1901, 14 Harv.L.Rev. 536.

(B) The English rule, to the effect that a corporation may neither ratify nor adopt a contract made by its promoters on its behalf, but must make a new contract, is followed in Massachusetts. See, Abbott v. Hapgood, 150 Mass. 248, 22 N.E. 907, 5 L.R.A. 586, 15 Am.St.Rep. 193, 1889; Koppel v. Massachusetts Brick Company, 192 Mass. 223, 78 N.E. 128, 1906; Natal Land and Colonization Co., Ltd., v. Pauline Colliery & Development Syndicate, Ltd., 1904, A.C. 120.

GLASS et al. v. NEWPORT CLOTHING CO., INC.

Supreme Court of Vermont, 1939. 110 Vt. 368, 8 A.2d 651.

Action in contract with declaration in common counts, by Barnet Glass and Samuel Lisman, doing business under the firm name and style of Style Shoppe, against the Newport Clothing Company, Inc., for merchandise sold to the defendant. Judgment for plaintiff Barnet Glass in the sum of $190.26 and for the plaintiffs Barnet Glass and

---

6 Rehearing denied November 12, 1926. See Comment in, 1927, 11 Mich.L.Rev. 465.

Samuel Lisman, doing business under the firm name and style of Style Shoppe, in the sum of $45.54, and defendant brings exceptions.

Judgment for plaintiff Barnet Glass reversed and judgment for plaintiff Style Shoppe reversed and action dismissed as to such plaintiff.

MOULTON, CHIEF JUSTICE. * * * Stripped of much detail which is immaterial to the decision of this cause, the following facts emerge from the findings:—for some time previous to July, 1936, Dora Toplitt was engaged in the clothing business in Newport under the name of the Newport Clothing Company. After a loss by fire, Michael Toplitt, Dora's husband, called upon the plaintiff Glass and told him that he was about to organize the business as a corporation, and needed some merchandise. Glass agreed to extend credit, and accordingly merchandise was furnished by him to the fair and reasonable value of $190.26, delivered to Toplitt, and charged either to the Newport Clothing Company, or to the then nonexistent Newport Clothing Company, Inc. The latter concern is the defendant herein, and was incorporated under the laws of this State on August 21, 1936, Michael Toplitt becoming its president. All of the merchandise was delivered to Toplitt before this date. The findings state that Toplitt testified in substance that the defendant corporation took over the assets of the Newport Clothing Company, and "while it does not affirmatively appear that the merchandise referred to—ever came into possession of the corporation, however, I find that the same was purchased by and delivered to Mr. Toplitt for the Newport Clothing Co., Inc;" and that "Barnet Glass individually extended such credit to the Newport Clothing Company, Inc."

The defendant corporation was not, and could not have been, a party to the contract of sale, because it was not in being at the time. Holyoke Envelope Co. v. U. S. Envelope Co., 182 Mass. 171, 174, 65 N.E. 54. For the same reason, Toplitt was not, and could not have been, its agent in the transaction. Hall v. Vermont and Massachusetts R. Co., 28 Vt. 401, 406; Security Co. v. Bennington Monument Ass'n, 70 Vt. 201, 206, 40 A. 43. But the defendant would become liable thereon if, after its organization, it expressly or impliedly assumed the obligation, by the adoption or ratification of the contract. Gardiner v. Equitable Office Bldg. Corp'n, 2 Cir., 273 F. 441, 17 A.L.R. 431, 438; Kirkup v. Anaconda Amusement Co., 59 Mont. 469, 197 P. 1005, 17 A.L.R. 441, 446; Ramsey v. Brook County Bldg. & Loan Ass'n, 102 W.Va. 119, 155 S.E. 249, 49 A.L.R. 668, 673. And where a corporation, after organization, accepts the benefit of a contract made in good faith by its promoter in its behalf previous to its organization, and the contract is one which would have been within its corporate powers to make, the inference is justified that it has adopted or ratified such contract. [citing cases.]

There is no finding, and no claim, of an express adoption here; what the plaintiff Glass argues is that the defendant received the merchandise, and hence had the benefit of the contract. But this contention is not borne out by the record. The statement in the findings that Toplitt testified that the corporation took over the assets of the Newport Clothing Company is not equivalent to a finding that this was the fact, but is only a finding that the witness so testified (see Vilas v. Seith, 108 Vt. 18, 22, 183 A. 854; Peck v. City Trust Co., 104 Vt. 20, 28, 156 A. 403), and indeed there is nothing to show that the merchandise in question was a part of such assets.

While we must indulge all reasonable intendments in favor of the judgment and read doubtful findings so as to support it, if we reasonably can do so, we cannot supply the omission of an essential fact not fairly inferable as resulting from the facts as found. Wright v. Godin, 108 Vt. 23, 26, 182 A. 89; Manley Bros. v. Somers, 100 Vt. 292, 297, 137 A. 336.

The other findings even more effectually dispose of the contention. The burden was upon Glass to prove the necessary elements of his claim; among them, that the corporation received and accepted the merchandise. The finding that it did not affirmatively appear that it ever came into the possession of the corporation amounts to a failure to find the fact. Wright v. Godin, supra; Partridge v. Cole, 98 Vt. 373, 377, 127 A. 653. The argument that what the trial court meant by the word "affirmatively" was that the fact was shown by circumstantial, rather than by direct evidence, is, we think, more ingenious than convincing. "By affirmative proof is meant such evidence of the truth of the matters asserted as tends to establish them, and this regardless of the character of the evidence offered." Jenkins v. Hawkeye Commercial Men's Ass'n, 147 Iowa 113, 124 N.W. 199, 201, 30 L.R.A.,N.S., 1181, 1184.

The finding that the merchandise was purchased by, and delivered to, Toplitt, for the Newport Clothing Co., Inc. adds nothing to the defendant's liability since, as we have seen, the corporation being nonexistent at that time, could not be bound on any theory of agency, in the absence of a subsequent adoption or ratification. And the finding that Glass extended credit to the Newport Clothing Co. Inc., has no greater effect, because this extension of credit to an anticipated, but as yet unborn, debtor is, standing alone, of no avail. The judgment in favor of Glass is not justified by the facts as found. It is, therefore, unnecessary to consider the defendant's exceptions to the findings.

(b) With Corporate Adoption of the Contract

NOTE

Some jurisdictions hold that the corporation, to be bound by the promoters' contract, must formally adopt or assume it. "But none of the authorities go to the extent of holding that a contract between individuals, even though promoters of a corporation and for its supposed benefit, shall become the contract of the corporation thereafter formed and enforceable against it, independent of affirmative action taken in recognition thereof by the corporation itself. * * * The adoption of such a contract is on the theory that the contract made by the promoters is a continuing offer on the part of the other party to the contract unless withdrawn by him, and that it may be accepted and adopted by the corporation after it is created." Kirkup v. Anaconda Amusement Co., 59 Mont. 469, 478, 480, 197 P. 1005, 17 A.L.R. 441, 1921.

McARTHUR v. TIMES PRINTING CO.

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1892. 48 Minn. 319, 51 N.W. 216.

Appeal from district court, Hennepin county; Canty, Judge.

Action by D. A. McArthur against the Times Printing Company to recover damages for a breach of contract. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

MITCHELL, J. The complaint alleges that about October 1, 1889, the defendant contracted with plaintiff for his services as advertising solicitor for one year; that in April, 1890, it discharged him, in violation of the contract. The action is to recover damages for the breach of the contract. The answer sets up two defenses: (1) That plaintiff's employment was not for any stated time, but only from week to week; (2) that he was discharged for good cause. Upon the trial there was evidence reasonably tending to prove that in September, 1889, one C. A. Nimocks and others were engaged as promoters in procuring the organization of the defendant company to publish a newspaper; that, about September 12th, Nimocks, as such promoter, made a contract with plaintiff, in behalf of the contemplated company, for his services as advertising solicitor for the period of one year from and after October 1st,—the date at which it was expected that the company would be organized; that the corporation was not, in fact, organized until October 16th, but that the publication of the paper was commenced by the promoters October 1st, at which date plaintiff, in pursuance of his arrangement with Nimocks, entered upon the discharge of his duties as advertising solicitor for the paper; that after the organization of the company he continued in its employment in the same capacity until discharged, the following April; that defendant's board of directors never took any formal action with reference to the contract made in its behalf by Nimocks, but all of the stockholders, directors, and officers of the corporation knew of this contract at the time of its organization, or were informed of it soon afterwards, and none of them objected to or repudiated it, but, on the contrary, retained plaintiff in the employment of the company without any other or new contract as to his services.

There is a line of cases which hold that where a contract is made in behalf of, and for the benefit of, a projected corporation, the corporation, after its organization, cannot become a party to the contract, either by adoption or ratification of it. Abbott v. Hapgood, 150 Mass. 248, 22 N.E. 907; Beach, Corp. § 198. This, however, seems to be more a question of name than of substance; that is, whether the liability of the corporation, in such cases, is to be placed on the grounds of its adoption of the contract of its promoters, or upon some other ground, such as equitable estoppel. This court, in accordance with what we deem sound reason, as well as the weight of authority, has held that, while a corporation is not bound by engagements made on its behalf by its promoters before its organization, it may, after its organization, make such engagements its own contracts. And this it may do precisely as it might make similar original contracts; formal action of its board of directors being necessary only where it would be necessary in the case of a similar original contract. That it is not requisite that such adoption or acceptance be express, but it may be inferred from acts or acquiescence on part of the corporation, or its authorized agents, as any similar original contract might be shown. Battelle v. Pavement Co., 37 Minn. 89, 33 N.W. 327. See, also, Mor. Corp. § 548. The right of the corporate agents to adopt an agreement originally made by promoters depends upon the purposes of the corporation and the nature of the agreement. Of course, the agreement must be one which the corporation itself could make, and one which the usual agents of the company have express or implied authority to make. That the contract in this case was of that kind is very clear; and the acts and acquiescence of the corporate officers, after the organization of the company, fully justified the jury in finding that it had adopted it as its own. * * *

The point is made that plaintiff should have alleged that the contract was made with Nimocks, and subsequently adopted by the defendant. If we are correct in what we have said as to the legal effect of the adoption by a corporation of a contract made by a promoter in its behalf before its organization, the plaintiff properly pleaded the contract as having been made with the defendant. But we do not find that the evidence was objected to on the ground of a variance between it and the complaint. The assignments of error are very numerous, but what has been already said covers all that are entitled to any special notice. Order affirmed.

BRYAN v. NORTHWEST BEVERAGES, Inc.

Supreme Court of North Dakota, 1939. 69 N.D. 274, 285 N.W. 689.

Appeal from District Court, Burleigh County; R. G. McFarland, Judge.

Action by Leon Bryan against Northwest Beverages, Incorporated, on a quantum meruit to recover the reasonable value of services performed by the plaintiff in behalf of the defendant corporation and of the good will and accounts conveyed by him to the defendant corporation. Judgment for plaintiff on a verdict for $4,500, and the defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

ENGLERT, DISTRICT JUDGE. This is an action upon a quantum meruit. It was brought by the plaintiff to recover "the reasonable value of the services performed by him for and in behalf of the defendant corporation and of the good will and accounts conveyed by him to said corporation."

The answer of the defendant amounts to a general denial of the complaint. It alleges the defendant employed the plaintiff as a salesman at a salary of a hundred and fifty dollars per month, and that the defendant was obliged to terminate his services because he refused to carry out the instructions of the board of directors, and that he has been fully paid for all services he performed for defendant. * * *

The complaint alleges that after the incorporation of the defendant, the plaintiff turned over to the defendant accounts of persons engaged in the retail liquor business, and who were making purchases in the sum of $200,000 worth per year, and that the defendant accepted and adopted the contract by issuing the stock in the name of the plaintiff on its books, and employing him as manager of the defendant company. The defendant maintains that in order to hold it liable on the alleged contract, plaintiff must allege formal adoption of the agreement by its board of directors. It cites and relies upon the case of Kirkup v. Anaconda Amusement Co., 59 Mont. 469, 197 P. 1005, 1008, 17 A.L.R. 441, as authority for such contention. In that case the court held that the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained. In that case, the complaint contained no such allegation as above mentioned. Moreover, in the case before us, the plaintiff testified that, at a meeting of all the stockholders and officers of the corporation on November 15, 1936, all the stockholders agreed to accept and to adopt the preincorporation agreement made by the plaintiff with the other organizers.

The court, in the Kirkup case, quoted from the decision in Fitzpatrick v. O'Neill, 43 Mont. 552, 118 P. 273, Ann.Cas.1912C, 296, so far as material, the following: "Appellants maintain that the directors alone possess the power to bind the corporation in this regard. * * * It is not the universal rule that the corporation must act exclusively through its board of directors. 'Formal action is often dispensed with, even in the most important matters, where all the members of the corporation, including the shareholders and directors, are present and concur, although there is no formal vote either of the shareholders or of the directors.' " After thus quoting from the Fitzpatrick case, the court in the Kirkup case said: "The authority of this case, cited and relied upon by the plaintiff, it will readily be seen, has no application to the case under consideration, as there is no contention made by allegations of the complaint, or otherwise, that the contract was assumed or adopted by all of the directors of the corporation, or all of its stockholders. Were such facts made to appear, a different conclusion would doubtless be reached, upon this phase of the case, even in the absence of formal action by the board of directors or stockholders."

A careful examination of the complaint in question convinces us that the objections urged against it by the defendant are groundless and without merit. * * *

This disposes of the errors assigned by the appellant adversely to its contentions. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed, with costs to the plaintiff. It will be so ordered.

JOHNSON & CARLSON v. MONTREUIL'S ESTATE.

Supreme Court of Michigan, 1939. 291 Mich. 582, 289 N.W. 262.

Johnson & Carlson filed a claim against the Estate of Albert T. Montreuil, deceased, for balance due on brewery equipment, installed in the plant of the Albert Brewing Company, on the ground that the order for the equipment and circumstances surrounding the same imposed personal liability on deceased. From judgment in probate court and on appeal in circuit court disallowing the claim, the plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

WIEST, JUSTICE. Plaintiff filed a claim against the estate of Albert T. Montreuil, deceased, for balance due on brewery equipment, installed in the plant of the Albert Brewing Company, in Detroit, on the ground that the order for the equipment and circumstances surrounding the same imposed personal liability on Mr. Montreuil. The claim was disallowed in the probate court and on appeal in the circuit court and is here by appeal.

February 27, 1936, plaintiff sent a written proposition to the Mundus Brewing Company, at Detroit, covering the equipment and price thereof installed.

Mr. Montreuil was interested in the formation of a new brewing corporation in place and stead of the Mundus Brewing Company and, on March 3, 1936, he signed and sent the following order to plaintiff:

"Gentlemen:

"I beg to place an order with you for nine closed fermenting ale tanks, as described in your letter addressed to the Mundus Brewing Company dated February 27th, and also 32 open fermenters and three oval open fermenters, as also described in the said letter, the bottoms and heads to be made from 3″ material and the staves to be of 2½″ material.

"I am placing this order now in order to save time and I may state that just as soon as the new brewing company is organized at the first meeting of the board of directors this order will be confirmed by them.

"Yours very truly,

"A. T. Montreuil.

"P.S. The total barrelage capacity of the above tanks will be 6,040 barrels, and the price is to be $23,625."

The new corporation, styled the Albert Brewing Company, was organized three days later, and the equipment was installed in the plant of that company and billed to it, and that company paid the bill in part and for the balance executed a series of notes sent to it by plaintiff. The new corporation became bankrupt and plaintiff presented its claim against it in the bankruptcy proceeding, and also presented the same claim against the Estate of Albert T. Montreuil, deceased, claiming that the order by Mr. Montreuil was given as a promoter of the corporation and constituted a contract between him and plaintiff.

Contemporaneous action demonstrating the purpose and understanding of the scope of the order and the relation and liability of the parties thereunder carries meaning wholly inconsistent with plaintiff's present desire.

The order given in behalf of the contemplated corporation, in fact later organized, and followed by delivery to and installation in the plant of the new company, brought no liability to Mr. Montreuil, acting in behalf of the corporation subsequently organized, in the absence of his personal pledge.

In the instance at bar, under the express terms of the order, it was solely for and in behalf of the corporation to be organized and on its face negatived any other relation. * * *

Plaintiff contends that there can be no agency in behalf of a non-existing principal. This must be qualified by stating, unless sanctioned by law.

This common law rule evidently accounts for the enactment of § 8, Act No. 327, Pub.Acts 1931, Stat.Ann. § 21.8, as a part of the general corporation act serving as a charter for Michigan corporations. That section provides: "No contract made by the incorporators for or on behalf of any corporation to be formed preliminary to the filing of the articles shall be deemed to be invalid or ineffectual because made prior to such filing, and all property held by such incorporators for the benefit of the proposed corporation shall be deemed to be the property of such corporation."

This statute enables the incorporators to make valid contracts, "for or on behalf of any corporation to be formed preliminary to the filing of the articles", and abrogates the common law rule invoked by plaintiff to the effect that promoters may make no contract in behalf of a proposed corporation. Under this statute the order in behalf of the contemplated corporation, upon organization of such corporation, by adoption and the acts of the parties, became a contract exclusively between such corporation and plaintiff.

Questions raised relative to admission and exclusion of evidence have been examined and, under the disposition we make of the case, are of no moment.

The judgment is affirmed, with costs.

(c) Implied Corporate Adoption of the Contract

MORGAN v. BON BON COMPANY.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1917. 222 N.Y. 22, 118 N.E. 205.

Action by Harlan D. Morgan against the Bon Bon Company, Incorporated. From a judgment of the Appellate Division (165 App. Div. 89, 150 N.Y.S. 668) reversing a judgment in favor of plaintiff and dismissing his complaint, the plaintiff appeals. Judgment of the Appellate Division reversed, and that of the trial court affirmed.

HISCOCK, C. J. The appellant recovered a judgment against the respondent because the latter refused to deliver to him certain shares of its capital stock in payment for services rendered in accordance with the terms of a contract made between the appellant and the organizers of the respondent, and the obligations of which contract it is claimed the latter had assumed. To the reasons assigned for the reversal of the judgment by the Appellate Division others are now added in the argument made by the respondent for the affirmance of such judgment, and all of these will be briefly considered after a statement of the essential facts.

Four men made a contract for the organization of the respondent whereby, amongst other things, loans by one of the number to the corporation were provided for. At or before the time when this agreement was executed one of the four in substance proposed that appellant should be employed to lay out and put into operation a system of bookkeeping for the corporation thus to be organized. The result of this proposition was that there was added to the principal agreement a supplementary paragraph, which is the important one in this litigation, and whereby it was provided:

"It is understood between the undersigned, organizers of the Bon Bon Company, that after the company shall have repaid to A. Maynard Lyon all the advances that he shall make to said company, and its other debts, there shall be issued to George W. Felter seventy-five shares of the stock of said company, and to Harlan D. Morgan twenty-five shares of the stock of said company, in payment of the amounts to become due to them from said company for services to be rendered by them to the company, to its satisfaction."

On the day this agreement was executed the respondent corporation was organized; all of its stock then issued being issued to the four organizers who for the term of at least a year were its directors and officers. After the corporation was organized the appellant performed for it the services above indicated, and this was done with the knowledge and apparent approval of the officers of the corporation who as organizers had made the contract with him, and were, of course, fully cognizant of the terms thereof. These services were continued until the appellant was advised that no more were needed, and after a lapse of considerable time, the respondent having refused to deliver to him the shares of stock provided by the contract, this action was brought wherein damages were recovered for such failure on a valuation of much more than the par value of the stock.

It is urged in behalf of the respondent that the complaint does not sufficiently allege any adoption by the corporation of the terms and obligations of the contract made by the men who organized it with the appellant; that there was no evidence of any action by the respondent which resulted in the adoption of the contract and in imposing upon it the obligation to carry out the terms thereof; that the contract provided for the issue of stock with which to pay for services to be rendered in the future, and that this was unlawful; that the contract, even though otherwise binding, was invalidated by the fact that the services performed by appellant were worth much less than the par value of the stock agreed to be issued in payment therefor. We do not think that any of these defensive contentions can be sustained.

While it is true that the complaint does not in terms allege that the respondent adopted and became bound by the terms of the contract made by its organizers with appellant, we think that it does set forth fairly well the facts upon which this conclusion and claim can be predicated. Moreover, as a material justification for this interpretation it is to be noted that all of the facts entering into the controversy between the parties were admitted or proven without any objection that evidence thereof was inadmissible under the complaint.

We think that the evidence thus admitted did permit the jury to find that the respondent had adopted the contract made by its organizers with the appellant and had become bounden by the terms thereof. These organizers became the corporation. The contract was made in view of the organization of the respondent and for its benefit. With the knowledge and approval of the men who organized the corporation and then became its stockholders and officers, the appellant was permitted to perform the services which had been contracted for, and the corporation, chargeable through its officers with full knowledge of the contract under which these services were being rendered, received the benefit thereof. It is well established that a corporation which under such circumstances takes the benefits of a contract may be held to have adopted and assumed also its obligations. Morawetz on Private Corporations (2d Ed.) § 549; Cook on Corporations, § 707; Bommer v. Am. Spiral Spring B. H. Mfg. Co., 81 N.Y. 468, 473; Burden v. Burden, 8 App.Div. 160, 167, 40 N.Y.S. 499, affirmed 159 N.Y. 287, 54 N.E. 17; Oakes v. Cattaraugus Water Co., 143 N.Y. 430, 38 N.E. 461, 26 L.R.A. 544; Rogers v. N. Y. & Texas Land Co., 134 N.Y. 197, 211, 32 N.E. 27; Shaffer v. Mohawk Valley Br. Corp., 221 N.Y. 697, 117 N.E. 1084. * * *

We think that the judgment of the Appellate Division should be reversed, and that of the trial court affirmed, with costs in this court and in the Appellate Division.

MCLAUGHLIN, J. (dissenting). I am unable to concur in the opinion of the Chief Judge that the judgment here appealed from should be reversed. The agreement upon which the liability of the defendant is predicated is, upon its face, one between the organizers of the defendant and no one else. It in no way purports to bind the corporation or to have been executed on its behalf. The only reference to the plaintiff is that after the corporation shall have repaid Lyon for the money loaned by him to it, and paid its other debts, there shall be issued to the plaintiff 25 shares of stock "for services to be rendered." The agreement was executed prior to the organization of the defendant, and on the very day it was entered into all of the stock was issued to the organizers, and by them put up as collateral to secure the payment of the money advanced by Lyon. After the corporation was organized the plaintiff installed a system of bookkeeping and opened a set of books for it. These were the services which he performed and for which it is claimed he has a right to recover under the agreement, on the theory that the corporation adopted such agreement because the organizers constituted the board of directors or officers of the corporation during the time the services were rendered. This is the only evidence there is bearing upon the question of adoption. There is nothing to show corporate action of any kind other than that the organizers of the corporation acted in the capacity referred to.

The action is upon the agreement, not to recover for the value of the services rendered, and before such action can be maintained something more, I think, must be shown. Allegations to the effect that the persons executing the agreement organized the corporation, that one of their number thereafter loaned money to it, that all of them became officers or directors, and acted as such during the time the services were rendered, seem to me quite insufficient to warrant a finding that the corporation adopted the agreement, and thereby became bound by it. Obviously an agreement between the organizers of a corporation to the effect that after the organization is completed the stock shall be issued in a certain way is not binding upon the corporation. Once the corporation is organized the statute states for what the stock may be issued. Stock Corp. Law, c. 564, Laws of 1890, as amended by chapter 354, Laws of 1901; Consol.Laws, c. 59, § 55. The language is:

"No corporation shall issue either stock or bonds except for money, labor done or property actually received for the use and lawful purposes of such corporation."

When the agreement referred to was made, the corporation was not organized; the services had not been rendered; and the fact that services were thereafter rendered, of which the corporation had the benefit, obligated it, in my opinion, to do, not what the agreement provided (deliver to plaintiff 25 shares of its stock), but to pay him what his services were worth.

It is not difficult to imagine, if the plaintiff here can recover from the corporation 25 shares of its stock, how easily the provisions of the statute above quoted can be evaded. Assume that the promoters, instead of agreeing among themselves to give the plaintiff 25 shares for services to be rendered by him, had agreed to give him substantially all of the stock for the same services. What would there have been left after the agreement had been carried out by the corporation? It would have adopted a system of bookkeeping and opened a set of books, and had an empty treasury. Not only this, but the plaintiff, his action being predicated upon the agreement, must have known when the services were rendered by him that the corporation having issued all of its stock could not deliver to him the 25 shares which the organizers had agreed to.

For these reasons, as well as those given in the prevailing opinion of the Appellate Division, I dissent, and vote to affirm the judgment appealed from.

KENYON v. HOLBROOK MICROFILMING SERVICE.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Second Circuit, 1946. 155 F.2d 913.

Appeal from the District Court, of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

Action by Frank C. Kenyon against Holbrook Microfilming Service, Inc., to recover salary allegedly due under a contract of employment and for damages resulting from its breach. From a judgment, entered upon a directed verdict, dismissing the complaint, the plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

L. HAND, CIRCUIT JUDGE. The plaintiff, Kenyon, appeals from a judgment against him in an action to recover salary due under a contract of employment by the defendant, and for damages resulting from its breach. The cause was brought in the state court and removed to the district court for diversity of citizenship; and at the conclusion of the evidence the judge directed a verdict because the plaintiff had failed to make out a cause of action. That is the only point involved. The defendant is a Delaware corporation organized in November, 1942, at the instance of Kathleen Hogan and Fred Lhoyd, the actual incorporators being three dummies, who acted throughout at their direction, and who may be disregarded. Hogan and Lhoyd obtained licenses upon several "microfilm" patents; and some time between November, 1942 and July 12, 1943, they got an option for the purchase of a New York company, engaged in the manufacture of "microfilm" whose business they expected to continue under the new corporation. They met Kenyon in February, 1943, and had several interviews with him in which they persuaded him to become president of the new company. On March 11th, they executed a contract, the substance of which is set forth in the margin; and for two months beginning April 16th, when he definitely gave up his position in another company, he was steadily engaged in various kinds of work for the corporation. Part of this was the preparation of a prospective "budget" for the first year of operations, showing in detail the necessary capital outlay, the "break-even point," a detailed analysis of the expected profits, a summary of profit and loss and concluding with a "Maximum Cash Absorption during first year" of about $135,000. * * *

Kenyon first argues that the contract of March 11, 1943, bound the defendant, regardless of ratification by the company's board of directors: this on the theory that Hogan and Lhoyd were the incorporators, and as such had power to commit the corporation. That is a question of Delaware law and, as we are not referred to any decisions of that state which touch upon the point, we are thrown back upon the statutes. The answer is clear: incorporators as such have no power to appoint a president and fix his salary before a board of directors is appointed. We quote § 8 of the Delaware Corporation Law, Rev.Code 1935, § 2040, in the margin.[3] The phrase, "direction of the affairs" of the corporation, even though it stood alone, could not really be thought to allow the incorporators to start the business at once, even before the stock had been subscribed and the directors elected; but it does not stand alone. The context shows that what is meant is that the incorporators shall have charge of so much as is necessary to start the business going by getting in the money and electing the board. Moreover, it so happens that § 10 of the Delaware Corporation Law, Rev.Code 1935, § 2042, expressly provides that the directors or shareholders are to elect the president. Hence, if the defendant is to be held at all, it can only be on the theory that it ratified the contract made on its behalf by Hogan and Lhoyd. That the board of directors never did formally ratify the contract is undoubted; there was no board until July 12th, and Kenyon had already withdrawn from the business on June 18th. To avoid this embarrassment he argues first, that Raskob and Hogan tricked him into this withdrawal; and second, that Raskob had in fact ratified the contract before June 18th, in particular by making use of the prospective "budget." The second argument implies that Raskob's knowledge of the contract and his conduct thereafter was a ratification, although it took place before the stock was issued, or the directors elected. * * *

[3] "Until the directors are elected, the signers of the certificate of incorporation shall have the direction of the affairs and of the organization of the corporation, and may take such steps as are proper to obtain the necessary subscriptions to stock and to perfect the organization of the corporation, including the election of directors."

There is not a tittle of evidence that Raskob ratified the contract before June 18th. He had at once refused to guarantee the Robinson Foundation's suggested financing; and as soon as he heard of Kenyon's contract he disapproved of that too. Whether a use of the "budget" after Raskob had agreed to finance the company, would have been a ratification, if Kenyon had not in the meantime withdrawn, is another matter; but until Raskob had so agreed, the use he made of it had no effect upon his obligations or the defendant's. Moreover, when Kenyon "dropped out," he abandoned whatever he had done—the "budget" included—and Raskob might use it as he chose. Whatever claim Kenyon had against Hogan and Lhoyd, he has none against the defendant; and the appeal is totally without merit.

Judgment affirmed.

WELLS et al. v. J. A. FAY & EGAN COMPANY.

Supreme Court of Georgia, 1915. 143 Ga. 732, 85 S.E. 873.

Action by the J. A. Fay & Egan Company against L. M. Wells and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

EVANS, P. J. The J. A. Fay & Egan Company brought suit against L. M. Wells and others, alleging that the defendants, under the partnership name of Ficklen Spoke & Handle Company, purchased from the plaintiff certain machinery, for which they gave their notes, copies of which were attached. Judgment was prayed for the amount claimed to be due on the notes. Four of the defendants pleaded that they were not indebted to the plaintiff, denied the alleged partnership, and averred that the Ficklen Spoke & Handle Company was a corporation. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff.

1. It appeared from the evidence that the defendants promoted the organization of a corporation, and on March 23, 1909, authorized the purchase of certain machinery from the plaintiff; the contract of purchase being in writing and signed "Ficklen Spoke & Handle Company, by L. M. Wells." The machinery was shipped and received by the defendants, and on June 22, 1909, the notes in suit were executed by authority of the defendants; these notes being signed "Ficklen Spoke & Handle Co., per R. K. Carruth, Sec. & Treas." Subsequently, to wit, August 26, 1909, on the application of the defendants, they were granted a charter, and later perfected an organization of the corporation. These facts are not in dispute, and their effect is to charge the defendants with liability on the notes. Persons acting in concert to bring about the formation of a corporation are responsible for their acts. Where they buy machinery, receive it into their possession, and authorize one of their number to give a note for the purchase price, they cannot escape liability on the theory that they contemplated the organization of a corporation for which they intended the machinery. If one contracts as agent, when in fact he has no principal, he will be personally liable. A promoter, though he may assume to act on behalf of the projected corporation and not for himself, cannot be treated as an agent of the corporation, for it is not yet in existence; and he will be personally liable on his contract, unless the other party agreed to look to some other person or fund for payment. Clark on Contracts, § 47.

2. But it is contended that, after the corporation was formed, it made certain payments on the notes, which were accepted by the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff undertook to place the corporation into a receivership because of its default in the payment of the notes, which were alleged to be its debt; and that these facts estop the plaintiff from asserting a personal liability against the defendants. Clearly the acceptance by a creditor of a partial payment from a stranger will not extinguish the balance due on the debtor's obligation. Nor do we see how the plaintiff's efforts to collect its debt from the corporation will serve to release the defendants. The pleadings in that case are not in the record, and, for aught we know, the plaintiff was attempting in that suit to fix the corporation's liability on the ground that it had adopted the contract of the promoters after its organization. There is nothing in the evidence which will afford an inference that the plaintiff released the defendants from their contract. * * *

Judgment affirmed.

C. THE NATURE OF THE CORPORATE CONTRACT

TRUSTEES OF DARTMOUTH COLLEGE v. WOODWARD

Supreme Court of the United States, 1819. 4 Wheat. 518, 4 L.Ed. 629.

[The statement of facts is omitted].

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL, delivered the opinion of the court: This is an action of trover, brought by the trustees of Dartmouth College against William H. Woodward, in the State Court of New Hampshire, for the book of records, corporate seal, and other corporate property, to which the plaintiffs allege themselves to be entitled.

A special verdict, after setting out the rights of the parties, finds for the defendant, if certain acts of the legislature of New Hampshire, passed on the 27th of June, and on the 18th of December, 1816, be valid, and binding on the trustees without their assent, and not repugnant to the constitution of the United States; otherwise, it finds for the plaintiffs.

The Superior Court of Judicature of New Hampshire rendered a judgment upon this verdict for the defendant, which judgment has been brought before this court by writ of error. The single question now to be considered is, do the acts to which the verdict refers violate the constitution of the United States?

This court can be insensible neither to the magnitude nor delicacy of this question. The validity of a legislative act is to be examined; and the opinion of the highest law tribunal of a state is to be revised: an opinion which carries with it intrinsic evidence of the diligence, of the ability, and of the integrity, with which it was formed. On more than one occasion this court has expressed the cautious circumspection with which it approaches the consideration of such questions; and has declared that, in no doubtful case would it pronounce a legislative act to be contrary to the constitution. But the American people have said, in the Constitution of the United States, that "no state shall pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts." In the same instrument they have also said, "that the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution." On the judges of this court, then, is imposed the high and solemn duty of protecting, from even legislative violation, those contracts which the constitution of our country has placed beyond legislative control; and, however irksome the task may be, this is a duty from which we dare not shrink.

The title of the plaintiffs originates in a charter dated the 13th day of December, in the year 1769, incorporating twelve persons therein mentioned, by the name of "The Trustees of Dartmouth College," granting to them and their successors the usual corporate privileges and powers, and authorizing the trustees, who are to govern the college, to fill up all vacancies which may be created in their own body.

The defendant claims under three acts of the legislature of New Hampshire, the most material of which was passed on the 27th of June, 1816, and is entitled, "an act to amend the charter, and enlarge and improve the corporation of Dartmouth College." Among other alterations in the charter, this act increases the number of trustees to twenty-one, gives the appointment of the additional members to the executive of the state, and creates a board of overseers, with power to inspect and control the most important acts of the trustees. This board consists of twenty-five persons. The president of the senate, the speaker of the house of representatives, of New Hampshire, and the Governor and Lieutenant-Governor of Vermont, for the time being, are to be members ex officio. The board is to be completed by the Governor and council of New Hampshire, who are also empowered to fill all vacancies which may occur. The acts of the 18th and 26th of December are supplemental to that of the 27th of June, and are principally intended to carry that act into effect.

The majority of the trustees of the college have refused to accept this amended charter, and have brought this suit for the corporate property, which is in possession of a person holding by virtue of the acts which have been stated.

It can require no argument to prove that the circumstances of this case constitute a contract. An application is made to the crown for a charter to incorporate a religious and literary institution. In the application, it is stated that large contributions have been made for the object, which will be conferred on the corporation as soon as it shall be created. The charter is granted, and on its faith the property is conveyed. Surely in this transaction every ingredient of a complete and legitimate contract is to be found:

The points for consideration are:

1. Is this contract protected by the constitution of the United States?

2. Is it impaired by the acts under which the defendant holds? * * *

It becomes, then, the duty of the court most seriously to examine this charter, and to ascertain its true character. * * *

This is plainly a contract to which the donors, the trustees, and the crown (to whose rights and obligations New Hampshire succeeds), were the original parties. It is a contract made on a valuable consideration. It is a contract for the security and disposition of property. It is a contract, on the faith of which real and personal estate has been conveyed to the corporation. It is then a contract within the letter of the constitution, and within its spirit also, unless the fact that the property is invested by the donors in trustees for the promotion of religion and education, for the benefit of persons who are perpetually changing, though the objects remain the same, shall create a particular exception, taking this case out of the prohibition contained in the constitution. * * *

The opinion of the court, after mature deliberation, is, that this is a contract, the obligation of which cannot be impaired without violating the Constitution of the United States. This opinion appears to us to be equally supported by reason, and by the former decisions of this court. * * *

WASHINGTON, J.: * * * There are, then, two questions for this court to decide:

1st. Is the charter granted to Dartmouth College on the 13th of December, 1769, to be considered as a contract? If it be, then 2d., Do the laws in question impair its obligation?

1. What is a contract? It may be defined to be a transaction between two or more persons, in which each party comes under an obligation to the other, and each reciprocally acquires a right to whatever is promised by the other. Under this definition, says Mr. Powell, it is obvious that every feoffment, gift, grant, agreement, promise, etc., may be included, because in all there is a mutual consent of the minds of the parties concerned in them, upon an agreement, between them respecting some property or right that is the object of the stipulation. He adds, that the ingredients requisite to form a contract, are parties, consent, and an obligation to be created or dissolved; these must all concur, because the regular effect of all contracts is on one side to acquire, and on the other to part with, some property or rights; or to abridge, or to restrain natural liberty, by binding the parties to do, or restraining them from doing, something which before they might have done, or omitted. If a doubt could exist that a grant is a contract, the point was decided in the case of Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 87, 3 L.Ed. 162, in which it was laid down that a contract is either executory or executed; by the former, a party binds himself to do or not to do a particular thing; the latter is one in which the object of the contract is performed, and this differs in nothing from a grant; but whether executed or executory, they both contain obligations binding on the parties, and both are equally within the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, which forbids the state governments to pass laws impairing the obligation of contracts.

If, then, a grant be a contract, within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, the next inquiry is, whether the creation of a corporation by charter be such a grant as includes an obligation of the nature of a contract, which no state legislature can pass laws to impair.

A corporation is defined by Mr. Justice Blackstone to be a franchise. "It is," says he, "a franchise for a number of persons, to be incorporated and exist as a body politic, with a power to maintain perpetual succession, and to do corporate acts, and each individual of such corporation is also said to have a franchise, or freedom." This franchise, like other franchises, is an incorporeal hereditament, issuing out of something real or personal, or concerning or annexed to, and exercisable within a thing corporate. To this grant, or this franchise, the parties are, the king, and the persons for whose benefit it is created, or trustees for them. The assent of both is necessary. The subjects of the grant are not only privileges and immunities, but property, or, which is the same thing, a capacity to acquire and hold property in perpetuity. Certain obligations are created, binding both on the grantor and the grantees. On the part of the former, it amounts to an extinguishment of the king's prerogative to bestow the same identical franchise on another corporate body, because it would prejudice his prior grant. It implies, therefore, a contract not to re-assert the right to grant the franchise to another, or to impair it. There is also an implied contract, that the founder of a private charity, or his heirs, or other persons appointed by him for that purpose, shall have the right to visit, and to govern the corporation, of which he is the acknowledged founder and patron, and also, that in case of its dissolution, the reversionary rights of the founder to the property, with which he had endowed it, should be preserved inviolate.

The rights acquired by the other contracting party are those of having perpetual succession, of suing and being sued, of purchasing lands for the benefit of themselves and their successors, and of having a common seal, and of making by-laws. The obligation imposed upon them, and which forms the consideration of the grant, is that of acting up to the end or design for which they were created by their founder. Mr. Justice Buller, in the case of King v. Passmore, 3 T.R. 246, says, that the grant of a corporation is a compact between the crown and a number of persons, the latter of whom undertake, in consideration of the privileges bestowed, to exert themselves for the good government of the place, if they fail to perform their part of it, there is an end of the compact. The charter of a corporation, says Mr. Justice Blackstone, 2 Bl.Com. 484, may be forfeited through negligence, or abuse of its franchises, in which case the law judges that the body politic has broken the condition upon which it was incorporated, and thereupon the corporation is void.

It appears to me, upon the whole, that these principles and authorities prove, incontrovertibly, that a charter of incorporation is a contract. * * *

It has been shown that the charter is a contract on the part of the government, that the property with which the charity is endowed shall be forever vested in a certain number of persons, and their successors, to subserve the particular purposes designated by the founder, and to be managed in a particular way. If a law increases or diminishes the number of the trustees, they are not the persons which the grantor agreed should be the managers of the fund. If it appropriate the fund intended for the support of a particular charity to that of some other charity, or to an entirely different charity, the grant is in effect set aside, and a new contract substituted in its place; thus disappointing completely the intentions of the founder, by changing the objects of his bounty. And can it be seriously contended that a law which changes so materially the terms of a contract does not impair it? In short, does not every alteration of a contract, however unimportant, even though it be manifestly for the interest of the party objecting to it, impair its obligation? If the assent of all the parties to be bound by a contract be of its essence, how is it possible that a new contract, substituted for, or engrafted on another, without such assent, should not violate the old charter?

This course of reasoning, which appears to be perfectly manifest, is not without authority to support it. Mr. Justice Blackstone, lays it down, 2 Bl.Com. 37, that the same identical franchise, that has been before granted to one, cannot be bestowed on another; and the reason assigned is, that it would prejudice the former grant. In the King v. Passmore, 3 T.R. 246, Lord Kenyon says, that an existing corporation cannot have another charter obtruded upon it by the crown. It may reject it, or accept the whole, or any part of the new charter. The reason is obvious. A charter is a contract, to the validity of which the consent of both parties is essential, and, therefore, it cannot be altered or added to without such consent.

But the case of Terrett v. Taylor, 9 Cranch, 43, 3 L.Ed. 650, fully supports the distinction above stated, between civil and private corporations, and is entirely in point. It was decided in that case, that a private corporation, created by the legislature, may lose its franchises by misuser, or nonuser, and may be resumed by the government under a judicial judgment of forfeiture. In respect to public corporations which exist only for public purposes, such as towns, cities, etc., the legislature may, under proper limitations, change, modify, enlarge, or restrain them, securing, however, the property for the use of those for whom, and at whose expense, it was purchased. But it is denied that it has power to repeal statutes creating private corporations, or confirming to them property already acquired under the faith of previous laws; and that it can, by such repeal, vest the property of such corporations in the state, or dispose of the same to such purposes as it may please, without the consent or default of the corporators. Such a law, it is declared, would be repugnant both to the spirit and the letter of the constitution of the United States.

If these principles, before laid down, be correct, it cannot be denied that the obligations of the charter to Dartmouth College are impaired by the laws under consideration. * * *

Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the above acts of New Hampshire, not having received the assent of the corporate body of Dartmouth College, are not binding on them, and, consequently, that the judgment of the state court ought to be reversed.

JOHNSON, J., concurred, for the reasons stated by the CHIEF JUSTICE.

LIVINGSTON, J., concurred, for the reasons stated by the CHIEF JUSTICE, and JUSTICES WASHINGTON and STORY. * * *

DUVALL, J., dissented. * * *

NOTE

THE "CORPORATE CONTRACT"

The established doctrine is that a certificate of incorporation is a "contract". The word, as applied in this connection, has the eminent sponsorship of Chief Justice Marshall in the Dartmouth College case. With the word "contract" in their teeth, lawyers and judges proceeded to push the idea: "It is a well recognized principle of law that 'the charter of a corporation having a capital stock is a contract between three parties and forms the basis of three distinct contracts. The charter is a contract between the state and the corporation; second, it is a contract between the corporation and the stockholders; third, it is a contract between the stockholders and the state'". Thus the Court, in Garey v. St. Joe Mining Company, 32 Utah 497, 505, 91 P. 369, 371 (1907), quoting from 2 Cook on Corporations (5th edition) § 492.

This is all very well until it is examined analytically. Under a microscope it does not seem quite so clear. "Contract" can cover both generic classes of arrangements such as grants (a deed or gift is generically a "contract") and the more specialized agreements between parties binding both, of which the ordinary commercial contract is the classic example. Clearly lawyers and judges pushed Chief Justice Marshall's word from the generic into the commercial category; and difficulties appear at once. In the latter sense, a "contract" presupposes two parties able to contract; yet the corporation is not in existence; and until the state creates it, therefore, the word can hardly be applicable to any "agreement" between the state and the corporation. If anything, there is a state grant of privileges and powers to the corporation—and indeed it was a "grant" to which Chief Justice Marshall applied the protection of the Constitution in the Dartmouth College case.

Nor is there, in the common sense of the term, a "contract" between the incorporators or stockholders among themselves. There is a consensual relationship; by becoming an incorporator or buying stock, there is an intended acceptance of the arrangements outlined in the incorporation papers. It is perhaps not unduly stretching the commercial terminology to call this a "contract" though it is clearly a specialized variety. Certainly, for example as it will appear in these materials, preferred shareholders have agreed rights over against common shareholders to which both are held.

The so-called "contract" between a corporation and its shareholders is rather more hazy. In a generic sense, the relationship undoubtedly exists, just as there is a relationship which can be classified as "contractual" between a trustee and the beneficiary. The chief terms of the relationship arise quite as much from duties imposed by law on those managing the corporation in favor of the stockholders, as they do from any words appearing in statute or charter.

Probably clearer thinking is promoted by regarding the corporate arrangement as falling in the generic category of "contract" and thereafter regarding the arrangement as sui generis. But, with this distinct reservation, since the word "contract" is classic, it may continue to be used.

The "contract" is formal and can be made only in certain ways prescribed by the state, through its general incorporation acts. There are, it is true, a few ancient historical survivals of corporations by prescription: for instance, a Catholic bishopric, whose historical origin is lost in antiquity. Aside from these, the corporate arrangement must be made in a particular manner, and must be sanctified by the state in a particular manner—the detail differs from state to state according to the local statutes.

1. THE FUNCTION OF THE STATE IN THE CORPORATE CONTRACT

NOTE

MODIFICATION OF THE CORPORATE CONTRACT

A corporate charter when granted by the state falls under the constitutional protection against impairment of contract under the decision in the Dartmouth College case. Chief Justice Marshall threw out the suggestion that this undesirable state of affairs could be avoided if incorporation acts "reserved to the state" the right to "alter, amend and repeal" such charters, and from then on every state in fact did reserve such power by appropriate clauses in special or general incorporation acts. Marshall was, of course, endeavoring to protect the state.

But, as charters developed from legislative grants to permissive agreements, power to alter, amend or repeal changed its quality.

Undeniably the reserved power of alteration was retained by the state for all purposes; the legislature, for example, could pass an act striking out some of the broad powers which incorporators include in their charters under permissive acts.

But the rule does not necessarily work the other way around. A state, acting under this reserved power, may, by further legislative act, authorize the incorporators to include new and greater powers, or to change the arrangement they set up. If all parties in interest unanimously exercise the new permission, no question is raised. But if the state offers these new and larger permissions—which perhaps fundamentally change the nature of the relationship between stockholders—to be availed of by a majority vote, the effect is to hand over the power to "alter, amend or repeal" to a group of private persons who will exercise that power, not to effectuate some policy of the state, but to improve their own business position—possibly at the expense of the minority.

It may fairly be asked how far, under the reserved power, a state can do this. If done to effectuate state policy—say to increase production, or provide employment, plainly there is solid argument for the proposition. But this introduces another set of considerations.

Change in a corporate charter may be for the purpose of increasing the scope or efficiency of the business. Or it may be merely for the purpose of shifting property rights from one class of stockholders to another—the only business interest visible being the desire of the controlling class to take unto themselves a larger share of the profits and income, without materially assisting the enterprise as an enterprise, and certainly without the slightest thought of forwarding any policy of the state.

As will be seen, the statutory rules are broad enough to allow almost anything to be done. If there is restraint, it comes from outside—from the common law; from the fact that persons who manage, or who control, certain corporate powers are held to certain standards of conduct towards other associates in the corporation who do not have the same power. In this sense, there is slowly developing a common law of corporations analogous to the common law which protects beneficiaries against certain forms of conduct by trustees. But the battle is endless: the contest between the standards of the common law and the conception that voting or management might makes corporate right.

TOMLINSON v. JESSUP.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1872. 82 U.S. 454, 21 L.Ed. 204.

Appeal from the Circuit Court for the District of South Carolina.

MR. JUSTICE FIELD delivered the opinion of the court.

The constitution of South Carolina, adopted in 1868, declares that the property of corporations then existing or thereafter created, shall be subject to taxation, except in certain cases, not material to the present inquiry. The subsequent legislation of the State carried out this requirement and provided for the taxation of the property of railroad companies; and the question presented is, whether the act of December, 1855, to amend the charter of the Northeastern Railroad Company, exempted the property of that company from such taxation. The company was incorporated in 1851, and at that time a general law of the State was in existence, passed in 1841, which enacted that the charter of every corporation subsequently granted, and any renewal, amendment, or modification thereof, should be subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal by legislative authority, unless the act granting the charter or the renewal, amendment, or modification, in express terms excepted it from the operation of that law. The provisions of that law, therefore, constituted the condition upon which every charter of a corporation subsequently granted was held, and upon which every amendment or modification was made. They were as operative and as much a part of the charter and amendment, as if incorporated into them.

The act amending the charter of the Northeastern Railroad Company, passed in December, 1855, provided that the stock of the company, and the real estate it then owned, or might thereafter acquire, connected with or subservient to the works authorized by its charter, should be exempted from taxation during the continuance of the charter. This act contained no clause excepting the amendment from the provisions of the general law of 1841. It was, therefore, itself subject to repeal by force of that law.

It is true that the charter of the company when accepted by the corporators constituted a contract between them and the State, and that the amendment, when accepted, formed a part of the contract from that date and was of the same obligatory character. And it may be equally true, as stated by counsel, that the exemption from taxation added greatly to the value of the stock of the company, and induced the plaintiff to purchase the shares held by him. But these considerations cannot be allowed any weight in determining the validity of the subsequent taxation. The power reserved to the State by the law of 1841 authorized any change in the contract as it originally existed, or as subsequently modified, or its entire revocation. The original corporators, or subsequent stockholders, took their interests with knowledge of the existence of this power, and of the possibility of its exercise at any time in the discretion of the legislature. The object of the reservation, and of similar reservations in other charters, is to prevent a grant of corporate rights and privileges in a form which will preclude legislative interference with their exercise if the public interest should at any time require such interference. It is a provision intended to preserve to the State control over its contract with the corporators, which without that provision would be irrepealable and protected from any measures affecting its obligation. * * *

The reservation affects the entire relation between the State and the corporation, and places under legislative control all rights, privileges, and immunities derived by its charter directly from the State. Rights acquired by third parties, and which have become vested under the charter, in the legitimate exercise of its powers, stand upon a different footing; but of such rights it is unnecessary to speak here. The State only asserts in the present case the power under the reservation to modify its own contract with the corporators; it does not contend for a power to revoke the contracts of the corporation with other parties, or to impair any vested rights thereby acquired.

Decree reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to Dismiss the suit.

GREENWOOD v. UNION FREIGHT RAILWAY COMPANY.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1881. 105 U.S. 13, 26 L.Ed. 961.

Argued Dec. 8, 1881. Decided Mar. 13, 1882.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts. The case is stated by the court. * * *

MR. JUSTICE MILLER delivered the opinion of the court.

The appellant, Greenwood, a citizen of the State of New York, brings his bill of complaint, in the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts, against the Union Freight Railroad Company, a corporation established by the laws of Massachusetts; against the Marginal Freight Railroad Company, likewise a Massachusetts corporation; against the City of Boston, its Mayor and Aldermen by name, and against the Directors of the Marginal Freight Railroad Company, all citizens of Massachusetts.

The Union Freight Railroad Company demurred to the bill, and the demurrer was sustained and the bill dismissed. It is this decree which we are called on to review on appeal taken by complainant.

The case made by the bill is that the Marginal Freight Railroad Company, which we shall hereafter call the Marginal Company, was organized under an Act of the Legislature of Massachusetts, of the date of April 26, 1867, to build and operate a railroad through various streets in the City of Boston, "With all the privileges and subject to all the duties, restrictions and liabilities set forth in the general laws which now are or may hereafter be in force, relating to street railway corporations, so far as they are applicable." The right of way of this company for part of its route lay over the line of a railway previously granted to the Commercial Freight Railroad Company, and the Marginal Company, by virtue of a provision in its charter, purchased and paid the Commercial Company for the joint use of its track, so far as it ran through the same streets. Afterwards, on May 6, 1872, the Legislature of Massachusetts incorporated, by an Act of that date, the Union Freight Railroad Company, which by virtue of its charter and the authority of the Board of Aldermen of Boston, was authorized to run its track through the same streets and over the same ground covered by the track of the Marginal Company, and to take possession of the track of that and any other street railroad company on payment of compensation. This latter Act also repealed the charter of the Marginal Company.

Sections four, six and seven of this Act constitute the foundation of complainant's grievance, because they are said to impair the obligation of the contract found in the charter of the Marginal Company and, as they are short, they are here given verbatim.

"Section 4. Said corporation may, within its authorized limits, and for the purposes of this Act, enter upon and use any part of the tracks of any other street railroad, and may suitably strengthen and improve such tracks; and if the corporations cannot agree upon the manner and conditions of such entry and use, or the compensation to be paid therefor, the same shall be determined in accordance with the provisions of the thirty-eighth section of chapter three hundred and eighty-one of the acts of the year eighteen hundred and seventy-one.

"Sec. 6. Said corporation shall, within four months from the passage of this Act, take the tracks, or any part thereof, of the Marginal Freight Railway Company, subject to the laws relating to the taking of land by railroad companies and the compensation to be made therefor.

"Sec. 7. Chapter one hundred and seventy of the Acts of the year eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, entitled an 'Act to Incorporate the Marginal Freight Railway Company,' and so much of chapter four hundred and sixty-one of the Acts of the year eighteen hundred and sixty-nine as relates to said Marginal Freight Railway Company, are hereby repealed."

The bill avers that the Union Freight Railroad Company has been organized, and is about to proceed in such a manner under this Act that the Marginal Company will be utterly destroyed, and its several contracts, franchises, rights, easements and properties will be impaired and destroyed, and the stock of complainant in said company will be destroyed and made valueless, and he will sustain irreparable damage and mischief.

Complainant then alleges that he had requested and urged the directors of the Marginal Company to take steps to assert the rights and franchises of the company against what he believes to be unconstitutional legislation, and that they had declined and refused to do so. He also sets out a vote or resolution of said directors, in which they respond to his demand by saying that the assertion of the rights of the corporation in the state courts is accompanied with so many embarrassments that they decline to attempt it. The prayer of the bill is for an injunction against all the defendants to prevent these acts so injurious to the rights of the Marginal Freight Railroad Company. * * *

As none of the defendants are charged with a purpose to exercise any power or to perform any acts not authorized by the terms of the Act of May 6, 1872, the remaining question to be decided is, whether the features of that Act to which complainant objects in his bill are beyond the power of the Legislature of Massachusetts, or are forbidden by anything in the Constitution of the United States.

These exercises of power in the statute complained of are divisible into two:

1. The repeal of the charter of the Marginal Company.
2. The authority vested in the Union Company to take its track for the use of the latter Company.

It is the argument of counsel, pressed upon us with such vigor, that the two taken together constitute a transfer of the property of the one corporation to the other, and with it all the corporate franchises, rights and powers belonging to the elder corporation.

We are not insensible to the force of the argument as thus stated; and we think it must be conceded that, according to the unvarying decisions of this court, the unconditional repeal of the charter of the Marginal Company is void under the Constitution of the United States, as impairing the obligation of the contract made by the acceptance of the charter between the corporators of that company and the State, unless it is made valid by that provision of the General Statutes of Massachusetts, called the reservation clause, concerning Acts of incorporation; or unless it falls within some enactment covered by that part of its own charter, which makes it "subject to all the duties, restrictions and liabilities set forth in the general laws, which now are or may hereafter be in force, relating to street railway corporations, so far as they may be applicable."

The first of these reservations of legislative power over corporations is found in section 41 of chapter 68 of the General Statutes of Massachusetts, in the following language: "Every Act of incorporation passed after the eleventh day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-one, shall be subject to amendment, alteration or repeal at the pleasure of the Legislature."

It would be difficult to supply language more comprehensive or expressive than this.

Such an Act may be amended; that is, it may be changed by additions to its terms or by qualifications of the same. It may be altered by the same power, and it may be repealed. What is it may be repealed? It is the Act of incorporation. It is this organic law on which the corporate existence of the company depends which may be repealed, so that it shall cease to be a law; or the Legislature may adopt the milder course of amending the law in matters which need amendment, or altering it when it needs substantial change. All this may be done at the pleasure of the Legislature. That body need give no reason for its action in the matter. The validity of such action does not depend on the necessity for it, or on the soundness of the reasons which prompted it. This expression "the pleasure of the Legislature," is significant and is not found in many of the similar statutes in other states.

This statute having been the settled law of Massachusetts and representing her policy on an important subject for nearly fifty years before the incorporation of the Marginal Company, we cannot doubt the authority of the Legislature of Massachusetts to repeal that charter. Nor is this seriously questioned by counsel for appellant; and it may, therefore, be assumed that if the repealing clause of the Act of May 6, 1872, stood alone, its validity must be conceded. Crease v. Babcock, 23 Pick. (Mass.) 334, 34 Am.Dec. 61; Erie & N. E. R. Co. v. Casey, 26 Pa. 287; Pennsylvania College Cases, 13 Wall. 190, 20 L.Ed. 550; 2 Kent.Com. 306. * * *

If the essence of the grant of the charter be to operate a railroad, and to use the streets of the city for that purpose, it can no longer so use the streets of the city, and no longer exercise the franchise of running a railroad in the city. In short, whatever power is dependent solely upon the grant of the charter, and which could not be exercised by unincorporated private persons under the general laws of the State, is abrogated by the repeal of the law which granted these special rights.

Personal and real property acquired by the corporation during its lawful existence, rights of contract, or choses in action so acquired, and which do not, in their nature, depend upon the general powers conferred by the charter, are not destroyed by such a repeal, and the courts may, if the Legislature does not provide some special remedy, enforce such rights by the means within their power. The rights of the shareholders of such a corporation, to their interest in its property, are not annihilated by such a repeal, and there must remain in the courts the power to protect those rights.

And while we are conscious that no definition, at once comprehensive and satisfactory can be here laid down of what those rights and powers are that remain to the stockholders and creditors of such a corporation after the Act of repeal, we are of opinion that the foregoing observations are sufficient for the case before us. * * *

It results from this view of the subject that whatever right remained in the Marginal Company to its rolling stock, its horses, its harness, its stables, the debts due to it, and the funds on hand, if any, it no longer had the right to run its cars through the streets or any of the streets of Boston. It no longer had the right to cumber these streets with a railroad track which it could not use, for these belonged by law to no person of right, and were vested in defendants only by virtue of the repealed charter.

It was, therefore, in the power of the Massachusetts Legislature to grant to another corporation, as it did, the authority to operate a street railroad through the same streets and over the same ground previously occupied by the Marginal Company. Whether this action was oppressive or unjust in view of the public good, or whether the Legislature was governed by sufficient reason in thus repealing the charter of one company and in chartering another at the same time to perform as part of its functions the duties required of the first, is not, as we have seen, a judicial question in this case. * * *

Nor are we satisfied of the soundness of the argument of counsel, that the clause in the Marginal Company's charter, which declares it to be subject to the restrictions and liabilities contained in the general laws relating to street railways, withdraws it from the operation of the 41st section of chapter 68 of the general laws of the State. The latter clause declares all Acts of incorporation subject to its provisions. This subjection is not impaired by the fact that a particular corporation is made by its charter subject to other laws also of a general character.

We are of opinion that the question of the repeal of the charter of the Marginal Company is to be decided by the construction of the general statute, whose effect and history we have discussed.

These considerations require the affirmance of the decree of the Circuit Court sustaining the demurrer to appellant's bill; and it is so ordered.

LOOKER v. MAYNARD ex rel. DUSENBURY.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1900. 179 U.S. 46, 21 S.Ct. 21.

In Error to the Supreme Court of the State of Michigan to review a decision sustaining the constitutionality of a statute permitting stockholders to cumulate their votes for directors. Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE GRAY, after stating the case, delivered the opinion of the court:

The single question in this case is whether a power, reserved by the Constitution of a state to its legislature, to alter, amend, or repeal future acts of incorporation, authorizes the legislature, in order (as declared in the title of the statute of Michigan now in question) "to secure the minority of stockholders, in corporations organized under general laws, the power of electing a representative membership in boards of directors," to permit each stockholder to cumulate his votes upon any one or more candidates for directors.

By the decision in the leading case of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518, 4 L.Ed. 629, it was established that a charter from the state to a private corporation created a contract within the meaning of the clause in the Constitution of the United States forbidding any state to pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts; and consequently that a statute of the state of New Hampshire, increasing the number of the trustees of Dartmouth College as fixed by its charter, and providing for the appointment of a majority of the trustees by the executive government of New Hampshire, instead of by the board of trustees as the charter provided, was unconstitutional and void.

Mr. Justice Story, in his concurring opinion in that case, after declaring that in his judgment it was "perfectly clear that any act of a legislature which takes away any powers or franchises vested by its charter in a private corporation, or its corporate officers, or which restrains or controls the legitimate exercise of them, or transfers them to other persons, without its assent, is a violation of the obligations of that charter," took occasion to add: "If the legislature mean to claim such an authority, it must be reserved in the grant." 4 Wheat. 712, 4 L.Ed. 677.

After that decision, many a state of the Union, in order to secure to its legislature the exercise of a fuller parliamentary or legislative power over corporations than would otherwise exist, inserted, either in its statutes or in its Constitution, a provision that charters thenceforth granted should be subject to alteration, amendment, or repeal at the pleasure of the legislature. See Greenwood v. Union Freight R. Co., 105 U.S. 13, 20, 21, 26 L.Ed. 961, 965. The effect of such a provision, whether contained in an original act of incorporation, or in a constitution or general law subject to which a charter is accepted, is, at the least, to reserve to the legislature the power to make any alteration or amendment of a charter subject to it, which will not defeat or substantially impair the object of the grant, or any right vested under the grant, and which the legislature may deem necessary to carry into effect the purpose of the grant, or to protect the rights of the public or of the corporation, its stockholders or creditors, or to promote the due administration of its affairs. Sherman v. Smith, 1 Black, 587, 17 L.Ed. 163; Miller v. New York, 15 Wall. 478, 21 L.Ed. 98; Holyoke Water Power Co. v. Lyman, 15 Wall. 500, 21 L.Ed. 133; Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U.S. 700, 720, 721, sub nom. Union P. R. Co. v. United States, 25 L.Ed. 496, 502; Close v. Glenwood Cemetery, 107 U.S. 466, 27 L.Ed. 408, 2 S.Ct. 267; Spring Valley Waterworks Co. v. Schottler, 110 U.S. 347, 28 L.Ed. 173, 4 S.Ct. 48; New York & N. E. R. Co. v. Bristol, 151 U.S. 556, 38 L.Ed. 269, 14 S.Ct. 437.

As illustrations of the right of the legislature, exercising such a reserved power, to alter for the future the liability of stockholders to creditors of the corporation, or the mode of computing the votes of stockholders for directors, it will be sufficient to state two of the cases just cited. * * *

Remembering that the Dartmouth College Case (which was the cause of the general introduction into the legislation of the several states of a provision reserving the power to alter, amend, or repeal acts of incorporation) concerned the right of a legislature to make a change in the number and mode of appointment of the trustees or managers of a corporation, we cannot assent to the theory that an express reservation of the general power does not secure to the legislature the right to exercise it in this respect.

Judgment affirmed.

STOCKHOLDERS OF THE PEOPLES BANKING COMPANY v. STERLING, RECEIVER.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1937. 300 U.S. 175, 57 S.Ct. 386.

MR. JUSTICE CARDOZO delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * The Constitution of Maryland provides that "the General Assembly shall grant no charter for Banking purposes * * * except upon the condition that the Stockholders shall be liable to the amount of their respective share or shares of stock in such Banking Institution, for all its debts and liabilities upon note, bill or otherwise." Maryland Constitution, 1867, Article III, § 39. This provision was effective without more to impose a substantive liability upon stockholders in banks. Ghingher v. Bachtell, supra, pp. 688, 690. On the other hand, it did not take from the legislature the power to implement the liability with statutory remedies, nor in the absence of such statutes did it take that power from the courts. Ghingher v. Bachtell, supra. In January, 1910, when the Smithsburg bank was organized, the only applicable statute was Chapter 206 of the Acts of 1870. The Act shows by its title that it is one "to create State Banking Institutions to enable the several Banks in this State—State and National—to avail of the provisions thereof." It provides (§ 11) that "the continuance of the said several corporations shall be on the condition that the stockholders and directors of each of said corporations shall be liable to the amount of their respective share or shares of stock in such corporation, for all its debts and liabilities upon note, bill or otherwise, and upon this further condition, that this Act and every part of it may be altered from time to time, or repealed by the Legislature." The Maryland courts have held in a series of decisions that the liability thus recognized was not enforcible by the bank itself in the event of its insolvency, or by a liquidator or receiver suing in its behalf. * * The right of action was no part of the assets of the insolvent corporation. The meaning of the statute was thought to be that every creditor of the corporation in assuming that relation acquired for his individual use, and not as a class representative, a supplemental right of action against the holders of the shares. To rationalize this right of action, it was said to rest upon an implied contract between the creditor on the one side and on the other the holders of the shares at the creation of the debt. Ghingher v. Bachtell, supra. Contract being the basis of the statutory remedy, the courts deduced the consequence that the liability did not extend to stockholders who became such after the debt was in existence. For the same reason any stockholder was free to reduce his liability by the use of set-offs or counterclaims available at the time of suit against the primary obligor. Ghingher v. Bachtell, supra, p. 694; Cahill v. Original Big Gun Ass'n, 94 Md. 353, 50 A. 1044.

In June, 1910, less than five months after the incorporation of this bank, a statute was enacted abrogating the remedy under the then existing statute and substituting another. Acts of 1910, c. 219; Maryland Code, Article II, § 72 "Stockholders of every bank and trust company shall be held individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all contracts, debts and engagements of every such corporation, to the extent of the amount of their stock therein, at the par value thereof, in addition to the amount invested in such stock * * * and the liability of such stockholders shall be an asset of the corporation for the benefit ratably of all the depositors and creditors of any such corporation, if necessary to pay the debts of such corporation, and shall be enforceable only by appropriate proceedings by a receiver, assignee or trustee of such corporation acting under the orders of a court of competent jurisdiction." A like remedy had previously been created against stockholders in trust companies. Acts of 1904, c. 101; Acts of 1908, c. 153. Through these amendatory acts, the cause of action formerly enforcible by the creditors separately, each suing for himself, became enforcible by the receiver as the representative of all. As a consequence of the new procedure, the assessment was to be laid upon all the holders of shares at the time of liquidation without reference to their relation to the bank at the creation of the debts, though stockholders dropping out sooner might escape a liability which under the earlier law would have clung to them indefinitely. Moreover, offsets and counterclaims were no longer to be available to reduce the several assessments and thus establish inequality. Stockholders when sued by the receiver would contribute to the fund ratably, and then prove their claims against the bank in the same way as other creditors. Such in outline is the effect of the statutory changes as the highest court of Maryland has defined them in this very case.

Do changes of that order impair the obligation of a contract between the corporation and the stockholders in contravention of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States?

The answer must be "no," and this for two reasons, first, because the changes are directed to the implementing remedies rather than the substantive liability, and second, because a change of substantive liability was made permissible by the reservation of a power of alteration or repeal.

(1) The obligation laid upon the shareholders by the Maryland Constitution, though susceptible of legislative and judicial regulation in respect of the mode of its enforcement, was a substantive liability to which every stockholder subjected himself upon the acquisition of his stock. The legislature did not exhaust the measure of that constitutional liability by the creation of a particular remedial device. The remedy adopted was interpreted judicially as having in view a suit by a creditor against the particular group of stockholders who had undertaken by implication to answer for his debt. This does not mean that a different form of remedy, for example a suit by a receiver, would have been a departure from the Constitution, if the statute had prescribed that method of enforcement. The broad but indefinite words of the constitutional command gave permission to the legislature to establish any remedies reasonably appropriate to the general end in view. Cf. Whitman v. Oxford National Bank, 176 U.S. 559, 562, 20 S.Ct. 477, 478; Bernheimer v. Converse, 206 U.S. 516, 529, 27 S.Ct. 755, 759. So, the broad but indefinite words of the legislation first adopted, the Act of 1870, gave freedom to the courts to develop through the process of construction a cause of action enforcible at the instance of a creditor without asserting in so doing that a different cause of action, enforcible through a receiver, would have been an inappropriate implement of the constitutional liability, in the event that the legislature or the courts had chosen to adopt it. Stockholders who became such while the first statute was in force were chargeable with notice that a new remedy might be adopted if the one first chosen was inadequate. They would have been chargeable with such notice though nothing had been said. They were chargeable, as it happens, by the wording of the statute, the charter being granted upon the condition that the Act or any part of it might be altered or repealed.

The remedy first established was found to be unworkable. Ghingher v. Bachtell, supra, at p. 692; Murphy v. Wheatley, 102 Md. 501, 515, 63 A 62. Still acting within the limits of the constitutional command, the legislature of Maryland announced another remedy, less unwieldy and confusing. In the view of the state court, the substantive liability as the Constitution had created it was the same under the new procedure as it has been from the beginning. Ghingher v. Bachtell, supra. The court was far from holding that the statute had enlarged it. What had happened was merely this, that another remedy had been established to implement a liability created long ago. * * We cannot see in this an attempt to lay upon the stockholders by force of later legislation a new and different burden from that accepted at the outset. Nor would it help the appellants anything to assume in their behalf that the Constitution of the State has been given a new meaning, if the new meaning is not due to the compulsion of a statute. Change by judicial construction of antecedent legislation does not impair a contract, at least in the forbidden sense, if it be granted arguendo that such a change can be discovered. * * * The new meaning, if there is any, is not ascribed to the Constitution because a later statute has said it must be done. The new meaning is the product of the independent judgment of a court. So the state court has told us, and the good faith of its declaration is not successfully impeached. Broad River Power Co. v. South Carolina, 281 U.S. 537, 540, 50 S.Ct. 401, 402. To changes thus wrought the Constitution of the United States does not offer an impediment.

(2) The result would not be different if the effect of the statutory amendments were to be viewed as an enlargement of the substantive liability for debts afterwards contracted, the enlargement being applicable to stockholders without exception, present as well as future. The charter was accepted subject to the condition that the personal liability then prescribed by statute should be subject thereafter to repeal or alteration. This court has held that when such a condition attaches to a charter, there is no unconstitutional change of the obligation of a contract by a subsequent enlargement of the liability of stockholders as to debts afterwards contracted, though the shares so affected were acquired before the change was made. * * * Stockholders who subscribe to stock subject to such a condition assume the risk that their relation to the corporation may be altered to their prejudice. Nor is their position any stronger because the new liability is heavier (if so it be assumed to be) than that imposed upon them directly by the Constitution of the State. The constitutional liability is not a maximum, but a minimum, and the legislature does not transcend the bounds of legislative power by increasing it thereafter. * * *

McNULTY v. W. & J. SLOANE.

Supreme Court of New York, Special Term, 1945. 184 Misc. 835, 54 N.Y.S.2d 253.

SHIENTAG, JUSTICE. * * * "Vested right" was indeed a term susceptible of many shades of meaning, a term which had not been clearly defined in the cases. Whenever the court was of the opinion that certain rights of stockholders could not be interfered with, they characterized those rights as "vested." The doctrine of vested rights was found to be inadequate as a general test.

2. RIGHTS OF MODIFICATION OF THE CORPORATE CONTRACT RESERVED TO THE DIRECTORS OR TO A MAJORITY OF THE STOCKHOLDERS

NOTE

MODIFICATION OF CHARTERS WHERE THE CHIEF EFFECT IS TO CHANGE PROPERTY RIGHTS AS BETWEEN ASSOCIATES

It is the belief of the editors that there is a clear distinction between (a) modification of a corporate charter by corporate action for the purpose of giving additional ease or representative quality to management or of enlarging the scope of its business activities, and (b) modification merely for the purpose of changing property rights within the corporation.

The first class of changes are designed primarily to aid the enterprise as a whole, and the benefits presumably flow to all concerned. Here presumption may safely be indulged that the changes sought benefit the business.

But in the second class of cases—modification of property or other rights as between the one group of associates and another—, in strict logic the presumption is not warranted. There is a wide difference, for example, between an amendment to a corporate charter authorizing it to enter a new form of business or changing its voting rights so that there shall be cumulative voting representing minorities as well as majorities; and a modification which cuts off the rights of a cumulative preferred stock to receive its accrued cumulative dividends, so that the common stock can tap the profit stream for its own advantage instead of paying up arrearages. There is not necessarily a presumption, in this latter case, as it seems to the editors, that a business interest of the corporation is being served. And, clearly, there is no state policy involved. Permission to change the charter in this respect would seem not to be absolute and beyond control of the courts, but to be merely a power given by the state to the corporation, exercisable only under general common law restraint that the management or the majority (as the case may be) must use it for the general benefit, and not to advantage one group of shareholders against another.

Manifestly, special circumstances may exist when the sacrifice of rights by one group is needed or useful to preserve or forward the interests of the entire corporation—as where sacrificing the rights of cumulative preferred stockholders to arrears of dividends may be needed in order to permit the flotation of an issue of common stock which will save the corporation from financial embarrassment. But it would seem that the burden rests on the group proposing the change to show that a general corporate interest was involved—and not the desire of one group to eliminate for its own benefit rights previously given.

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW

§ 35. Change of purposes, powers or provisions, or number of directors or location of office. A stock corporation may effect one or more of the following changes:

(A) To extend, limit, or otherwise change its purposes and powers or other provisions of its certificate of incorporation;

(B) To increase or reduce the number of its directors, or to provide that the number of directors shall be not less than a stated minimum nor more than a stated maximum; but in neither case below the minimum number prescribed by law;

(C) To change the location of its office, if it is not a moneyed corporation:

By filing a certificate which shall be entitled and endorsed "Certificate of (stating the nature of the change to be accomplished) of (name of corporation) pursuant to section thirty-five of the stock corporation law" and state:

1. The name of the corporation, and, if it has been changed, the name under which it was originally incorporated;

2. The date of filing of the certificate of incorporation in each state office where filed, or, if the corporation is created by a special law and has no certificate of incorporation, the chapter number and year of passage of such law;

3. The purposes, powers or provisions, if any, to be amended or eliminated, and the purposes, powers or provisions, if any, to be added or substituted;

4. If the number of directors is to be increased or reduced, the number previously authorized and the number as increased or reduced;

5. If the location of the office of the corporation is to be changed, the city, town or village and the county in which its office is located, and the city, town or village and the county to which it is to be removed.

Provided, (a) that no change shall be made under this section which can be made under any other section of this chapter or under any other corporate law; (b) that no corporation organized under a general law shall amend its certificate of incorporation hereunder to embody therein any purpose, power or provision which would not be authorized if its original certificate including such additional purposes, powers or provisions were offered for filing at the time the certificate under this section is so offered, and (c) that no corporation organized by or under any special law shall change the general character of its business as authorized by such special law.

The number of directors may be increased under this section, notwithstanding the maximum number prescribed by law.

Such certificate shall be either:

a. Subscribed and acknowledged by every subscriber of the certificate of incorporation and every subscriber to stock, and shall have annexed an affidavit by one of the subscribers of the certificate of incorporation to the effect that no stock has been issued and that the persons who have executed the certificate constitute all of the subscribers of the certificate of incorporation and all of the subscribers to stock; or

b. Subscribed and acknowledged, in person or by proxy, by the holders of record of all of the outstanding shares of the corporation entitled to vote thereon, and shall have annexed an affidavit by the secretary or an assistant secretary of the corporation that the persons who have executed the certificate, in person or by proxy, constitute the holders of record of all of the outstanding shares of the corporation entitled to vote thereon; or

c. Subscribed and acknowledged by the president or a vice-president and the secretary or an assistant secretary, who shall make and annex an affidavit stating that they have been authorized to execute and file such certificate by the votes, cast in person or by proxy, of the holders of record of two-thirds of the outstanding shares of the corporation entitled to vote thereon, if the change be made under subdivision (A) of this section, or of the holders of record of a majority of such shares if the change be made under subdivision (B) or (C) of this section, and that such votes were cast at a stockholders' meeting held on a date specified upon notice pursuant to section forty-five of the stock corporation law.

No such certificate shall be filed by a banking corporation unless the approval of the superintendent of banks, nor by an insurance corporation unless the approval of the superintendent of insurance, be endorsed thereon.

Such certificate shall be filed in each state office in which its certificate of incorporation is filed, and in every case a certified copy thereof or a duplicate original shall be filed in the office of the clerk of the county in which the office of the corporation is located and if such certificate changes the location of the office of the corporation, it shall be filed in the office of the clerk of the county to which its office is to be removed. If the corporation was created by a special law and has no certificate of incorporation, such certificate shall be filed in the office of the superintendent of banks if a banking corporation, in the office of the superintendent of insurance if an insurance corporation, and in the office of the secretary of state, if it is neither a banking or insurance corporation.

(a) Amendments Affecting the Extent and Operation of the Enterprise

DURFEE v. OLD COLONY & FALL RIVER RAILROAD COMPANY.

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1862. 5 Allen (87 Mass.) 230.

Bill in equity brought by the plaintiff, a minor, by John S. Brayton, his guardian, to restrain the defendants, a railroad corporation established under the law of this commonwealth, and the directors thereof, from proceeding to act under St.1861, c. 156, authorizing them to extend their railroad to the line of the State of Rhode Island, or under St.1862, c. 149, authorizing their union with the Newport and Fall River Railroad Company.

The case was heard upon the bill, answer and demurrers, before the chief justice, and reserved for the determination of the whole court. The arguments upon the questions of jurisdiction and pleading are omitted.

BIGELOW, C. J. We do not deem it necessary to consider the questions raised by the demurrer to the bill, nor to discuss the nature or extent of the jurisdiction of this court in equity over corporations, at the suit of one or more of their stockholders, in cases where there has been an excess or abuse of the power or authority conferred by legislative grants. In the view which we have taken of the merits of the case, these questions become immaterial.

The case for the plaintiff mainly rests on the single proposition of law, that a corporation established by the legislature of this commonwealth, by acts which, under St.1830, c. 81, are subject to alteration, amendment or repeal, at the pleasure of the legislature, cannot engage in any new enterprise or enter upon any new undertaking, in addition to that contemplated by and embraced in the original charter of the company, against the consent of any one of its stockholders, although such new enterprise or undertaking is of the same kind with that for which the corporation was originally established, and is authorized, sanctioned and adopted by an express legislative grant, and by a vote of the majority of the stockholders duly ascertained according to law. * * *

We suppose it may be stated as an indisputable proposition, that every person who becomes a member of a corporation aggregate by purchasing and holding shares agrees by necessary implication that he will be bound by all acts and proceedings, within the scope of the powers and authority conferred by the majority of the corporation, duly taken and ascertained according to law. This is the unavoidable result of the fundamental principle that the majority of the stockholders can regulate and control the lawful exercise of the powers conferred on a corporation by its charter. A holder of shares in an incorporated body, so far as his individual rights and interests may be involved in the doings of the corporation, acting within the legitimate sphere of its corporate power, has no other legal control over them than that which he can exercise by his single vote in the meetings of the company. To this extent he has parted with his personal right or privilege to regulate the disposition of that portion of his property which he has invested in the capital stock of the corporation, and surrendered it to the will of a majority of his fellow corporators. The jus disponendi is vested in them so long as they keep within the line of the general purpose and object for which the corporation was established, although their action may be against the will of a minority, however large. It cannot, therefore, be justly said that the contract, express or implied, between the corporation and the stockholders is infringed or impaired by any act or proceeding of the former which is authorized by a majority, and which comes within the terms of the original statute creating and establishing their franchise, and conferring on them capacity to exercise control over the rights and property of their members. On the contrary, the fair and reasonable implication resulting from the legal relation of the stockholder and the corporation is, that the majority may do any act either coming within the scope of the corporate authority, or which is consistent with the terms and conditions of the original charter, without and even against the consent of an individual member.

Such being the nature of the contract which subsists between the corporation and each of its members, we have only to inquire, in the present case, whether it has been in any respect violated by the present defendants. The answer to this inquiry will be found in the interpretation which is put on that clause of the general laws of this commonwealth already cited, by which a right is reserved to the legislature to amend, alter or repeal any act of incorporation which has been established by its authority since the enactment of that provision in St.1830. Whatever may be the extent of the authority which is thereby retained by the legislature to modify or change the charters of corporations without or against their consent, there would seem to be no reason to doubt that, with the concurrence of the corporation manifested in the mode pointed out by law, the legislature may make any alteration in or addition to the power and authority conferred by the original act of incorporation, and not foreign to the purposes and objects for which it was enacted, and which it was designed to accomplish, which may seem to be expedient or necessary. No breach of contract would be thereby occasioned. Such action would be in precise accordance with the terms on which the grant of the franchise was made. In creating a corporation, no contract is made by the legislature with the individual members or stockholders, any further than they are represented by the artificial body which the act of incorporation calls into being. They have no other rights except those which exist or grow out of the constitution of the body corporate of which they are members. To this only can we look, in order to ascertain whether there has been any breach of contract or violation of chartered rights. It constitutes, of itself, the contract by which the rights of all parties are to be governed. When, therefore, it is expressly provided between the legislature on the one hand and the corporation on the other, as part of the original contract of incorporation, that the former may change or modify or abrogate it or any portion of it, it cannot be said that any contract is broken or infringed when the power thus reserved is exercised with the consent of the artificial body of whose original creation and existence such reservation formed an essential part. The stockholder cannot say that he became a member of the corporation on the faith of an agreement made by the legislature with the corporation, that the original act of incorporation should undergo no change except with his assent. * * * The real contract into which the stockholder enters with the corporation is, that he agrees to become a member of an artificial body which is created and has its existence by virtue of a contract with the legislature, which may be amended or changed with the consent of the company, ascertained and declared in the mode pointed out by law. Having, by virtue of the relation which subsists between himself and the corporation as a holder of shares, assented to the terms of the original act of incorporation, he cannot be heard to say that he will not be bound by a vote of the majority of the stockholders accepting an amendment or alterations of the charter made in pursuance of an express authority reserved to the legislature, and which by such acceptance has become binding on the corporation. Such we understand to be the result of the adjudicated cases. In Crease v. Babcock, 23 Pick. (Mass.) 342, 34 Am.Dec. 61, it was expressly decided that corporators, by accepting a charter, directly agree to adopt the provision reserving to the legislature the right to amend, alter or repeal the act of incorporation as a constituent part of their contract; and it has often been decided, under similar provisions in the statutes of other states, that amendments or changes, either abridging the corporate authority or enlarging and extending it so as to embrace new enterprises and to incur additional burdens and liabilities, when duly adopted by the corporation, are valid and binding on a dissenting minority, as well as on those corporators by whose votes the amending act has been accepted and approved. Buffalo & N. Y. C. Railroad Co. v. Dudley, 14 N.Y. 336, 348, 354; Northern Railroad v. Miller, 10 Barb. (N.Y.) 282; Southern Bay Meadow Dam Co. v. Gray, 30 Me. 547; Oldtown & L. Railroad Co. v. Veazie, 39 Me. 580; Banet v. Alton & S. Railroad Co., 13 Ill. 504.

It was urged, as a grave objection against the doctrine above stated, that it puts the minority of the stockholders of a corporation entirely within the control of the legislature and a majority of the stockholders, and that there would be no limit or restraint placed on the exercise of the power, so that corporations might be diverted to purposes and objects wholly foreign to those for which they were originally established, and stockholders might be made to participate against their will in undertakings which they never contemplated and which they deemed inexpedient or ruinous. If this be so, it is a consequence of which no stockholder can reasonably complain, because it is a result which flows from the contract into which he has voluntarily entered. * * *

Bill dismissed.

ZABRISKIE v. HACKENSACK & NEW YORK RAILROAD COMPANY.

Court of Chancery of New Jersey, 1867. 18 N.J.Eq. 178, 90 Am.Dec. 617.

THE CHANCELLOR. The Hackensack and New York Railroad Company was incorporated in 1856, with power to construct a railroad from Hackensack to the Paterson and Hudson River Railroad, with a capital stock of two hundred dollars, and with power to mortgage its road and lands, franchises and appurtenances, to the amount of fifty thousand dollars. Under this act, it laid out, located, and built a road five miles in length, terminating at Essex street, in Hackensack, within one mile of the court-house, as required by the charter. It borrowed thirty thousand dollars, for which it gave a mortgage upon the road and its equipment, franchises, and other property. By a supplement to this charter, passed March 12th, 1861, it was authorized to extend the road northwardly to Nanent, on the Erie railway, in the state of New York, a distance of about twelve miles, to increase the capital stock to any extent required, and to issue bonds to the amount of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, which, in the words of the act, were "for the construction and equipment of the road to be constructed under this act, and to secure the payment of said bonds, the said company shall have power to mortgage the said road, with its franchises and chartered rights."

In 1861, the company extended its road under this supplement to a point on Passaic street, in the village of Hackensack, more than a mile from the court-house, the length of the extension being about a mile. After this, it executed a new mortgage upon the whole road, as extended, and its equipments, and its franchises and chartered rights, to secure the payment of ten thousand dollars. No new stock was issued for this extension.

The company has recently, under the supplement of 1861, laid out and located another extension for about a mile and a half north of the present terminus, reaching from Hackensack to New Bridge, and has made contracts for the construction of it, and has, by resolution, determined to make a new mortgage to cover the whole road, as it will be when finished to New Bridge, with its equipments and appurtenances, and the chartered rights and franchises of the company, to secure one hundred bonds of one thousand dollars each, for the purpose of paying off the two mortgages which are now on the road; for relaying with new rails and ties the road first built, and furnishing it with the necessary equipment, which is now deficient for its business; and for constructing and equipping the extension to New Bridge.

The complainant is a stockholder in the company; and of nine hundred and thirty shares of capital stock issued, for one hundred dollars each, he owns three hundred and twenty-four. He applies for an injunction to restrain the defendants from constructing the extension to New Bridge, and from executing the mortgage proposed.

He opposes the extension, on the ground that it is a different enterprise from that for which his stock was taken, and the money paid, and that neither the directors, nor a majority of the stockholders, can compel him to embark his capital in any undertaking but the one for which it was subscribed and paid.

The extension to Nanent, authorized by the act of 1861, has never been submitted formally to the stockholders, nor has it in any way been approved of by them, or a majority of them, except by the assent given in the answer in this suit, to which the directors are made defendants, which is sworn to by the directors, individually, who own together five hundred and seventeen shares of the capital stock. But of this, two hundred shares, held by one of them, Mr. Robert Rennie, is special stock, issued to him to build the Lodi Branch, which is leased to him during the existence of the company, and which he is to operate at his own expense and for his own profit, under an agreement that he shall pay as rent, the dividends that may be declared on these two hundred shares; and under another agreement. endorsed on the certificate of stock issued for these shares, that they are to be entitled to no dividends beyond the rent of the Lodi Branch, or in other words, that he is to pay no rent, and this stock is to receive no dividends. Under these circumstances, this stock can receive no benefit from the extension if it is profitable, nor sustain any loss from it if it is ruinous. And it would seem that if the consent of a majority of the shareholders was necessary to the new enterprise of the extension, that the assent of the other three hundred and seventeen shares held by the directors, not being a majority of the whole stock held by the complainant, who dissents, is not the consent of the majority of the stockholders. And, if it is necessary to obtain the consent of a majority to make the extension authorized by the supplement of 1861, that consent does not appear in the cause as now presented.

The extension authorized by the act of 1861, is a radical change in the object of this corporation; it is an enterprise entirely different from that in the charter. That was to construct and operate a railroad from Hackensack to the Paterson railroad, at Boiling Spring, an easy and almost direct route to New York; it was from a thriving village, the county town of Bergen county, over a level country, and only five miles in length, as shown by the return of its location. The extension would be about twelve miles in length, through an uneven country, mostly, if not wholly, agricultural; with no village, except the very small one at New Bridge, on its route; and it runs into the state of New York some distance, and terminates at a point on that part of the Erie railway which the company have abandoned for regular traffic, and on which few trains are run. It is an entirely different enterprise.

The question here is, can this company, either with or without the consent of a majority in interest, of its stockholders, compel the complainant to embark capital subscribed for the first enterprise, in this new one, entirely different.

Since the Dartmouth College Case, in the Supreme Court of the United States, the doctrine has been considered firmly established, and been confirmed by repeated decisions, both in that court and the state courts, that a charter, granted by the legislature to a corporation, is a contract between the state and the corporators, and that the state can pass no act to take away or impair any of the franchises or privileges granted by it. The company, or artificial person thus created, and its property, is subject to all general laws and police regulations made by the legislature after such grant, in the same manner as natural persons and their property are; provided they are not such as to take away or impair any of the franchises plainly granted by the charter. This doctrine did not prevent the legislature from conferring new privileges upon any corporation, to be accepted at its own election.

It is also settled, upon the principles of the common law, in this state, and most of the states of the Union, that when a number of persons associate themselves as partners, for a business and time specified in the agreement between them, or become members of a corporation for definite purposes and objects specified in their charter, which in such case is their contract, and for a time settled by it, that the objects and business of the partnership or corporation cannot be changed, or abandoned, or sold out, within the time specified, without the consent of all the partners or corporators; one partner or corporator, however small his interest, can prevent it. And this is so, although by law a majority in either case can control or manage the business against the will and interest of the minority, so long as it is within the scope of the partnership or charter.

This rule is founded on principle, the great principle of protecting every man and his property by contracts entered into, a guiding principle in all right legislation, and incorporated into the constitution of the United States, and of almost every state in the Union. And the rule is not changed because the new business or enterprise proposed is allowed by law, or has been made lawful since the association was formed. * * *

After the effect of the rule established in the Dartmouth College Case began to be felt in the states, it was found that by the numerous acts of incorporation, freely and perhaps necessarily granted, great inconveniences resulted, and that provisions incautiously inserted, too much restricted the power of future legislatures; and that the laws, which experience showed were necessary to govern corporations in the exercise of their powers, could not be passed. And the legislature of many states, by degrees and successively, adopted the practice of inserting in acts granting franchises, that they might alter, modify, or repeal the act; and also, by general law, provided that all acts of incorporation thereafter passed, should be subject to such alteration and repeal.

The provision is contained in the general act of this state, passed in 1846, (Nix.Dig. 152, § 6), that such charters should be subject to alteration, suspension, and repeal, in the discretion of the legislature. This and all similar special and general provisions were intended for the purpose specified; to give to the legislature the clear right, at their pleasure, to alter or repeal the acts of incorporation. The state, without this, could have done it with the assent of the corporators.

They could give them property; they could add to their powers or privileges. But they could not take away any power, privilege, or franchise, conferred by the act, nor compel them to exercise any new power or franchise conferred.

Besides this general law of the state, the charter of the defendants contains this provision, that "the legislature may, at any time, alter, modify, or repeal the same."

The object and purpose of these provisions are so plain, and so plainly expressed in the words, that it seems strange that any doubt could be raised concerning it. It was a reservation to the state, for the benefit of the public, to be exercised by the state only. The state was making what had been decided to be a contract, and it reserved the power of change, by altering, modifying, or repealing the contract. Neither the words nor the circumstances, nor apparent objects for which this provision was made, can, by any fair construction, extend it to giving a power to one part of the corporators as against the other, which they did not have before.

It was to void the rule in the Dartmouth College Case, not that in Natusch v. Irving [decided by Lord Eldon, in 1824], that the change was made. The words limit the power to that object.

On general principles, and the settled rules of construction, I would hold this to be the effect, and only effect, of the provision in the general act and in the charter of the defendants, without any hesitation, were it not for a series of decisions by most respectable courts, which hold that this provision obviates the effect of the rule in Natusch v. Irving and Kean v. Johnson, 9 N.J.Eq. 401, and enables a majority of the corporators in all charters subject to a like provision, to change, by legislative permission, and within certain limits, the object and purpose of the corporation. They hold that the contract between associate corporators, that they will confine their business to life insurance, is changed by legislative permission to engage in marine insurance, or a contract to join in constructing a railroad from New York to Newark, can be changed to one from New York to Elizabeth by legislative consent. The reasoning is founded on the fact that the subscription for the stock, which is the contract, was made as in this case under a charter which authorizes a road from the Paterson road to Hackensack, and authorizes the legislature to alter and modify the act. And from this they infer that it is a contract to join in building any road that the legislature may, by such alteration, authorize the company to build; and that such authority, or additional privilege, may be accepted by a majority of the corporators.

So far as the alteration is made by the legislature, in a way to be compulsory on the corporation, this is correct: as, if they should require the company to build a double track, or widen the draws in a bridge, or exact less fare or toll; these would be within the contract, or would be annexed to it as a condition, and every stockholder would take his stock subject to the contingency of such alteration.

But if the change in the act is simply offering the corporation the privilege of entering upon another and a different enterprise, it is not within the condition to the subscription. The only construction to be given is, that the legislature may alter, not that the stockholders may, as between each other. The case of Natusch v. Irving was decided upon this very ground. The act of Parliament had given the company the power to embark in marine insurance, but the consent of all the parties was still held necessary. The plain object of the reservation in this case was to give the legislature, not a bare majority of the stockholders, power.

This view of the case is so clear upon principle that I feel constrained to be guided by it, although the weight of the decisions in other states is against it. * * *

There is no other alternative to the proposition, that while the power reserved authorizes the legislature, within certain limits, to make such alterations as they choose to impose, it gives no authority, when the legislature does not impose them, for the majority to adopt such alterations or enter upon such enterprises as are allowed by the legislature.

Again, the power of the legislature has its limits. It can repeal or suspend the charter; it can alter or modify it; it can take away the charter; but it cannot impose a new one, and oblige the stockholders to accept it. It can alter or modify the old one; but power to alter or modify anything can never be held to imply a power to substitute a thing entirely different. It is not the meaning of the words in their usually received sense. Power to alter a mansion-house would never be construed to mean a power to tear down all but the back kitchen and front piazza, and build one three times as large in its place. In anything altered, something must be preserved to keep up its identity; and a matter of the same kind, wholly or chiefly new, substituted for another, is not an alteration; it is a change.

In some cases there might be room for doubts, but in this case there can be no hesitation in saying that a railroad of seventeen miles from the Paterson road to Nanent, is a change and substitution of one work for another, and not an alteration of the road to Hackensack. They are substantially two different enterprises. * * *

The defendants must be restrained from extending the road beyond its present terminus at Passaic street, and from expending any money of the company to pay for any such extension, or from giving any mortgage for the cost of such extension. * * *

(b) As to the Modification of Property or Contract Rights

SALT LAKE AUTOMOBILE CO. v. KEITH–O'BRIEN CO.

Supreme Court of Utah, 1914. 45 Utah 218, 143 P. 1015.

FRICK, J. * * * The only question to be solved by us is whether, under our Constitution and statutes, a majority of the stockholders of a corporation may amend the articles of incorporation to authorize an issue of preferred stock, which shall take precedence in rights over prior issued preferred stock, and to divide the whole stock into classes, with such preferential rights. The Constitution of this state (article 12, § 1) reads as follows:

"Corporations may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created by special acts. All laws relating to corporations may be altered, amended or repealed by the Legislature, and all corporations doing business in this state may, as to such business, be regulated, limited or restrained by law."

The law in force at the time the company was organized, respecting the authority to amend the articles of incorporation and which is now in force, is found in Comp.Laws 1907, § 338, which, so far as material here, reads as follows:

"The articles of incorporation of any corporation now existing or that hereafter may be organized under the laws of this state may be amended in any respect conformable to the laws of this state by a vote representing at least a majority in amount of the outstanding capital stock thereof at a stockholders' meeting called for that purpose, as prescribed in section 339; * * * provided further, that the original purpose of the corporation shall not be altered or changed without the approval and consent of all the outstanding stock; provided further, that the adding to the purposes or object, or extending the power and business of the corporation, shall not be deemed a change of the original purpose of the corporation; * * * and, provided further, that the personal or individual liability of the holder of full paid capital stock for assessments or for the indebtedness or obligation of the corporation shall not be changed without the consent of all the stockholders."

The law conferring authority upon corporations to classify their capital stock, which was in force when the amendment in question was adopted, is found in Laws Utah 1913, p. 52, and reads as follows:

"The articles of incorporation may provide that the capital stock shall be divided into different kinds and classes, and define the rights and privileges that each kind and class of stock shall possess, and the power to vote may be confined by the articles to such kinds and classes of stock as may be designated therein. When not otherwise provided in the articles, at all meetings, each shareholder shall be entitled to one vote for each share of stock which he or she may have in his or her own right, or held by him or her in trust for others, as shown by the books of the corporation, and such votes may be given in person, or by an authorized agent, or by proxy."

The foregoing, with the exception of the eight italicized words, namely, "as shown by the books of the corporation," is found in Comp. Laws 1907 as section 335, and was in force when the company was organized, and with the exception of the eight words aforesaid has been in force ever since. It would seem, therefore, that not only is the Legislature by the Constitution authorized to amend all laws relating to corporations within the limits pointed out by this court in Garey v. St. Joe Mining Co., 32 Utah 497, 91 P. 369, 12 L.R.A.,N.S., 554, but the right to amend the articles of incorporation by the majority of the stockholders, with the exceptions stated in section 338, supra, is expressly given. That section is as much a part of the articles of incorporation as though it were specially referred to or set forth at large therein.

While counsel for appellant do not question the foregoing statement of the law, yet they contend that it has no application to the question before us, for the reason that the issuance of the preferred stock in question falls within one of the exceptions referred to in the Garey Case, supra, in that a fundamental or vested right is invaded, which, they contend, involves the question of the impairment of the obligations of contracts, which is prohibited by our own as well as by the federal Constitution. Counsel have cited cases in which it is held that although a corporation has power to classify its capital stock and to issue preferred stock at the time of its organization, yet, if a corporation issues only common stock when organized, it may not, unless the right to do so is reserved in the articles or is expressly given by some statute, thereafter issue preferred stock which has preferential rights over other preferred stock without the consent of all the stockholders. We do not question the soundness of those cases when limited to the circumstances on which they are based; but, in our judgment, they have no application under our statute. To that effect are practically all the authorities. In 3 Clark & Marshall, Private Corporations, § 630, the law is stated thus:

"A majority of the stockholders of a corporation clearly have the power to make any alterations or changes in the constitution of the corporation which are authorized by its charter, for this power is within the contract between the corporation and its stockholders. Thus the majority, where authority is conferred upon the corporation by its charter, may bind the minority by a vote to increase or reduce the capital stock, or to issue preferred stock, or to consolidate with another corporation. * * * In some states there are general laws authorizing corporations to alter or amend their articles or charter, subject to prescribed limitations, and such laws are binding, of course, upon all persons who become stockholders of corporations while they are in force." * * *

We have already held that, when the right to amend generally is reserved in the articles of incorporation, such reservation constitutes a binding agreement between all of the stockholders to the effect that the articles may be amended by the number specified therein in any particular which could have originally been agreed upon and inserted in the articles, although such amendment without such an agreement could not have been made under the statute without the consent of all the stockholders. Nelson v. Keith-O'Brien Co., 32 Utah 396, 91 P. 30. We are also convinced that the right of amendment as set forth in the authorities cited herein is in consonance with reason and justice, and in no way conflicts with or invades the vested rights of any stockholder. While much has been said respecting the relation which a preferred stockholder bears to the corporation and to the holders of common and preferred stock of another class, and that in any event he is only a stockholder and not a creditor, yet it is recognized by practically all the courts that the issuing of preferred stock is a very convenient, and under certain circumstances may be the only practical, means a corporation has of raising the necessary funds to maintain its credit, and may even become necessary to prevent bankruptcy and dissolution. In no event has a preferred stockholder a specific lien upon the assets of the corporation. At most he has but a conditional promise or obligation of the corporation to pay, and in case the corporate business is discontinued, and its affairs are wound up, he, as against the common stock, or inferior classes of preferred stock, may be, and ordinarily is, entitled to preference. He, however, by reason of the right to amend and change the articles of incorporation, takes his stock subject to such right. In the very nature of things, therefore, the issue and sale of preferred stock cannot affect the rights of stockholders, whether holders of common or preferred stock, in a greatly different way than such right is affected by the issue of promissory notes or other unsecured obligations. Such obligations do not, as against the company or its creditors, constitute liens like mortgages.

In the case at bar no one could have doubted the right of the company to secure funds by mortgaging its assets, if it were done in good faith to protect its credit or to further its business interests. Had it done so, appellant's stock and his right to dividends would have been subject to the indebtedness so created and secured, whether it were large or small. Are his legal rights or the value of his shares of stock affected in a different way or to a greater extent by the issue of the class A stock than would have been the case by the issue of bonds, or even by the giving of promissory notes secured by mortgage upon the property of the company? But the way to obtain necessary funds is not always open to a corporation by mortgaging or pledging its property. Where the corporation is engaged in the mercantile business, it is not always practical to mortgage the stock of goods from which sales are continually made in due course of business. Moreover, such a course at once affects, if not destroys, corporate credit, and this may lead to ultimate insolvency and dissolution. The issue of preferred stock may thus not only be a convenient and practical method of raising the necessary funds to successfully continue its business, but it may be the only practical way out of a dilemma which may threaten the very life of the corporation. There is, therefore, much wisdom, as well as utility, contained in the statute which authorizes a corporation to issue different kinds or classes of stock, and which permits it to amend its articles so as to accomplish that result, where the right was not exercised at the organization of the corporation, or, if exercised, to increase the issue of such stock and to further classify the same. If such a right were denied by the courts, then a rival in business could easily obtain a few shares of stock in any corporation and possibly prevent it from raising the necessary funds to continue in business, and thus he could get the field to himself. If to amend the articles of incorporation so as to issue preferred stock and to classify the same invades a constitutional right, then, of course, a business rival who is a stockholder may prevent the amendment without giving his consent, and no one could complain. If, however, to so amend the articles does not invade such a right, then he may not complain, although it may affect the value of his stock. The latter might be the effect upon his stock in case of a mortgage or other pledge of the corporate property to secure a debt, and yet no one contends that he could prevent the giving of a mortgage, if necessary to raise funds, and of the necessity to do so the governing body of the corporation, if acting in good faith, would ordinarily be the judge. No one doubts that a majority of the stockholders could authorize a loan and a pledge of the corporate property to secure its payment.

In our judgment, where the right of amendment exists, as under our statute, there can be no distinction between an amendment authorizing the issuance of preferred stock and one which authorizes both the issuance of such stock and the classification thereof. The same legal principle is involved in both cases.

Judgment affirmed.

LONSDALE SECURITIES CORPORATION v. INTERNATIONAL MERCANTILE MARINE CO. VOLK v. SAME.

Court of Chancery of New Jersey, 1927. 101 N.J.Eq. 554, 139 A. 50.

BENTLEY, VICE CHANCELLOR. On bill for injunction.

While the matter to be decided was heard on the return of an order to show cause, all parties have agreed and stipulated in open court, not only that the above-entitled causes should be consolidated and argued and heard together, but each one also agrees that it shall be decided as if on final hearing, so that an appeal may be prosecuted and submitted to the Court of Errors and Appeals within the shortest possible space of time and the issues raised put at rest once and for all.

In 1893 the defendant's predecessor was incorporated in this state and entered upon the shipping business in a comparatively modest way, which it continued to follow until 1902 when the present company was organized providing for a capital stock of $120,000,000, divided into 600,000 shares of preferred stock with a par value of $100, and a like number of shares of common stock with the same par value. There is actually issued and outstanding in the hands of the public a little more than 500,000 shares of preferred and a little less than 500,000 shares of common stock.

That portion of the certificate of incorporation of the defendant, which fixes the rights of the owners of shares of preferred stock, reads as follows:

"Fourth. That the amount of the total authorized capital stock of the company is $120,000,000, divided into 1,200,000 shares of the par value of $100 each, of which 600,000 shares shall be preferred stock and 600,000 shares shall be common stock.

"The holders of the preferred stock shall be entitled to receive, when and as declared, from the surplus or net profits of the company, yearly dividends at the rate of 6 per centum per annum, and no more, payable semiannually on dates to be fixed by the by-laws. The dividends on the preferred stock shall be cumulative, and shall be payable before any dividend on the common stock shall be paid or set apart; so that, if in any year, dividends amounting to 6 per centum shall not have been paid thereon, the deficiency shall be payable before any dividends shall be paid upon or set apart for the common stock.

"Whenever all cumulative dividends on the preferred stock for all previous years shall have been declared and shall have become payable, and the accrued semiannual installment for the current year shall have been declared and the company shall have paid such cumulative dividends for previous years and such accrued semiannual installment, or shall have set aside from its surplus or net profits a sum sufficient for the payment thereof, the board of directors may declare dividends on the common stock, payable then or thereafter, out of any remaining surplus or net profits; provided, however, that the dividends upon the common stock shall be so limited that the same shall never in any one year exceed the rate of 10 per centum so long as there shall remain outstanding and unredeemed any of the 4½ per cent. mortgage and collateral trust gold bonds of the company.

"In the event of any liquidation or dissolution or winding up (whether voluntary or involuntary) of the company, the holders of the preferred stock shall be entitled to be paid in full both the par amount of their shares and the unpaid dividends accrued thereon before any amount shall be paid to the holders of the common stock; but after the payment to the holders of the preferred stock of its par value and the unpaid accrued dividends thereon the remaining assets and funds shall be divided and paid to the holders of the common stock according to their respective shares."

On July 21, 1927, the condition of the company was, and had been, such that no dividend had ever been declared on the common stock and so irregularly paid on the preferred stock that there were accumulations of arrears of dividends on such preferred stock amounting to approximately $70 per share. At that time there had been sold a portion of the defendant's former holdings for the sum of about $34,000,000, the purchase price being payable over a period of about 3 years. The property disposed of had been carried on the books of the company, including the good will thereof, at $80,000,000, so that there was a book loss of approximately $46,000,000 by reason of the transaction. It is undenied that the corporation is solvent.

Realizing that a continuation of the status quo could not be continued indefinitely without resultant ruin, a resolution was adopted on the said 21st day of July by the board of directors of the company setting forth the condition of the stock distribution, the opinion of the board deeming it advisable that all of its stock be readjusted and reclassified in the manner presently to be shown, and submitting to the stockholders the following scheme to accomplish those objects: The existing preferred shares were to be replaced by 120,000 shares of preferred stock without par value, and the existing common stock was to be converted into 720,000 shares of common stock without par value. Upon the change being authorized, the holders of preferred stock were to turn the same in for cancellation, and were to receive in return for each five shares so surrendered one share of the new preferred stock without par value and five shares of the common stock without par value. The common stock was to be exchanged on the basis of one share of the new common stock without par value for five shares of the old par value stock. The preferred stock was to yield dividends at the rate of $6 per share annually, and such dividends were to be accumulative and have the usual preference over the common stock; namely, no dividend on the common at any time, if any arrears should exist on the preferred stock dividends for any year. It was further to be provided that the preferred stock should carry the customary preference on dissolution at the rate of $100 for each share. The right of the company to redeem the preferred stock at the rate of $100 per share was given.

Notice of the stockholders' meeting was regularly given, and thereupon various of the complainants filed their respective bills, one of which was presented to Vice Chancellor Church who thereupon allowed an order to show cause returnable before me, and both his order and mine restrained the filing of the amendments of the certificate of incorporation or taking any step to carry the same into effect. The company was permitted to hold its meeting and vote on the proposed plan. At that meeting there were cast in favor of the adoption of the resolution of the board of directors 379,998 shares of the common stock and 366,973 shares of preferred stock, representing well above the statutory majority of each class of stock required for the adoption of the resolution. It appears that out of 369,324 shares of preferred stock represented at the meeting only 2,361 shares at the most were voted in the negative.

There is thus presented the familiar situation created by a very meager minority objecting to the efforts of the managers of an unfortunate industrial corporation to extricate it from an unsatisfactory financial condition. There is no suggestion of fraud leveled at the action of the board of directors, but, in fact, an express avowal of confidence on the part of the complainants in the good faith of the managers of the company in proposing this new plan of capitalization. It clearly was their duty to make every effort to end this impossible condition of affairs, and that their intentions should be above suspicion is apparent from the fact that, although the situation has been discussed on innumerable occasions, no one had been able to formulate a feasible proposal that would be more desirable, as well as from the fact that about 99 per cent. of the preferred stock represented at the meeting was voted favorably.

But the facts in this case present conditions different from any with which I have had to deal in any previous suit. There is no question of the standing of these complainants, as was the case in Windhurst v. Central Leather Co., 101 N.J.Eq. 543, 138 A. 772. The bills were promptly filed before any change had taken place in the circumstances of the company or others, and a grave question is raised as to the legality of the scheme that has been proposed.

These complainants apply to this court for the only complete and adequate protection that can be afforded their property rights. Under the contract growing out of the section of the defendant's articles of incorporation which has been set out above, they have become vested with rights as against the holders of the common shares in a surplus of at least some $17,000,000 that the company has accumulated, and also in future earnings and all the other property of the corporation. To permit the contemplated change in the certificate of incorporation would result in divesting them of those rights in violation of our law. There are now due the preferred stockholders almost $36,000,000 of accumulated dividends. The purpose of the proposed change is expressly to divest the preferred stockholders of all right to ever collect this existing claim.

It certainly requires no argument or explanation to show that any such change as is contemplated would result in impairing the investment value of the present preferred shares, and consequently would materially reduce the property rights of their respective holders. It has been urged that a proper spirit would cause these complainants to relinquish their strict legal rights in the common interest of the corporation and the other stockholders. Such an argument might well be addressed to the complainants by their fellow stockholders, but cannot be adopted by the court. It is trite to say that one may be generous with his own property, but it is scarcely generosity to deal lavishly with that of another. The fourth section of the existing certificate of incorporation of the defendant creates a contract between the defendant and the complainants by which the latter are clothed with certain property rights having a fixed, determinate value. In place of those rights it is intended to substitute others of a less valuable character, over the objection of the complainants. That they do object is conclusively shown by the filing of these bills. It is true that there would be placed in the hands of the owners of the new shares of stock, issued to replace the preferred shares intended to be retired, a greatly increased power of franchise, but the complainants neither seek, nor wish, to surrender their present rights for the one offered in their stead, and it is beyond the power of the corporation, this court or the Legislature to compel it.

It seems to me, notwithstanding the disagreement of the learned counsel for the defendant, the situation is controlled, so far as the rights of the preferred stockholders in the surplus is concerned, by the decision in Day v. U. S. Cast Iron Pipe & Foundry Co., 95 N.J. Eq. 389, 123 A. 546. In that case, after payment of dividends on the preferred stock for the year 1922, it was proposed to pay a dividend on the common stock out of earnings of previous years, during which previous years no dividends had been declared on the preferred stock. In the same case in the Court of Errors and Appeals (96 N.J.Eq. 736, 126 A. 302), Judge White clearly and, to my mind, unanswerably explained the reason upon which the affirmance of Vice Chancellor Backes' decision should have been placed; and, as I read the opinion, it is because the Legislature has declared by the eighteenth section of the General Corporation Act (chapter 185, P.L.1896 [2 Comp.St.1910, p. 1608]) that:

"* * * The dividends upon cumulative preferred stock have at all times, and for all years, past and present, until paid, priority in payment over any and all unpaid dividends upon common stock, whether the net earnings for any particular past or present year were or were not sufficient to pay the stipulated cumulative dividends upon preferred stock for that year." Pp. 740, 741 (126 A. 304).

At the present time the holders of the existing preferred stock would be entitled to all of the existing surplus if the directors should decide to declare a dividend. If that stock is retired in accordance with the proposed plan, then it is readily seen that the requirements of the relatively few shares of no par value preferred stock might be satisfied out of a portion of the surplus, and the balance thereof devoted to a payment on the no par value common stock which would represent and stand in the place of the present common stock. This would be an indirect means of accomplishing a result that is now beyond the power of the corporation.

Not only would the change result in an injury to the future, as well as the past, dividend rights of the preferred stockholders, but it would also interfere with and materially diminish or abolish vested rights.

What has already been said renders it unnecessary to deal with questions decided in all the cases of the class commencing with Kean v. Johnson, 9 N.J.Eq. 401, and ending with Allen v. Francisco Sugar Co., 92 N.J.Eq. 431, 112 A. 887. It also obviates examination of the other issues raised by the complainants, both constitutional and otherwise.

An injunction should be allowed, and, in view of the stipulations referred to above, it should be a perpetual writ.

DAVIS v. LOUISVILLE GAS & ELECTRIC CO.

Court of Chancery of Delaware, 1928. 16 Del.Ch. 157, 142 A. 654.

Bill for injunction by John J. Davis and others as executors of the will of Joshua B. F. Breed, deceased, and others, against the Louisville Gas & Electric Company. Restraining order denied.

Injunction bill to restrain the filing of an amendment to the defendant's certificate of incorporation. The defendant was incorporated on February 17, 1913, with an authorized capital of one hundred and twenty thousand shares of preferred stock (one hundred dollars par) and sixty thousand shares of common stock (one hundred dollars par). By amendment to its certificate of incorporation adopted July 29, 1913, the authorized capital was increased to one hundred and fifty thousand shares of preferred and eighty thousand shares of common. By further amendment of the certificate adopted June 26, 1925, the capital structure of the defendant was changed so as to substitute for its then authorized classes of preferred and common shares an authorized capital of one million, three hundred thousand shares of stock without nominal or par value, consisting of eight hundred thousand shares of Class A common stock and five hundred thousand shares of Class B common stock. This is the defendant's capital structure at the present time.

The Class A common has no voting rights. It is redeemable at any time at $32.50 per share. Upon dissolution or liquidation it is entitled to receive $25.00 per share before anything is paid to Class B common, after which payment Class B is entitled to the remainder. Class A is entitled to receive a dividend out of earnings at the rate of $1.50 per share per annum before Class B is entitled to receive anything.

After the Class A's dividend of $1.50 is provided for, Class B is entitled to receive dividends at the rate of $1.50 per share per annum out of the remaining surplus or net profits. Whenever each class has received for any quarter dividends at the rate of $1.50 per annum, the directors are authorized to declare additional dividends for such quarter out of the remaining surplus or net profits up to but not in excess of the rate of fifty cents per share per annum to the holders of both classes. Thereafter, further dividends may be declared for the then current quarter to the two classes in the proportion, share for share, of one for Class A and four for Class B; that is to say, for each twenty-five cents declared to a share of Class A, each share of Class B shall be entitled to receive one dollar.

It is now proposed to amend the certificate of incorporation by changing the terms and conditions of Class A and Class B stock by providing that whenever for any quarterly dividend period dividends at the rate of $1.50 per annum have been paid to Class A stock and a like dividend has been paid to Class B stock, any further dividends shall be declared on both classes share and share alike without distinction as to classes. It is further proposed to destroy by amendment the right of the corporation to redeem Class A stock at $32.50 per share.

A stockholders' meeting was called for May 16, 1928, to pass upon the proposed amendment. On that day the meeting convened and the vote was as follows: 359,649 shares of Class A common (outstanding 507,381) and 244,864 shares of Class B common (outstanding 257,956) voted in favor of the amendments, while 1824 shares of Class A and 6150 shares of Class B voted against the amendment.

Though the vote was favorable to the amendment, yet the officers of the corporation have, by agreement, withheld the filing of amending papers with the Secretary of State pending decision upon the present motion for a restraining order.

It is now asked that a restraining order issue restraining the corporation from taking the necessary steps under the law to effectuate the amendment.

Heard on bill, answer and affidavits.

THE CHANCELLOR. The complainants are holders of Class B stock. They contest the right of the defendant to amend its certificate of incorporation in the manner proposed for two reasons—first, because the corporation is without lawful power to adopt the amendment, and second, conceding the power to exist, the changes proposed by the amendment are nevertheless unfair, inequitable and a fraud upon the complainants, and should therefore be enjoined.

Logically the first contention should be disposed of first, because if it be well grounded the second need not be considered.

First, then, has the corporation power under the law to adopt the amendment in question? The complainants concede that if the defendant corporation has the power which the amendment to section 26 of the General Corporation Law, under which the defendant was incorporated, undertakes to confer upon corporations, then the question of power to adopt the capital changes proposed must be answered in favor of its exercise. The corporation was created in 1913. That the corporation possessed all the powers conferred upon it not only by its certificate of incorporation, but as well those which the act itself conferred upon all corporations created under it, cannot be questioned. Peters v. U. S. Mortgage Co., 13 Del.Ch. 11, 114 A. 598; Morris et al. v. American Public Utilities Co., 14 Del.Ch. 136, 122 A. 696; Bouree et al. v. Trust Francais, Inc., 14 Del.Ch. 332, 127 A. 56. Section 26 of the act is the section dealing with amendments to corporate charters, and the power to amend conferred by that section as it existed at the time this corporation was created was consequently conferred upon it by the law creating it. The complainants contend that the power to amend thus conferred on the defendant at the time of its creation by section 26 of the act was not such as to embrace within its scope a power to effect so fundamental and radical a change in the corporate structure as the proposed alteration contemplates. Whether this contention is tenable will not now be considered. For the moment, it will be assumed that it is and that the power to effect changes of the kind under consideration was not conferred by section 26 as it existed in 1913 when the defendant was created.

The section (26) was amended in 1927 (35 Del.Laws, c. 85, § 10). Power to enact amendments was reserved by the state in section 82 of the act under which the defendant was created. That section provides:

"This chapter may be amended or repealed, at the pleasure of the Legislature; * * * this chapter and all amendments thereof shall be a part of the charter of every such corporation except so far as the same are inapplicable and inappropriate to the objects of such corporation."

Section 26 in its 1927 amended form was so worded as to confer upon corporations a power to amend their certificates of incorporation sufficiently comprehensive to embrace the sort of amendment proposed to be effected by the defendant in this case. The complainants concede this. But they argue, the defendant cannot justify the proposed amendment under section 26 as amended in 1927, for the reason that it was beyond the power of the Legislature to authorize such a change in the contractual relations existing between the corporation and its stockholders and between the stockholders inter sese as the proposed amendment to the certificate contemplates. The contract now subsisting between the corporation and its members as well as among the stockholders of the two classes, gives to the B common the right to retire the A common at $32.50 a share, and when a certain point is reached in distributing earnings as dividends a further right to receive thereout one dollar to every twenty-five cents paid to the A stock. These rights, say the complainants who are B stockholders, constitute material and fundamental contract rights which they now enjoy and which but for the power conferred by the 1927 legislation the corporation and the majority of stockholders however great could not take from them without their consent. Hence it follows, they argue, that in so far as the 1927 enactment undertakes to disturb these rights, it is invalid as an act impairing the obligation of a contract. * * *

The line of demarcation between what constitutes a matter of public as distinguished from one of private interest in corporate activities is admittedly exceedingly difficult to define. The very fact that the general corporation acts found in the various states deal in great detail with innumerable aspects of the contract in what upon a glance would be regarded as relating to its private as distinguished from its public character, has some force to suggest that the state, by dealing with such subjects in the statute rather than by leaving them to be arranged by the corporate membership, has impliedly impressed upon such matters the quality of public interest and concern. Certain it is that the state in authorizing the creation of corporations is interested as a matter of public policy in seeing to it that its corporate creatures shall possess such powers as are best calculated to promote the corporation's welfare, advance its interests, and facilitate the meeting of its business and financial needs. Questions having to do with stock, its kinds, classes, preferences, participations and qualifications, which a corporation may issue, are questions that are most intimately bound up with the future welfare of the corporation and may have a most material relation to the continuance in esse of the entity which the state has created. Nor is it unreasonable to assume that the state, thus recognizing the vital importance to the corporate life of questions dealing with its capital structure, further recognized the unwisdom of casting in an unchanging mould the corporate powers which it conferred touching these questions so as to leave them fixed for all time. May it not be assumed that the Legislature foresaw that the interests of the corporations created by it might, as experience supplied the material for judgment, be best subserved by an alteration of their intracorporate and in a sense private powers, and, in the interest of a public policy which coveted their successful progress, have meant to reserve to itself by the general amendment clause a right to alter or enlarge such powers? * * *

The conclusion I reach on this branch of the case is that the power reserved by the Legislature to amend the act under which the defendant was created, and subject to which every stockholder acquired and holds his stock, is broad enough to embrace within its purview the amendment of 1927. Even conceding, if need be, that the power of amendment reserved by the Legislature can extend only to those matters that are of public concern, yet it does not follow that the amendment here under debate is to be condemned. This is for the reason that the problem of financing corporate needs is so vital to the continuance in existence of corporations created under the act, the matter of stock, its kinds, classifications and relative rights, is so intimately associated with that problem, that it is difficult to escape the conclusion that the character of the statutory regulations defined by the Legislature for the meeting of that problem might very well be regarded as affected with a public interest and concern. The peculiar language of the clause by which the power of amendment was reserved by our statute would in itself point to this conclusion.

In view of the foregoing, it follows that the amendment to the act adopted in 1927, is applicable to the corporation defendant in this case. If it is, then it is conceded that so far as the question of power is concerned, the proposed alteration of the certificate of incorporation has statutory warrant. * * *

Second, the power being found to exist to adopt the proposed amendment of the certificate, are its terms so unfair and inequitable as to constitute a fraud on the complainants who hold B stock? This question is assumed by the parties to be a pertinent one. That the amendment, if adopted, will take from B stock certain material rights which it now enjoys cannot be doubted. The defendant is said to be in a prosperous condition and its business and earnings appear to be growing at a satisfactory rate. By taking away the right to redeem the A stock at $32.50 a share, the complainants argue that the B stock is deprived of the opportunity to retire on favorable terms that stock as a sharer with it in the earnings which have every prospect of increasing in amount. But, it is argued, a more glaring injustice is proposed to be done to the B stock by the proposal that when a certain point shall have been reached in disbursement of earnings as dividends, the distribution shall thereafter be in equal proportions to A and B instead of in the proportion now provided for of four to one, that is on the basis of one dollar to B for every twenty-five cents to A. The complainants calculate that from the present financial statement of the company the proposed change would enable the directors by a dividend declaration out of earnings now on hand to divert something over $200,000 to A stock which, if the proposal be not adopted, would go to B stock.

All this, they argue, is unfair, inequitable and a fraud on the B stockholders. The defendant justifies the proposed change as one that is for the best interest of the corporation and for the stockholders as a whole. The company is a growing one and is in need of additional funds for its expansion. Such additional funds, it says, can be best and most advantageously obtained by the sale of its A stock. Sale of that stock with its present redemption feature and its restricted dividend participations cannot in the judgment of the managing board of directors be effected in sufficient amount to meet the company's needs and upon terms regarded as advantageous. The complainants disagree with this view. We have then a conflict in view between the responsible managers of a corporation and an overwhelming majority of its stockholders on the one hand and a dissenting minority on the other—a conflict touching matters of business policy, such as has occasioned innumerable applications to courts to intervene and determine which of the two conflicting views should prevail. The response which courts make to such applications is that it is not their function to resolve for corporations questions of policy and business management. The directors are chosen to pass upon such questions and their judgment unless shown to be tainted with fraud is accepted as final. The judgment of the directors of corporations enjoys the benefit of a presumption that it was formed in good faith and was designed to promote the best interests of the corporation they serve. * * *

The restraining order will not issue.

HUEFTLE et al. v. FARMERS ELEVATOR et al.

Supreme Court of Nebraska, 1944. 145 Neb. 424, 16 N.W.2d 855.

Suit by Gotthill C. Hueftle and others against the Farmers Elevator, a corporation, otherwise and sometimes known as Farmers Co-operative Elevator, impleaded with Gustav A. Hueftle and others, to enjoin distribution of dividends. From a decree for plaintiffs, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

CARTER, JUDGE. This is an appeal from a decree enjoining a distribution of dividends in accordance with amendments to the articles of incorporation and bylaws of The Farmers Elevator, Eustis, Nebraska, a corporation, on the ground that said amended articles and bylaws violate the contractual rights of minority stockholders and are not consistent with the nature, purposes and objects of the corporation as stated in its original articles and bylaws.

The record shows that plaintiffs are stockholders in the corporation. They allege that The Farmers Elevator was organized for the purpose of carrying on the business of buying and selling grain, hay, livestock and other agricultural products and that it purchased an elevator and office building to carry on the business in Eustis, Nebraska. Plaintiffs then allege the intent of the directors of the corporation to distribute the profits of the corporation on the basis of and in proportion to the amount of the business done with the corporation, rather than as dividends on the stock of the corporation. It is also alleged that said corporation directors are assuming the power to recall the stock of the corporation and to give in exchange therefor a new and different type of share and certain so-called participation certificates on which they purport to pay patronage dividends rather than the stock dividends required by the articles of incorporation. It is alleged that a large amount of profits have accrued and that defendants, unless enjoined, will pay them out as patronage dividends to the irreparable injury of plaintiffs. The petition also alleges the invalidity of certain amended articles of incorporation under which the defendants are purporting to act. The petition prays for an injunction enjoining defendants from proceeding in any manner under the amended articles of the corporation.

The defendants by their answer allege that on March 4, 1943, at a regularly called meeting of the stockholders of the corporation, certain amendments to the articles of the corporation were adopted which purported to change The Farmers Elevator to a co-operative corporation and provided for the distribution of dividends upon a patronage basis. Subsequently the officers and directors adopted bylaws in conformity with the amended articles and have since proceeded to act in accordance therewith. The answer admits the purposes of the corporation as originally formed and pleads the adoption and validity of the amended articles and bylaws giving rise to the present litigation. There are additional allegations in the answer to the effect that plaintiffs are barred by estoppel and laches from asserting their claim.

Plaintiffs filed a general demurrer to the answer which the trial court sustained. Defendants elected to stand on their answer, an injunction decree was entered as prayed for in the petition and an appeal taken therefrom. The correctness of this ruling is the sole question raised by the appeal.

The fundamental question to be determined is whether the adoption of amended articles of incorporation by a majority of the stockholders, whereby it is sought to convert a stock corporation organized under the general corporation laws of the state into a co-operative corporation distributing dividends on a patronage basis, is violative of the contractual rights of minority stockholders and constitutes such a fundamental change in the nature, purposes and objects of the corporation as to make such amendments invalid.

The purpose of the suit is to prevent the distribution of the profits of the corporation in the manner provided by the amended articles and bylaws. It is self-evident that stockholders under the original articles will be deprived of dividends to which they were entitled thereunder. By their purchase of stock they acquired a contractual right to share in the net profits in the form of dividends on stock. An attempt to make a distribution of net profits on a patronage basis constitutes a violation of plaintiffs' contract rights.

"It is settled law that a corporation has no power to adopt by-laws which impair or destroy the obligations of contracts or rights thereunder or vested rights, and that by-laws which have that effect are invalid and unenforceable against a person whose rights are impaired or destroyed thereby." 8 Fletcher, Private Corporations (Perm. ed.) sec. 4188. The foregoing rule applies with equal force to amendments to the bylaws.

In a case very similar on fact and principle this court said: "In 1916 there was an attempt to amend the articles of incorporation by changing the Farmers Elevator Company to a co-operative association within the meaning of the statute cited. Later defendants planned to distribute profits under the amendment. Such a course, if pursued, would deprive plaintiffs of dividends to which they were entitled under their contracts as original stockholders and would destroy their contractual rights. This neither the legislature nor the defendants can lawfully do." Allen v. White, 103 Neb. 256, 171 N.W. 52.

In Supreme Commandery Knights of the Golden Rule v. Ainsworth, 71 Ala. 436, 46 Am.Rep. 332 the court said: "A corporation has not capacity, as the legislative power from which it derives existence has not competency, by laws of its own enactment, to disturb or divest rights which it had created, or to impair the obligations of its contracts, or to change its responsibilities to its members, or to draw them into new and distinct relations."

The amendments change the fundamental arrangement and plans of the corporation as it was organized when plaintiffs became stockholders and impair the contractual rights which they then acquired. It follows that the amendments and the proceedings of the defendants taken thereunder are void.

Defendants urge that plaintiffs are estopped to question the validity of the amended articles and bylaws for the reason that they permitted defendants to advertise and solicit business for approximately seven months without objection thereto, that the articles and bylaws provided for their own amendment at the time plaintiffs purchased their stock and they are bound thereby, and that previous amendments to the articles and bylaws had been made to which plaintiffs had acquiesced. We find no merit in these contentions. A delay of seven months cannot be deemed unreasonable where, as here, no effort was made to distribute dividends on a patronage basis until shortly before the suit was brought.

While it is true that the right to amend the articles and bylaws was reserved at the time plaintiffs became stockholders, the right to amend was not absolute. The power to amend articles and bylaws is an incident of the power to adopt them and a general reservation of the right to amend ordinarily creates no different situation than if it were not reserved at all. In either event, the fact that a stockholder may purchase stock at a time when the right to amend the articles and bylaws is reserved does not operate to confer authority to make an amendment which will amount to the destruction or impairment of the vested or contract rights of the member. Neither does the fact that a stockholder acquiesces in previous amendments estop him from asserting his rights when a subsequent article or bylaw is amended which materially affects his interests. * * *

We are of the opinion that the amendments to the articles of incorporation and bylaws here involved constitute such a fundamental change in the nature, purposes and objects of the corporation and such an impairment of the contractual rights of the plaintiffs, that the trial court was correct in declaring their invalidity. The trial court was right in sustaining the demurrer to defendants' answer and in entering the injunction order prayed for in plaintiffs' petition when defendants elected to stand on their answer.

Affirmed.

D. ENTERPRISE ENTITY UNDER DEFECTIVE INCORPORATION (DE FACTO CORPORATIONS)—MANAGEMENT UNDER INCOMPLETE CONTRACT

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

Sec. 69. Want of Legal Organization No Defense in Actions:—No corporation organized under this Chapter or existing under the laws of this State, shall be permitted to set up, or rely upon the want of legal organization as a defense to any action against it; nor shall any person transacting business with such corporation, or sued for injury done to its property, be permitted to rely upon such want of legal organization as a defense.

This section shall not be construed to prevent judicial inquiry into the regularity or validity of the organization of the corporation or its lawful possession of any corporate power it may undertake to assert in any other suit or proceeding where its corporate existence or the power to exercise the corporate rights it asserts is challenged, and evidence tending to sustain such challenge shall be admissible in any such suit or proceeding.

PEOPLE v. FORD

Supreme Court of Illinois, 1920. 294 Ill. 319, 128 N.E. 479.

Information in the nature of quo warranto by the People against E. E. Ford and others to determine the legality of the organization of a corporation. From a judgment dismissing the information, after overruling a demurrer to the plea, the People appeal. Affirmed.

DUNN, J. The Fifty-First General Assembly passed an act in relation to corporations for pecuniary profit, known as the General Corporation Act, which was approved on June 28, and became effective July 1, 1919. Laws of 1919, p. 316. Section 4 provides that—

"Whenever three or more adult persons, citizens of the United States of America, at least one of whom shall be a citizen of this state, shall desire to form a corporation under this act, they shall sign, seal and acknowledge before some officer, competent to take acknowledgment of deeds, a statement of incorporation setting forth the following: [Here follow thirteen paragraphs stating the facts to be contained in the statement.]"

The section closes with the sentence that—

"Such statement shall be filed in duplicate in the office of the secretary of state on forms prescribed and furnished by the secretary of state."

Section 5 provides that—

"Upon the filing of such statement, the secretary of state shall examine the same, and, if it is in conformity with the provisions of this act, he shall indorse thereon the word 'Filed' followed by the month, day and year of such filing. Upon such filing the corporation shall be deemed fully organized and may proceed to business."

On September 5, 1919, a certificate of incorporation of the Washer Maid Company was filed in duplicate in the office of the secretary of state. The Attorney General afterward, by leave of the court, filed in the circuit court of Cook county an information in the nature of quo warranto against E. E. Ford, A. J. Fisher, and C. R. Gilbert, charging them with having unlawfully usurped, intruded into, held, and executed the office of directors of a pretended corporation known as the Washer Maid Company, under color of a void and illegal certificate of incorporation, and calling upon them to show by what warrant they exercised such privileges.

The respondents filed a plea showing the various steps taken for the organization of the corporation, setting forth in hæc verba the statement filed by them, alleging that it was made on forms prescribed and furnished by the secretary of state, which were executed and acknowledged by the respondents, and that the respondents had in all respects complied with the requirements of the General Corporation

Act. The Attorney General demurred and for special cause of demurrer showed that the respondents in their statement of incorporation did not sign, seal and acknowledge the same, but, on the contrary, failed to seal the same or to affix their seals to said statement of incorporation, as required by the General Corporation Act. The statement set forth in the plea shows the signatures of the respondents as follows:

E. E. Ford,
A. J. Fisher, } Incorporators.
Chas. R. Gilbert,

The word "seal" does not appear, nor are there any letters, scrawl, or marks which might be regarded as a seal, unless it is the bracket which joins the names, and neither the statement itself nor the certificate of acknowledgment contains any reference to a seal. The court overruled the demurrer, and, the Attorney General electing to stand by it, the information was dismissed. An appeal was taken, and at the June term the cause was submitted, with a request by both parties for an early decision because of the public importance of the question involved. * * *

The question presented was whether the requirement that the incorporators shall seal the statement is mandatory or directory. It was argued on behalf of the people that the requirement of the seal is a condition precedent to the legal existence of a corporation. A somewhat similar question arose early in the history of the state in the case of Cross v. Pinckneyville Mill Co., 17 Ill. 54. The act of 1849, to authorize the formation of corporations for manufacturing, agricultural, mining or mechanical purposes, provided that any three or more persons desiring to form a company for such purpose should make, sign, and acknowledge, and file "in the office of the clerk in the county in which the business of the company should be carried on and a duplicate thereof in the office of the secretary of state, a certificate in writing," in which should be stated the name of the company and other facts mentioned in the statute. It was further provided that when the certificate should have been filed as aforesaid the persons who should have signed and acknowledged, and their successors, should be a body politic and corporate. In the case mentioned the duplicate certificate of organization had not been filed in the office of the secretary of state, but the court held that fact unimportant to defeat the organization or rights growing out of it; that there is a well-settled distinction between mandatory and directory provisions, and that carrying out of the true intention of the Legislature and effectuating the object of the law would not be promoted by strict technical constructions, converting every direction and detail of power into a mandatory prerequisite of corporate existence.

More recently a question arose as to the effect of the failure to mail notices of the meeting of subscribers of the capital stock to elect officers, as required by section 3 of the Corporation Act of 1872 (Laws 1871–72, p. 296). We said:

"The statute prescribes a certain course to be pursued in organizing a corporation in this state. It does not necessarily follow, however, that any departure from that course will prevent a corporation from becoming one de jure. Whether or not such departure will have that effect depends upon the nature of the provision which is violated. If it is a mandatory provision, a failure to substantially comply with its terms will prevent the corporation from becoming one de jure; but if the provision is merely directory, then a departure therefrom will not have that consequence."

It was held that it was immaterial whether or not notice had been given in the manner directed by the statute; the persons entitled to notice having waived it and actually attended the meeting, so that the purpose of the statute in requiring the notices to be given was accomplished. Butler Paper Co. v. Cleveland, 220 Ill. 128, 77 N.E. 99, 110 Am.St.Rep. 230. * * *

The requirement of a seal in the execution of documents by individuals has become a mere formality. It means nothing. Private seals no longer exist as a means of execution of specialties, for even an individual scrawl is not required. In most deeds the word "seal" is printed on the blank form which is used, and the grantor does not know whether he has used a seal or not. It depends upon whether the word was printed on the paper or not. The solemnity of the sealed instrument is purely Pickwickian and no longer represents an idea. While courts of law in this state cannot disregard the legal quality of the sealed instrument, courts of equity frequently relieve parties from the difficulties arising from the application of the rigid rules of the common law to such instruments.

We may look to the intention of the statute in determining the effect of an omission to add the seal. The purpose is to make a public record of the corporation, the definition of its powers, the amount of its stock, the names of its stockholders, its location, and other facts in connection with it, which are of interest to the public to know, and of the state in its supervision over corporations to be acquainted with. The addition of a seal is of no importance for these purposes. It is not of the essence of the thing to be done, and no prejudice can result from its omission. The essential act of making the statement, though not in the precise manner indicated, accomplishes the substantial purpose of the statute, and that is sufficient. It would not be carrying out the intention of the Legislature to hold that the addition of a scrawl by the signers of the statement is mandatory and its omission invalidates the incorporation.

For these reasons the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

FARMER, J. (dissenting). The Legislature saw fit to require the statement to be under seal. Whether this was an important requirement or not, the Legislature had the power to, and did make it. Courts cannot disregard it, on the ground that it was a useless requirement, or that the Legislature did not mean what it said.

GARTSIDE COAL CO. v. MAXWELL.

Circuit Court of the United States, E. D. Missouri, 1884. 22 F. 197.

BREWER, J., (orally.) In this case the facts are these: There was a corporation, or what pretended to be a corporation, which purchased coal from the plaintiff, and the transactions extended through a series of years. The defendants, or the defendants' so-called corporation, failed to pay,—became insolvent; and this action is to charge those who were the stockholders in this supposed corporation as though they were partners; and the basis of the claim is that there was no corporation; that whatever it assumed or pretended to be, although it called itself a corporation, and attempted to transact business as a corporation, yet in fact it was no corporation, and had no legal existence; and that these parties who were acting as though they were stockholders in this corporation were really not stockholders, and must therefore individually be held as partners to have made the purchases.

It is very clear to my mind that this attempted incorporation was invalid, and that if it had ever been challenged by the officer of the state, in proper proceedings, its exercise of corporate powers would have been enjoined; but, while I think that is unquestionably so, it does not seem to me to follow that those who were supposing themselves stockholders in this corporation can be held personally liable. I think the true rule is this: that where persons knowingly and fraudulently assume a corporate existence, or pretend to have a corporate existence, they can be held liable as individuals; but where they are acting in good faith, and suppose that they are legally incorporated, —that they are stockholders in a valid corporation,—and where the corporation assumes to transact business for a series of years, and the assumed corporate existence is not challenged by the state, then they cannot be held liable, as individuals, as members of the corporation.

Of course, the converse is perfectly true, that a person who deals with a corporation, or gives to an assumed corporation a note, cannot question the corporate existence of that party with whom he has dealt or to whom he gave his note. So, on the other hand, where a person deals with what he supposes is a corporation, with what all parties think is a corporation, where he gives his credit to that supposed corporation, he cannot afterwards, when it turns out that it is not validly incorporated, turn round and say, "Well, I dealt with this supposed corporation; I thought it was a corporation; I trusted it as a corporation; I sold goods to it as a corporation; but it seems when it first attempted to become incorporated that there was some defect or irregularity in its proceedings, so that it did not become legally incorporated, and therefore you who are stockholders will be held personally liable." I do not think that can be done, and judgment will be entered for the defendant.

LOWELL-WOODWARD HARDWARE CO. v. WOODS et al.

Supreme Court of Kansas, 1919. 104 Kan. 729, 180 P. 734.

Action by the Lowell-Woodward Hardware Company against G. R. Woods, Ed. Semke, and others, partners under the firm name and style of Superior Leasing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Semke appeals. Affirmed.

MASON, J. An action was brought in the name of the Lowell-Woodward Hardware Company, describing itself as a Colorado corporation, against several persons alleged to constitute a partnership, upon a promissory note. One of the defendants, Ed. Semke, filed an answer consisting of a verified general denial. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, and Semke appeals.

1. The appellant's contention is that there was no competent evidence of the plaintiff's corporate existence, or of his being a member of the partnership described. A witness for the plaintiff testified that it was a corporation, over an objection that the question called for a conclusion, and the ruling is complained of. On cross-examination he stated in full the basis of his opinion, so that the first answer was not prejudicial. Insurance Office v. Woolen-Mill Co., 72 Kan. 41, 82 P. 513. He said that the plaintiff was running a hardware store, and that he inferred it was a corporation from its name and its mode of doing business; that a bank president had told him it was a corporation. Possibly this evidence did not tend to show even the de facto existence of the corporation—which is all that could be required (7 R.C.L. 105)—but that will not avail the appellant. One who enters into a written contract with a party described therein as a corporation is precluded, in an action brought thereon by such party under the same designation, from denying its corporate existence. 7 R.C.L. 105, 106; 10 Cyc. 521. Here the payee was styled in the note—"The Lowell-Woodward Hardware Company," a title which prima facie imports a corporation. 3 Encyc. of Ev. 599; 7 R.C.L. 699; note, Ann. Cas.1912A, 969, second column. There is some difference of opinion as to whether one contracting with an organization styling itself a "company," there being nothing further in the language used to indicate its character, the term "corporation" not being employed, can be heard to deny its corporate capacity when sued by it upon the contract. The cases bearing on the question are collected in Ingle System Co. v. Norris & Hall, 132 Tenn. 472, 178 S.W. 1113, which holds, in accordance with what it regards as the weight of authority, that such defense cannot be made. See, also, Toledo Computing Scale Co. v. Young, 16 Idaho, 187, 101 P. 257; Bremen Foundry & Machine Works v. Boswell (Ga.App.) 96 S.E. 182; Grande Ronde Lumber Co. v. Cotton, 12 Colo.App. 375, 55 P. 610. In the leading case to the contrary (Welland Canal Co. v. Hathaway, 8 Wend. [N.Y.] 480, annotated in 24 Am.Dec. 51), the decision turns upon the fact that some of the elements of equitable estoppel, according to the accepted definition, are lacking. We agree that no full, formal, technical estoppel to deny corporate existence arises from such a state of facts, but we think it accords with modern views of good practice and tends to promote substantial justice to hold, and we do hold, that one who has signed a promissory note running to a payee described by a name appropriate to a corporation, although not employing that term, cannot, in an action brought against him thereon by such payee under the same name, in which it alleges itself to be a corporation, be heard to question the plaintiff's corporate existence, unless upon a showing that his obligation to make payment would be thereby affected. The defendant, having given his promise to pay the sum indicated to the payee named, should not be permitted to escape or delay performance by raising an issue as to the character of the organization to which he is indebted, unless his substantial rights might be thereby affected, which would only be under exceptional conditions. It is thoroughly settled that in such a situation the defendant cannot attack the regularity of the plaintiff's organization, or take any advantage of the fact that it has no legal standing as a corporation. No good reason is apparent why, having explicitly promised to make payment to the concern by which he is sued, he should be permitted to question its de facto any more than its de jure character—to inject into the case an issue having no bearing on his obligation to make payment. * *

The judgment is affirmed.

All the Justices concurring.

HARRILL v. DAVIS.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Eighth Circuit, 1909. 168 F. 187.

In Error to the United States Court of Appeals in the Indian Territory. * * *

SANBORN, CIRCUIT JUDGE (after stating the facts as above). The patent and indisputable facts in this case are that the four defendants associated themselves together, and from June, 1902, until December 22, 1902, actively engaged in purchasing lumber, material, and labor of the plaintiff, and in constructing a cotton gin under the name "The Coweta Gin Company," and in conducting the business of buying, selling, and ginning cotton for profit under the name "The Coweta Cotton & Milling Company," and that during this time they incurred more than $4,700 of the indebtedness of $5,145.48 for which this action was brought. On December 22, 1902, they made their first real attempt to incorporate, and for the first time took on the color or appearance of a corporation. On that day they filed articles of incorporation with the clerk of the Court of Appeals, but they never filed any duplicate of them with the clerk of the judicial district in which their place of business was located, as required by the statutes in order to constitute them a legal corporation and to authorize them to do business as such. Act Feb. 18, 1901, c. 379, 31 Stat. 794; Mansfield's Dig. Laws Ark. §§ 960, 968, 979.

The general rule is that parties who associate themselves together and actively engage in business for profit under any name are liable as partners for the debts they incur under that name. It is an exception to this rule that such associates may escape individual liability for such debts by a compliance with incorporation laws or by a real attempt to comply with them which gives the color of a legal corporation, and by the user of the franchise of such a corporation in the honest belief that it is duly incorporated. When the fact appears, as it does in the case at bar, by indisputable evidence that parties associated and knowingly incurred liabilities under a given name, the legal presumption is that they are governed by the general rule, and the burden is upon them to prove that they fall under some exception to it. * * * [Citing cases.] But in every one of these authorities articles of incorporation had been filed under a general enabling act, or a charter had been issued and there had been a user of the franchise of the supposed corporation which had been colorably created by the filing of the articles or the issue of the charter before the indebtedness in question was created, while nothing of this nature had been done before the debt for the $4,700 which we are now considering was incurred. The authorities which have been recited rest upon the proposition that where parties procure a charter or file articles of association under a general law, thereby secure the color of a legal incorporation, believe that they are a corporation, and use the supposed franchise of the corporation in good faith, and third parties deal with them as a corporation, they become a corporation de facto and exempt from individual liability to such third parties, although there are unknown defects in the proceedings for their incorporation. The statement of Morawetz on Corporations, at section 748, upon which counsel seem to rely, that:

"If an association assumes to enter into a contract in a corporate capacity, and the party dealing with the association contracts with it as if it were a corporation, the individual members of the association cannot be charged as parties to the contract, either severally or jointly, or as partners. This is equally true whether the association was in fact a corporation or not, and whether the contract with the association in its corporate capacity was authorized by the Legislature or prohibited by law, or illegal"

—is too broad to be sound. Parties who actively engage in business for profit under the name and pretense of a corporation which they know neither exists nor has any color of existence may not escape individual liability because strangers are led by their pretense to contract with their pretended entity as a corporation. In such cases they act as the agents of a principal that they know does not exist, and they are liable under a familiar rule, because there is no responsible principal. 2 Kent's Commentaries (14th Ed.) 630; Queen City Furniture & Carpet Co. v. Crawford, 127 Mo. 356, 364, 30 S.W. 163. The burden is not on the strangers who deal with them as a corporation, but on themselves who act under the name of a pretended corporation, to see that it is so organized that it exempts them from individual liability, and if they fail in this they must pay the liabilities they incur, even in the absence of fraud or bad faith, upon the salutary principle that where one of two parties must suffer he must bear the loss whose breach of duty caused it.

There are cases in which stockholders who took no active part in the business of a pretended corporation which was acting without any charter or filed articles, who supposed that the corporation was duly organized, have been held exempt from individual liability for the debts it incurred; but if they had been actively conducting its business with knowledge of its lack of incorporation, those decisions must have been otherwise. Seacord v. Pendleton, 55 Hun 579, 9 N.Y.Supp. 46; Fuller v. Rowe, 57 N.Y. 23, 26.

Neither the hope, the belief, nor the statement by parties that they are incorporated, nor the signing of articles of incorporation which are not filed, where filing is requisite to create the corporation, nor the user of the pretended franchise of such a nonexistent corporation, will constitute such a corporation de facto as will exempt those who actively and knowingly use its name to incur obligations from their individual liability to pay them. Color of legal organization as a corporation under some charter or law and user of the supposed corporate franchise in good faith are indispensable to such exemption.

Under the general law of Arkansas in force in the Indian Territory, the filing of articles of incorporation with the clerk of the Court of Appeals was a sine qua non of any color of a legal corporation. Without that there was not, and there could not be, an apparent corporation or the color of a corporation. Agreements to form one, statements that there was one, signed articles of association to make one, acts as one, created no color of incorporation, because there could be no incorporation or color of it under the law until the articles were filed. Johnson v. Corser, 34 Minn. 355, 25 N.W. 799; Finnegan v. Noerenberg, 52 Minn. 239, 243, 244, 53 N.W. 1150, 1151, 18 L.R.A. 778, 38 Am.St.Rep. 552; Taylor on Private Corporations, p. 145, Roberts Mfg. Co. v. Schlick, 62 Minn. 332, 64 N.W. 826. In Finnegan v. Noerenberg, supra, Chief Justice Gilfillan well said:

"To give to a body of men assuming to act as a corporation, where there has been no attempt to comply with the provisions of any law authorizing them to become such, the status of a de facto corporation, might open the door to frauds upon the public. It would certainly be impolitic to permit a number of men to have the status of a corporation to any extent merely because there is a law under which they might have become incorporated, and they have agreed among themselves to act, and they have acted, as a corporation. That was the condition in Johnson v. Corser, 34 Minn. 355, 25 N.W. 799, in which it was held that what had been done was ineffectual to limit the individual liability of the associates. They had not gone far enough to become a de facto corporation. They had merely signed articles, but had not attempted to give them publicity by filing for record, which the statute required."

The defendants cannot escape individual liability for the $4,700 on the ground that the Coweta Cotton & Milling Company was a corporation de facto when that portion of the plaintiff's claim was incurred because it then had no color of incorporation, and they knew it and yet actively used its name to incur the obligation. * * *

Counsel insist that the defendants are not liable here because one who deals with a corporation de facto is estopped from denying its existence as a corporation; but the true meaning and legal effect of this rule is that such a dealer is estopped from denying its existence on the ground that it was not legally incorporated. One who deals with parties who masquerade under a name which represents no corporation de facto is no more estopped from denying that it is a corporation than he would be from denying that they constituted or acted for the Union Pacific Railroad Company, or any other well-known corporation, when they did not. The fact that the plaintiff dealt with and treated the Coweta Cotton & Milling Company as a corporation did not estop it from denying that it was such before the defendants filed their articles of incorporation, because it was not a corporation de facto before that time and because the indispensable elements of an estoppel in pais, ignorance of the truth and absence of equal means of knowledge of it by the party who claims the estoppel, and action by the latter induced by the misrepresentation of the party against whom the estoppel is invoked, do not exist in the case at bar. Bigelow on Estoppel (4th Ed.) p. 679. The plaintiffs did not, and the defendants did, represent that the milling company was a corporation when it was not. The defendants had better means of knowledge of the fact than the plaintiff, and they knew it was not a corporation, and they were not induced to act on any representation of the plaintiff that it was such, or by its treatment of it as such.

Nor was the plaintiff estopped by the fact that its general manager stated under oath in its claim for a lien in May, 1903, that the milling company was a corporation, first, because the defendants were not induced to take any action by this statement from which they can suffer any injury by the proof of the truth, and, second, because one is not estopped from pursuing his true legal remedy by a mistaken attempt to pursue a supposed remedy that does not exist. Standard Oil Company v. Hawkins, 20 C.C.A. 468, 472, 74 F. 395, 398, 399, 33 L.R.A. 739; Barnsdall v. Waltemeyer, 73 C.C.A. 515, 520, 142 F. 415, 420; Bunch v. Grave, 111 Ind. 351, 12 N.E. 514, 517.

It is said that the plaintiff is estopped from denying the existence of the defendant's supposed corporation because it was one of its promoters and stockholders, but the evidence fails to convince us that it was ever either. * * *

And our conclusion is that the defendants never became a corporation de facto prior to December 22, 1902, that they never became a corporation de jure, that the indebtedness here in question was not incurred under any promise or assurance of the defendants as promoters that it should become the obligation of a corporation to be formed, that a large part of it was incurred in the conduct of a general commercial business, and not to prepare for the commencement of such a business or for the organization of a corporation, and that the trial court below should have instructed the jury that the defendants were individually liable for that portion of the plaintiff's claim which was incurred prior to December 22, 1902. Its failure to do so was a fatal error which necessitates a reversal of the judgments below.

In view of the conclusion which has now been reached, it is unnecessary to discuss at length or to determine other questions which are presented in this record. It is sufficient to say regarding the portion of the plaintiff's claim incurred subsequent to December 22, 1902, that while there is a conflict of authority upon the question whether or not incorporators or stockholders remain personally liable after the filing of articles in one office only where the statute requires them to be filed in two offices as a condition of incorporation or of the commencement of business (Mokelumne Hill Canal & Mining Co. v. Woodbury, 14 Cal. 265, 267), the statute under which this case arose was brought into the Indian Territory from the state of Arkansas, and the Supreme Court of that state had held, before it was adopted in the Indian Territory, that such corporators or stockholders remain individually liable under this statute unless and until their articles of incorporation are filed in both offices. Garnett v. Richardson, 35 Ark. 144. * * *

The judgments of the courts below must be reversed, and the case must be remanded to the proper court for a new trial; and it is so ordered.

INTER-OCEAN NEWSPAPER CO. v. ROBERTSON.

Supreme Court of Illinois, 1920. 296 Ill. 92, 129 N.E. 523.

Action by the Inter-Ocean Newspaper Company against John R. Robertson. Judgment for defendant was reversed by the Appellate Court, and defendant brings error. Judgment of Appellate Court reversed, and judgment of municipal court affirmed.

FARMER, J. This action was brought in the municipal court of Chicago by defendant in error against plaintiff in error, who was an officer and stockholder in the Chicago Real Estate Show Company, doing business as a corporation. The amended claim alleged the general manager of the Chicago Real Estate Show Company contracted with the Inter-Ocean Newspaper Company to publish certain advertising for it, which was published, and that $1,047.37 of the contract price had not been paid. The liability for the debt sued for is based on the claim that the Chicago Real Estate Show Company had not complied with section 4 of the corporation statute (Starr & C. Ann. St.1896, c. 32), requiring a corporation to file a certificate of complete organization in the office of the recorder of deeds, and the shareholders were for that reason copartners and liable as such to creditors. It is not disputed that the Chicago Real Estate Show Company applied for a charter as a corporation, that all the requirements of the statute precedent to the issuing to it of a final certificate of organization were complied with, that such final certificate was issued to it by the secretary of state, and that it proceeded to do business as a corporation, and was so doing business when the contract for advertising was made with the Inter-Ocean Newspaper Company. It neglected, however, to file its certificate of complete organization with the recorder of deeds. The affidavit of defense was that the Chicago

Real Estate Show Company was a de facto corporation at the time it made the contract for advertising with the Inter-Ocean Newspaper Company, and that said newspaper company made the contract with it on its credit as a corporation, and not with the stockholders or any of them. In 1911, after the cause of action accrued, the Chicago Real Estate Show Company was adjudged a bankrupt and insolvent. This suit was then brought against the stockholders, none of whom were served except plaintiff in error, to charge them with liability as copartners because the corporation had not completed its organization by filing the certificate in the recorder's office. * * *

The principal and important questions presented for decision are whether the Chicago Real Estate Show Company was a de facto corporation, and whether the stockholders in such a corporation are liable as partners to creditors.

All the requirements of the statute were complied with for the organization of the Chicago Real Estate Show Company as a corporation, and the secretary of state issued to it a certificate of complete organization January 31, 1911. A resolution was adopted, instructing the secretary of the corporation to file the charter or certificate of complete organization for record in accordance with the statute. He neglected to do that, and for that reason it is sought to charge the stockholders with liability as partners. By section 4 of chapter 32 of our statutes, where the provisions necessary to the organization of a corporation have been complied with, the secretary of state shall issue a certificate of complete organization of the corporation—

"and the same shall be recorded in a book for that purpose, in the office of the recorder of deeds of the county where the principal office of such company is located. Upon the recording of the said copy, the corporation shall be deemed fully organized and may proceed to business."

The first question to determine is whether the Chicago Real Estate Show Company was a corporation de facto. The essential conditions for the existence of a de facto corporation are a valid law under which it may be organized, an attempt in good faith to organize under that law, a colorable or apparent compliance with the law, and user of the corporate powers. Under decisions in this state and other jurisdictions, some of which we cite, the Chicago Real Estate Show Company was a corporation de facto, notwithstanding it neglected to file its final certificate of complete organization for record. Marshall v. Keach, 227 Ill. 35, 81 N.E. 29, 118 Am.St.Rep. 247, 10 Ann.Cas. 164; Gillette v. Aurora Railways Co., 228 Ill. 261, 81 N.E. 1005; Bushnell v. Consolidated Ice Machine Co., 138 Ill. 67, 27 N.E. 596; Tulare Irrigation District v. Shepard, 185 U.S. 1, 22 S.Ct. 531, 46 L.Ed. 773.

Whether members and stockholders of a de facto corporation, as distinguished from a de jure corporation, are protected from liability to creditors as partners, the decisions are not in entire accord, but the great weight of the authorities hold they are not liable, in the absence of a statute making them so liable. That the stockholders of a de facto corporation, where the members in good faith supposed they were legally incorporated under a valid law authorizing such incorporation and honestly transacted business as a corporation, should not, in the absence of a positive statutory mandate, be treated and considered as partners as to persons dealing with it as a corporation seems to be absolutely sound. Some expressions used in Loverin v. McLaughlin, 161 Ill. 417, 44 N.E. 99, contrary to that rule and contrary to the great weight of authority, have been substantially repeated in a few subsequent cases, which has caused some doubt and uncertainty, but in none of the cases was the precise question here presented involved for decision. Loverin v. McLaughlin was an action against directors to establish liability against them under section 18 for failing to file for record the certificate of complete organization. The suit was to enforce a purely statutory liability, and did not involve the question of the liability of stockholders as partners at common law. In subsequent cases, where the language of the opinion in Loverin v. McLaughlin was in substance repeated, the action was to enforce a statutory liability against the officers, directors, and agents of the corporation. We do not therefore regard the question in this case as having been determined by this court. The rule is general that stockholders of a corporation are not personally liable at common law to creditors, and individual liability must be created by statute. Golden v. Cervenka, 278 Ill. 409, 116 N.E. 273; Terry v. Little, 101 U.S. 216, 25 L.Ed. 864. And this rule applies to de facto corporations. 1 Cook on Corporations (5th Ed.) § 234. * * *

Cook, in his work on Corporations (vol. 1 [5th Ed.] § 234), says that the great weight of authority has established clearly that the stockholders of a de facto corporation cannot be held liable as partners even though there have been irregularities, omissions, or mistakes in incorporating. The author expresses the view that this is reasonable and just; that parties who dealt with the company as a corporation should not be allowed to claim more than they originally bargained for, and hold the stockholders personally. He says the rule is established beyond reasonable doubt. In our opinion a contrary rule would be far-reaching in its consequences, and often lead to great injustice and hardship to innocent stockholders. It is by no means always practicable for purchasers of stock to examine every step taken in the organization of the corporation, and to hold them individually liable for its debts seems contrary to reason and justice, where there had been no fraud, but an honest effort had been made to effect a legal organization, and both the incorporators and stockholders in good faith believed the corporation legal, but some mistake or omission had been made such as here—neglect to file the final certificate of its complete organization for record.

Section 18 of our statute on corporations makes an officer, agent, or board of directors of a pretended corporation, who assume to exercise corporate powers without complying with the provisions of the statute, liable for debts contracted by them in the name of such corporation, but there is no statutory enactment making the stockholders liable in such case. In the absence of an express statute declaring such liability, we hold, in harmony with the great weight of authority, such liability does not exist. This conclusion makes unnecessary the discussion of other questions raised and discussed in the briefs of counsel.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is reversed, and the judgment of the municipal court affirmed.

FRAWLEY v. TENAFLY TRANSPORTATION COMPANY.

Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, 1921. 95 N.J.L. 405, 113 A. 242.

Separate actions by Teresa C. Frawley, individually and as administratrix of the estate of John F. Frawley, deceased, and of Vincent C. Frawley, deceased, against the Tenafly Transportation Company. Judgment for plaintiff in each case, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

WALKER, CH. This is an appeal from each of three judgments in the Supreme Court recovered by the above-named plaintiff in three actions at law brought in the Supreme Court tried at the Bergen circuit before Cutler, J., and a jury. The cases, which arose out of the same accident, were tried together and involve common questions of law and fact. All of the questions raised on these appeals apply equally and the same to each of the three cases, were argued together, and will be so decided.

The facts appearing from the evidence are as follows: On April 25, 1919, the plaintiff Teresa C. Frawley, John F. Frawley, her husband, and Vincent C. Frawley, her son, were passengers in a jitney bus which collided with another jitney bus on Jay street in the borough of Tenafly, and in the collision each of the persons named sustained serious injuries, as a result of which John F. Frawley and Vincent C. Frawley died, and the three suits were instituted by Teresa C. Frawley individually for personal injuries sustained by her, one by the same Teresa C. Frawley as administratrix ad prosequendum of her deceased husband's estate, and one by the same Teresa C. Frawley as administratrix ad prosequendum of her deceased son's estate. Both of the jitney busses which figure in the accident had the same ownership, but in whom the title was vested or who employed the chauffeurs of the busses at the time of the accident are questions which were submitted to the trial court and are involved in this appeal. The defendant-appellant in his brief admits that the evidence establishes that one or both of the chauffeurs of the jitney busses at the time of the accident was, or were, negligent, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's and her intestates' injuries. The three suits were originally against the defendant-appellant as a corporation, Harry Sabin, Martin M. Rothbart, Ernest Capitani and David Shiffman, as copartners, jointly and severally as individuals doing business under the name of Tenafly Transportation Company. The defendant company denied that it was a corporation on April 25, 1919, the date of the accident, denied that it was the owner of the busses in question, and denied its negligence, or the negligence of its servants or employés. It pleaded affirmatively that it was not a corporation on April 25, 1919, and that it did not own or operate, by its servants or otherwise, the jitney busses referred to, and that its certificate of incorporation was filed with the secretary of state on April 29, 1919, having been recorded in the Bergen county clerk's office on April 26, 1919. These facts as to recording and filing of the certificate of incorporation were proved. Therefore, in order to recover, the plaintiff-respondent was required to show that the defendant company was a de facto corporation when the accident occurred, and was at that time the owner of the busses and the employer of the chauffeurs who operated them.

When the testimony was all in and the case rested, a motion was made for a nonsuit on behalf of the defendant company, upon the ground that its corporate existence at the time of the accident had not been proved, and upon the further ground that the ownership and operation of the busses at that time had not been proved. This motion was denied. * * *

On April 2, 1919, the busses in question were owned by the New Jersey Transportation Company, and on that day were sold to the four individuals above named. They commenced the operation of the busses in their business. On April 9, 1919, they applied to the borough of Tenafly in the name of the Tenafly Transportation Company, Incorporated, for an owner's license for the two busses in question, and filed with the borough an insurance policy in the name of the corporation, pursuant to the provisions of a borough ordinance, agreeing therein to operate the busses in strict conformity with the provisions of the ordinance. This application was granted on April 10, 1919. On April 11th they applied for and obtained from the authorities at Camp Merritt a license to operate the busses at the camp in the name of Tenafly Transportation Company, representing it as a corporation. On April 23, 1919, Rothbart, Shiffman, and Capitani signed and sealed a certificate of incorporation of the "Tenafly Transportation Company." This certificate was received in the Bergen county clerk's office on April 26, 1919, and there recorded. It was filed in the office of the secretary of state on April 29, 1919. On April 23, 1919, the date on which the certificate of incorporation was signed, Rothbart, Shiffman and Capitani made and executed to the "Tenafly Transportation Company, a corporation," for the consideration therein expressed, a bill of sale for ten busses described by numbers in a schedule annexed, including the two in question. The bill of sale ran to the corporation, its successors and assigns. These three men intended to form a corporation. The first certificate drawn for them was not executed because they changed their minds about the amount of capital stock. The second certificate, the one executed April 23, was drawn from instructions previously given by the three men. It was sent to them by counsel with directions to have it executed, which they did. It was returned to counsel on or about April 24, 1919, and on April 25 he mailed it to the Bergen county clerk, who recorded it and in a day or so returned it to counsel, and he then on or about April 27, mailed it to the secretary of state for filing. On April 25, 1919, the day of the accident, and previously the company had an office for the transaction of business in the borough of Tenafly, where a stenographer and bookkeeper were employed. Drivers of the two cars in question were employed and paid with money contained in envelopes on which was printed "Tenafly Transportation Company, Incorporated." There was also a garage connected with the office, at which the cars were kept, and Rothbart, one of the incorporators, was acting as president of the corporation, by agreement with the other two incorporators. The defendants did not testify, and there is no affirmative evidence that they did business as a partnership or as individuals in the name of the Tenafly Transportation Company or otherwise. It is noticeable that the company was sometimes called "Tenafly Transportation Company, Incorporated," and sometimes "Tenafly Transportation Company"; but this is unimportant except to show that the three associates were bent upon having their company incorporated and to have it known as a corporation. It was, as already observed, actually incorporated as "Tenafly Transportation Company."

The grounds of appeal, which are the same in each case, are: (1) Because the court failed and refused to grant the motion for nonsuit made by the defendant at the close of the plaintiff's case; (2) because the court failed and declined to direct a verdict for the defendant, Tenafly Transportation Company, Incorporated, in accordance with the motion of the defendant at the close of the evidence in the trial of the case. The third, fourth, and seventh grounds of appeal are abandoned, and appear to be covered in the fifth and sixth grounds. The latter two pertain to the charge of the trial judge.

As to the question of de facto corporation, which is the principal ground involved in the motion to nonsuit and direct a verdict: By our act concerning corporations (Revision 1896, Comp.Stat. p. 1604, § 10), it is provided that, upon making the certificate of incorporation and causing the same to be recorded in the office of the county clerk and filed in the office of the secretary of state, the persons so associated, their successors and assigns, shall from the date of such filing be and constitute a body corporate. It is argued from this that the corporation defendant was not a body corporate on the day of the accident, because its certificate was not recorded in the county clerk's office until the day afterward, and not filed in the secretary of state's office until four days afterward. The answer is that it was nevertheless a de facto corporation. * * *

In McCarter v. Ketcham, 72 N.J.L. 247, 62 A. 693, it appeared that on a day while the earlier corporation act was in force certain persons signed a certificate of incorporation, held the first meeting, elected officers, and did business. The certificate was filed in the county clerk's office, but was never filed in the secretary of state's office; and yet this court held (72 N.J.L. at page 253, 62 A. at page 695):

"The company was a fully organized, active corporation de facto. It needed only the filing of its certificate in the office of the secretary of state to be a corporation de jure. When the corporation purchased from Holloway property which Holloway's creditors might reach, the rights of outside persons intervened, and the original stockholders and incorporators could not end the corporation by agreement among themselves to abandon the enterprise or by destroying the certificate of incorporation. Bibb v. Hall, 101 Ala. 79, 14 So. 98; Aultman v. Waddle, 40 Kan. 195, 19 P. 730."

And this in the face of the statute in existence at the time of the decision of the Vanneman Case, which, as seen, provided that the company should become incorporated upon making, recording, and filing its certificate.

In Belvidere Water Co. v. Belvidere, 82 N.J.L. 601, it was held at page 603, 83 A. 241, at page 242:

"The question, therefore, is whether this action is maintainable in the name of the Belvidere Water Company. This depends, not upon the de jure, but upon the de facto, existence of such a corporation at the time suit was brought."

The only remaining question on this score is as to whether the facts in evidence justified the jury in finding the corporation defendant liable, and their verdict against the defendant corporation amounted to such finding. It included a finding that the three individual defendants had attempted bona fide to form a corporation, and that they had likewise done acts which amounted to the exercise of corporate powers. There was evidence from which the jury could draw these conclusions, and it is settled law that on appeal to this court, if there be any evidence warranting the finding of facts in the court below, its judgment on that score will be sustained. The bill of sale for the busses in question made by the individual defendants to the defendant company, and their operation by that concern as a de facto corporation, dispose of the contention that there was no proof to show ownership of the machines by the company. Therefore the overruling of the motions to nonsuit and direct a verdict was right. * * *

The views above expressed lead to an affirmance of the three judgments under review.

THIES v. WEIBLE et al. (FARMERS' UNION LIVE STOCK CREDIT ASSOCIATION, Intervener).

Supreme Court of Nebraska, 1934. 126 Neb. 720, 254 N.W. 420.

Action by Louis Thies against Fred W. Weible and others, wherein the Farmers' Union Live Stock Credit Association intervened. From an adverse judgment, the intervener appeals.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions.

[Chattel mortgage on cattle issued by corporation which in fact never existed, was levied upon. Question whether it was good as between the parties.]

HASTINGS, DISTRICT JUDGE. * * * It is claimed by appellee that the chattel mortgage was void between the parties for the following reasons: (1) That the Weible Mercantile Company never had any existence as a corporation; (2) that the description of the cattle in the mortgage as to the cattle levied upon was insufficient; and (3) that the Weible Mercantile Company was not the owner of the cattle at the time of the execution of the mortgage. It is urged by appellee that the Weible Mercantile Company never had any existence as a corporation, for the reason that some of the incorporators and others, who are stockholders therein, are infants. The answer, in effect, admits a colorable attempt on the part of the alleged incorporators to organize a corporation. The record shows that articles of incorporation, duly signed and acknowledged by the corporators, were adopted by the Weible Mercantile Company on December 3, 1927, and filed and recorded in the office of the county clerk of Wayne county on December 7, 1927, and also that such articles were filed and recorded in the office of the secretary of state on December 9, 1927. The Weible Mercantile Company, since the filing of its articles of incorporation, has continuously carried on and transacted the business of buying and selling live stock, grain and feed, and groceries, as provided for in its articles of incorporation. It has elected officers to carry on the said business, adopted and used a corporate seal, and during all of said time the judgment debtor, Fred W. Weible, has been the managing officer and secretary thereof. Furthermore, it has made and published statements as to its financial condition.

Section 24-201, Comp.St.1929, provides that any number of persons may be associated and incorporated for the transaction of any lawful business, and infants are not expressly excluded by the statute as persons who may not associate themselves with others in forming corporations. We do not find it necessary in this case to decide whether they may do so or not. Although a de jure corporation may not have been formed, owing to the incapacity of some of the corporators, we are convinced that there was a corporation de facto whose existence cannot be questioned by appellee in this action. The general rule is: "When persons assume to act as a body, and are permitted by the acquiescence of the public and the state to act as if they were legally a particular kind of corporation, for the organization, existence, and continuance of which there is express recognition by the general law, such a body of persons is a corporation de facto, although the particular persons thus exercising the franchise of being a corporation may have been ineligible and incapacitated by the law to do so. This is on the same principle on which it is held that a person may be a de facto officer, although ineligible." 1 Clark and Marshall, Private Corporations, 260, par. g. See 1 Fletcher, Cyclopedia Corporations, 595, § 292; American Salt Co. v. Heidenheimer, 80 Tex. 344, 15 S.W. 1038, 26 Am.St.Rep. 743.

We have frequently held that where the law authorizes a corporation and there has been an attempt in good faith to organize, and the requirements of the statute have been colorably complied with and corporate functions thereunder exercised, there exists a corporation de facto which ordinarily cannot be called into question collaterally. [Citing cases.]

The reason a collateral attack by a third person will not avail against a corporation de facto is that, if the rights and franchises have been usurped, they are the rights and franchises of the state, and it alone can challenge the validity of the franchise. Until such interposition, the public may treat those in possession and exercising corporate powers under color of law as doing so rightfully. The rule is in the interest of the public and is essential to the safety of business transactions with corporations. It would produce disorder and confusion, embarrass and endanger the rights and interests of all dealing with the association, if the legality of its existence could be drawn into question in every suit in which it is a party or in which rights were involved springing out of its corporate existence. 1 Fletcher, Cyclopedia Corporations, 545, § 276; Duggan v. Colorado Mortgage & Investment Co., 11 Colo. 113, 17 P. 105; 14 C.J. 204–207; 7 R.C.L. 60, § 42; 1 Clark and Marshall, Private Corporations, 241, § 82.

Speaking of an attempt to question the legal existence of a corporation, this court has said in Haas v. Bank of Commerce, supra: "It would be intolerable to permit, in any civil action to which such a body was a party, an inquiry into the legal right to exercise corporate functions,—a right which it is for the state alone to question in appropriate proceedings for that purpose. On this there is a substantial unanimity in the authorities."

The attempt is made in this case, although the corporation is not even a party to the action. "A mortgage made by or to a corporation de facto is as valid as if it were made by or to a corporation de jure, and cannot be attacked on the ground of want of incorporation, either by the mortgagor or by persons claiming under him or it, or by third persons." 1 Clark and Marshall, Private Corporations, 234, § 3.

In this case the appellant dealt with the Weible Mercantile Company in good faith, believing that it was a corporation, and was entitled to assume that the corporation rightfully possessed corporate powers. The appellee, having acquired no right or interest in the mortgaged property by reason of the levy, will not be permitted to make a collateral attack on the existence of the Weible Mercantile Company as a corporation. * * *

The trial court erred in adjudging that the sheriff pay the fund in question to the appellee. The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded with directions to enter judgment for the appellant, and directing that payment of the fund in question be made to appellant.

Reversed.

TRUSTEES OF EAST NORWAY LAKE NORWEGIAN EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH and others v. FROISLIE and another.

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1887. 37 Minn. 447, 35 N.W. 260.

MITCHELL, J. On the trial of this case much irrelevant and immaterial evidence was introduced or offered, and almost all of the evidence offered by either party was objected to by the other. And when the case comes here on appeal, we are confronted with the formidable number of 42 assignments of error. But when this mass of rubbish is removed, the material facts are found to be comparatively simple, and the legal questions involved very few.

The action is ejectment. The common source of title under which both parties claim is a religious society incorporated under title 4, c. 37, Gen.St., under the name of "The Trustees of the Norwegian Evangelical Lutheran Church of Norway Lake, Kandiyohi county, Minnesota," and called on the trial the "Old Society." This society acquired title of the premises in dispute by deed from Hanson and Heden, and used and occupied them as a parsonage or residence for their pastor. They employed as pastor one Markus, who received for his services as such a certain cash salary, and the use of this parsonage as a residence. He went into possession in October, 1870, and occupied it under this arrangement until the division of the society hereinafter referred to. In 1877 the members of the society having determined to divide, two new societies were organized, or attempted to be organized, under the statute. As appears from their respective certificates of incorporation, the name adopted by one of them was "The Trustees of the East Norway Lake Norwegian Evangelical Lutheran Church of Kandiyohi county, Minnesota," and by the other, "The Trustees of the West Norway Lake Evangelical Lutheran Church of the town of Norway Lake, Kandiyohi county, Minnesota." All of the members of the old society went into one or the other of these two, and thereafter the organization of the old society appears to have been abandoned, except for the purpose of closing up their business, and disposing of their property. Both of these new societies have ever since been in the exercise of all the usual powers and functions of religious corporations. They continued, however, to worship together in the old church until as late as June, 1878. At a meeting of the old society held June 28, 1878, it being desired to transfer their property to the two new organizations, but the description of a part of it in their deed from Hanson and Heden being considered not sufficiently definite, it was thought that the best way to correct this and accomplish the desired object was to reconvey to Hanson and Heden, and have them convey to the new societies. The society thereupon adopted a resolution authorizing their trustees to convey to Hanson and Heden, and requiring the latter then to convey to the two new societies. In pursuance of this the trustees of the old society conveyed to Hanson and Heden, and they in turn to plaintiff. This is plaintiffs' title. * * *

Defendants, however, attack plaintiffs' title. They claim that they were never legally organized, and hence were incapable of taking or holding property. The points made in support of this contention are that the meetings at which the organizations were attempted to be made were not held after sufficient notice; that the certificates of incorporation were not properly executed, acknowledged, or recorded, etc.; and that chapter 193, Sp.Laws 1878, purporting to legalize the organizations, is unconstitutional. Under the view we take of the case it is wholly unnecessary to consider any of these questions. The plaintiffs are at least corporations de facto. Such a corporation, at least where there is a law under which a corporation might have been legally formed with such power, is capable of taking and holding property as grantee, as well as a corporation de jure, and conveyances to it are valid as to all the world, except the state in proceedings in quo warranto, or other direct proceedings to inquire into its right to exercise corporate franchises. And in an action by it to recover such property, no private person will be allowed to inquire collaterally into the regularity of its organization. This rule is not founded upon any principle of estoppel, as is sometimes assumed, but upon the broader principles of common justice and public policy. It would be unjust and intolerable if, under such circumstances, every interloper and intruder were allowed thus to take advantage of every informality or irregularity of organization. * * *

Judgment affirmed.

ENTERPRISE ENTITY: DISREGARD OF THE CORPORATE FICTION

NOTE

"DISREGARD OF THE CORPORATE FICTION"

One of the most rapidly growing sectors of corporation law is a division which deals with what is called "disregard of the corporate fiction". There has been no careful study of this subject resulting in general agreement systematizing and classifying this branch of the law. Student and professor alike have a clear opportunity to do independent thinking, which is more than likely to influence the further development of the law itself.

By doctrine, the corporation was a fictitious personality with independent entity. Yet it early developed that under certain circumstances this entity was lost, or was disregarded by the courts under certain circumstances. If the courts could attach the incidents of corporate entity to an imperfect corporation ("de facto corporations"), they could also decline to give attributes of entity and personality to perfectly organized corporations. This was called "disregard of the corporate fiction".

Yet under this general heading were lumped a whole series of disparate situations. Thus, corporate entity could be disregarded (lost?) where the corporation, though perfectly formed, so mingled its assets, accounts and operations with those of others as to become indistinguishable as an enterprise. This frequently occurs between a parent corporation and its subsidiary corporation, and sometimes appears as a doctrine under "Parent and Subsidiary", but it is clear that the same result would occur if an individual owner of the stock of a corporation mingled the assets and accounts and so forth with his own.

Where the corporation is organized as a mere endeavor to screen the associates in doing a forbidden act, the courts can disregard the entity. A famous case was the so-called Northern Securities case (193 U.S. 197, 24 S.Ct. 436), in which an attempt was made to escape the application of the anti-trust laws to railroads by forming a holding company which was to take over a controlling interest of the securities of the railroads designed to be united. It was held that the court could look through the fictitious entity of the personality and determine that there was really an agreement between the component railroads. Again, where the enterprise, though incorporated, has been outfitted with such inadequate capital and assets that it plainly operates not on its own financial bottom but on the bottom of someone else, the courts disregard the corporate entity at least to the extent of attaching the liabilities of the corporation to the person or the corporation really furnishing the basic assets and operation.

Again, where a parent, though supplying a subsidiary corporation with assets, obtrudes itself into the management of the subsidiary and manages the affairs of the subsidiary not in the interests of the subsidiary corporation, but in the interest of the parent, the courts likewise look through the corporate entity. Naturally where the subsidiary is wholly owned, there is no outsider to complain, so long as creditors are paid. But where there are outside stockholders of a subsidiary, the courts, having disregarded the entity, may then endeavor to repair the wrong to the outsider. One such application of this is the famous Deep Rock case (Taylor et al. v. Standard Gas & Electric Company et al., 306 U.S. 307, 59 S.Ct. 543, post) in which the courts having ascertained that the subsidiary had been managed, not as an independent enterprise standing on its own bottom, but as an integral part of the parent's operations and for its benefit, subordinated a debt due to the parent from the subsidiary to the prior claims of the preferred stockholders of the subsidiary.

The generalizations from these cases are anything but satisfactory. It is sometimes said that the corporate entity will be disregarded where necessary "to do equity", the length of the Chancellor's foot being apparently the only test of equity; and in an extreme case (Anderson v. Abbott, 321 U.S. 804, 64 S.Ct. 845, post), where necessary to give effect to public policy—which is subject to the familiar comment that "public policy" can be a very wild horse indeed unless it is clearly defined.

The editors submit as a possible analysis, that:

1. "Disregard of the corporate fiction" covers two distinct situations, namely,
   (a) sheer loss of corporate entity because the fictitious corporate entity has lost factual connection with the entity of the enterprise actually being carried on (the cases of mingling of assets and accounts are typical in this field); and
   (b) cases in which conduct contrary to settled public policy or statutory rule, or conduct constituting a wrong to any group of parties requires disregarding the corporate entity for the purpose of working out a remedy. The remedy is adapted to the wrong done and the reparation required and may be
      (i) subordination of the claims of the parent to the claims of third parties in a subsidiary (the Deep Rock case doctrine);
      (ii) attachment of the liabilities of the subsidiary to the assets of the parent as may be equitable to the assets of the combined parent-subsidiary taken together;
      (iii) required payment from the parent to the subsidiary, using the subsidiary as the vehicle through which the various classes of its creditors and stockholders may be placed in a position in which they would have been had the condemned conduct not occurred;
      (iv) simple nullification of any effect of the intervention of the subsidiary and judgment of the transaction as though the persons composing the subsidiary had acted as such (the cases disregarding corporation fiction for violation of criminal statute, public policy, etc.). Naturally the types of remedy will ramify with the wrong to be remedied.

The words "parent" and "subsidiary" have been used frequently in this note because this is the familiar, almost typical form in which the problem comes up. Plainly the fact that the parent is a corporation is not essential.

The following are sources of cases evidencing the principal fields in which the corporate entity has been disregarded.

TELIS v. TELIS et al.

Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, 1942. 132 N.J.Eq. 25, 26 A.2d 249.

Suit by Sophie Telis against Jacob Telis and Telise's Bargain Store to attach an inchoate right of dower to real estate held by corporate defendant. From an adverse decree, complainant appeals.

Reversed and remanded.

PERSKIE, JUSTICE. The question for decision in this cause, between husband and wife, is whether the Advisory Master erred in advising a decree dismissing that part of the wife's bill which sought to attach an inchoate right of dower to certain real estate, legal title to which was in a corporation formed by the husband for the alleged purpose of defrauding the wife and depriving her of her right of dower in and to the realty.

The bill of complaint filed by the wife sets forth two causes of action. The first cause of action was for support and maintenance. After hearing, an order was entered directing the payment by the husband of $15 a week to the wife. This order is not here challenged.

The second cause of action was predicated upon allegations that the husband caused real estate located at 223 South Connecticut Avenue, in Atlantic City, to be purchased in the name of a corporation owned and wholly controlled by him, solely for the purpose of defrauding his wife of her dower right in and to that real estate. Although at the hearing the husband offered to convey the property to his wife, he apparently suffered a change of heart and refused to carry out his promise. The Advisory Master then advised a decree dismissing this cause of action upon the ground that the proofs failed to disclose that any fraud was perpetrated. The wife has appealed from this decree.

Notwithstanding that there is considerable dispute over the legal effect of the proofs, the basic facts are, in the main, uncontradicted. The parties were married in New York in 1921. Two children were born of the marriage, a boy now nineteen years old and a girl now twelve years of age. The former is an invalid as a result of paralysis. Shortly after the marriage, the husband commenced periodically to disappear, on several occasions taking European trips. The husband deserted his wife in New York in 1933 and did not reappear until April of 1937 when he called upon her to take her to Atlantic City to show her a store he was operating there. During the interval of his desertion, he failed to provide for his wife and children. From 1937, he contributed $40 a month for their support during the winter months. In the summer months they lived in one room, provided by the husband, in a rooming house in Atlantic City. They largely depended for sustenance, raiment and medical care upon the efforts of the wife and the charity of her friends and relatives.

On March 20, 1939, the husband formed a corporation called Telise's Bargain Store and thereafter operated his business under that corporate name. The certificate of incorporation was filed in the county clerk's office on March 22, 1939 but it does not appear when, if ever, the certificate was filed with the Secretary of State. One hundred shares of stock were purportedly issued, 98 to the husband, one to his son and one to Sarah Steinmetz. These shares, however, were never delivered to the owners but were retained by the husband, respondent herein. Approximately eight months later, on November 6, 1939, the corporation entered into an agreement to purchase the aforesaid property, and on December 28, 1939 a deed to this property was delivered to the corporation. The purchase price was $4,400 of which sum respondent paid in cash $1,331.41, the balance, exclusive of settlement charges, being secured by a purchase money mortgage apparently executed by the corporation. It is against this property in the name of "Telise's Bargain Store" that the wife sought to attach her inchoate right of dower. It appears that the corporation is about to sell this property but the parties have stipulated that in the event of sale the proceeds will be left in escrow pending the outcome of this appeal. * * *

Notwithstanding all this, we are of the mind that the relief sought should be granted upon the ground that respondent is in fact the owner of the realty and, therefore, his wife is entitled to her inchoate right of dower therein. For the wife is not only entitled to dower in real estate held to the use of her husband but also in real estate "whereof" the "husband" himself was seized of an estate of inheritance during coverture. N.J.S.A. 3:37–1. If under the dower act a wife's dower right may be secured against one who holds to the use of her husband, in reason and justice she should, and we hold that she is, entitled to the same relief when, as here, the husband factually is the owner of the real estate, irrespective of the corporate form employed to veil that ownership.

The right of our courts, in a proper case, to pierce the corporate veil can not be gainsaid. The common exercise of that right does not trench upon the general principle that a "corporation is not an individual even if the individual owned all the stock of the corporation." White v. Evans, 117 N.J.Eq. 1, 3, 174 A. 731, 732; Jennings v. Studebaker Sales Corp., 112 N.J.L. 399, 170 A. 626; Jackson v. Hooper, 76 N.J.Eq. 592, 598, et seq., 75 A. 568, 27 L.R.A.,N.S., 658. Nor does it trench upon the established principle that the legality of the existence of a de facto corporation may be attacked only by the state in a direct proceeding, by information in the nature of quo warranto proceedings. Cf. St. John The Baptist, etc., Church v. Gengor, 121 N.J.Eq. 349, 357, 189 A. 113; Elizabethtown Gas-Light Co. v. Green, 46 N.J.Eq. 118, 18 A. 844, affirmed 49 N.J.Eq. 329, 24 A. 560. Rather is the common exercise of the right to pierce the corporate veil deeply and firmly rooted in the principle that our courts do not permit the doctrine of corporate entity to be used for the purpose of defeating justice.

The proofs in the case at bar clearly satisfy us that the respondent The corporation was never perfected; respondent held all of the stock notwithstanding that the two shares were in the name of others; and not Telise's Bargain Store, the corporation, owns the real estate.

there never was a formal meeting; no by-laws were ever adopted and corporate funds were intermingled with respondent's funds and used in payment of respondent's personal obligations. Form and not substance was effected. These and all other circumstances in the case entirely convince us that the corporate creation was, and its existence is, a mere sham, a mere subterfuge, a mere instrumentality employed for concealing the truth and, therefore, in the equitable sense, fraudulent.

The denial of the wife's statutory right of dower, under the circumstances of the case at bar, defeated the relief to which she was justly entitled and, therefore, can not be permitted. She is entitled to have her statutory right of dower in and to the premises in question secured to her. We so hold. * * *

The decree is reversed with costs.

BERKEY v. THIRD AVENUE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1926. 244 N.Y. 84, 155 N.E. 58.

Actions by Minnie Best Berkey and Charles P. Berkey against the Third Avenue Railway Company. From an order of the Appellate Division (217 App.Div. 504, 217 N.Y.S. 156), reversing a judgment of the Trial Term, which dismissed complaints, and granting new trial, defendant appeals. Order reversed, and judgment of the Trial Term affirmed.

CARDOZO, J. The plaintiff boarded a street car at Fort Lee Ferry and One Hundred and Twenty-Fifth street on October 4, 1916, in order to go east on One Hundred and Twenty-Fifth street to Broadway, and thence south on Broadway to Columbia University at One Hundred and Seventeenth street. She was hurt in getting out of the car through the negligence of the motorman in charge of it. The franchise to operate a street railroad along the route traveled by the plaintiff belongs to the Forty-Second Street, Manhattanville & Saint Nicholas Avenue Railway Company (described for convenience as the Forty-Second Street Company), and no one else. Substantially all the stock of that company is owned by the Third Avenue Railway Company, the defendant, which has its own franchise along other streets and avenues. Stock ownership alone would be insufficient to charge the dominant company with liability for the torts of the subsidiary. Elenkrieg v. Siebrecht, 238 N.Y. 254, 144 N.E. 519, 34 A.L.R. 592; Stone v. Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. R. Co., 202 N.Y. 352, 95 N.E. 816, 35 L.R.A.,N.S., 770.

The theory of the action is that under the screen of this subsidiary and others, the defendant does in truth operate for itself the entire system of connected roads, and is thus liable for the torts of the consolidated enterprise. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minneapolis Civic & Commerce Ass'n, 247 U.S. 490, 38 S.Ct. 553, 62 L.Ed. 1229; Davis v. Alexander, 269 U.S. 114, 46 S.Ct. 34, 70 L.Ed. 186. * * *

Liability of the parent has never been adjudged when the subsidiary has maintained so consistently and in so many ways as here the separate organization that is the mark of a separate existence, and when the implication of a contract for unity of operation would be the implication of a contract for the commission of a crime.

The whole problem of the relation between parent and subsidiary corporations is one that is still enveloped in the mists of metaphor. Metaphors in law are to be narrowly watched, for starting as devices to liberate thought, they end often by enslaving it. We say at times that the corporate entity will be ignored when the parent corporation operates a business through a subsidiary which is characterized as an "alias" or a "dummy." All this is well enough if the picturesqueness of the epithets does not lead us to forget that the essential term to be defined is the act of operation. Dominion may be so complete, interference so obtrusive, that by the general rules of agency the parent will be a principal and the subsidiary an agent. Where control is less than this, we are remitted to the tests of honesty and justice. Ballantine, Parent and Subsidiary Corporations, 14 Cal.Law Review, 12, 18, 19, 20. The logical consistency of a juridical conception will indeed be sacrificed at times, when the sacrifice is essential to the end that some accepted public policy may be defended or upheld. This is so, for illustration, though agency in any proper sense is lacking, where the attempted separation between parent and subsidiary will work a fraud upon the law. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minneapolis Civic & Commerce Ass'n, 247 U.S. 490, 38 S.Ct. 553, 62 L.Ed. 1229; United States v. Reading Co., 253 U.S. 26, 61, 63, 40 S.Ct. 425, 64 L.Ed. 760. At such times unity is ascribed to parts which, at least for many purposes, retain an independent life, for the reason that only thus can we overcome a perversion of the privilege to do business in a corporate form. We find in the case at hand neither agency on the one hand, nor, on the other, abuse to be corrected by the implication of a merger. On the contrary, merger might beget more abuses than it stifled. Statutes carefully framed for the protection, not merely of creditors, but of all who travel upon railroads, forbid the confusion of liabilities by extending operation over one route to operation on another. In such circumstances, we thwart the public policy of the state instead of defending or upholding it, when we ignore the separation between subsidiary and parent and treat the two as one.

The order of the Appellate Division should be reversed, and the judgment of the Trial Term affirmed with costs in the Appellate Division and in this court.

KEYSTONE MINING COMPANY v. GRAY (BITUMINOUS COAL PRODUCERS BOARD FOR DIST. NO. 1, Intervener).

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Third Circuit, 1941. 120 F.2d 1.

Petition by the Keystone Mining Company to review and set aside an order of H. A. Gray, Director of the Bituminous Coal Division, Department of the Interior, United States of America, denying the petitioner's request for an order exempting it from the provisions of section 4 and section 4-A of the Bituminous Coal Act of 1937, with respect to coal produced and disposed of by it, wherein the Bituminous Coal Producers Board for District No. 1 intervened.

Order of the Director affirmed.

BIGGS, CIRCUIT JUDGE.

The Facts.

The petitioner, Keystone Mining Company, is a corporation of the State of Pennsylvania, wholly owned and controlled by the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad Company. It has no funded indebtedness. It owns coal-mining properties in Pennsylvania and produces coal from its mines at cost for use in the locomotives of the Lackawanna Railroad Company. The petitioner has a board consisting of five directors who are elected by the vote of the stock held by the Lackawanna Railroad Company. Two of these directors are officials of the Lackawanna Railroad Company, being respectively general attorney and general superintendent. Keystone's treasurer is also the secretary-treasurer of the Lackawanna Railroad Company; its auditor is assistant to the Lackawanna Railroad Company's comptroller. The petitioner has an office at Scranton, Pennsylvania, which is furnished to it gratis by the Lackawanna Railroad Company. The coal company's books are maintained at Lackawanna Railroad Company's office at New York City.

The petitioner has absolute ownership of the coal properties, the mining equipment and accessories. It leases some parts of the properties to third persons. The title to the coal mined is retained by Keystone until it is loaded for shipment in cars at the tipples upon its property. The petitioner has a mining supply store which is managed by it. The Lackawanna Railroad Company does not supervise Keystone's operations. These operations are conducted by petitioner's general superintendent subject to the supervision of its president. These two officers are neither directors, officers, nor employees of the Lackawanna Railroad Company. Keystone's legal work is handled by its secretary who is not employed by the Lackawanna Railroad Company.

The petitioner employs about nine hundred men. Its superintendent hires and discharges them. He purchases all mining supplies and necessary equipment and bills them to petitioner. The coal company maintains its own bank account and pays its employees by checks drawn against this account. Its employees who are also employees of the Lackawanna Railroad Company receive salary checks from the petitioner which cover their services to it in so far as their services can be allocated to it. Charges capable of being allocated directly to Keystone are paid by it. Petitioner enters into collective bargaining contracts with a local of the United Mine Workers of America at Scranton and is also a member of an operators association. It assumes liability for all accidents which may happen to its employees, settles claims against it, using its own checks and vouchers for this purpose, and, being a self-insurer under the Pennsylvania Workmen's Compensation Insurance Law, has deposited United States government bonds under a trust agreement in accordance with law.

Keystone pays its own federal, state and local taxes, files in its own name all the returns and reports required of it, including the reports required by the National Bituminous Coal Commission. * * *

Prior to 1934, when consolidated income tax returns were filed by the Lackawanna Railroad Company for itself and Keystone, the coal company delivered all of its coal to the railroad company at approximately the market price. Following the abolition of the consolidated income tax privilege that practice was abandoned. Prior to 1934, Keystone also declared dividends. These, however, never were actually paid to the Lackawanna Railroad Company, but were reflected in bookkeeping items by the two companies; that is to say, the coal company received credits upon the books of the railroad company to the extent of the dividends declared by Keystone. The general policies of the petitioner are established by consultation between its president and the president of the Lackawanna Railroad Company. * * *

The Agency Rule.

The agency rule is an instrumentality for piercing the veil of the corporate entity, a fiction oddly [4] employed to look through a fiction. The petitioner has cited on its brief a number of typical cases in which the agency rule has been applied. For example in Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company v. Minneapolis Civic & Commerce Association, 247 U.S. 490, 500, 501, 38 S.Ct. 553, 62 L.Ed. 1229, the Supreme Court held that the Minneapolis Eastern Railway Company could not impose carrying charges distinct from those of its parent corporation simply because it was a separate legal entity. See also the opinion of Mr. Justice Holmes in Gulf Oil Corporation v. Lewellyn, 248 U.S. 71, 72, 39 S.Ct. 35, 63 L.Ed. 133.

In Hart Steel Company v. Railroad Supply Company, 244 U.S. 294, 298, 37 S.Ct. 506, 61 L.Ed. 1148, it was held that the agency rule might be asserted in a patent case to prevent the retrial of an issue previously adjudicated. In Southern Pacific Company v. Lowe, Jr., Collector, 247 U.S. 330, 337, 38 S.Ct. 540, 62 L.Ed. 1142, the rule was invoked to the end that dividends "constructively" received by way of bookkeeping items by a parent corporation from a wholly owned subsidiary should not be taxable to the parent. In Davis v. Alexander, 269 U.S. 114, 115, 46 S.Ct. 34, 70 L.Ed. 186, the Supreme Court disregarded the fiction of the corporate entity, holding that where one railroad company actually controls another and operates both lines as a single system, the dominant company would be held liable for injuries due to the negligence of the subsidiary company.

---

[4] The word "oddly" is our tribute to the intricacy of the judicial mind. The captious person might inquire whether the piercing of the corporate veil was a fiction or whether the corporate veil, itself, was a fictitious veil. We think, however, that the coal producer is bent on rending its fictitious veil with a fictitious instrumentality.

Further citation of authorities upon the nature of the agency rule or explanation of circumstances under which the fiction of the corporate entity will be disregarded would be fruitless. A comprehensive summary of decisions upon this subject is contained in Majestic Co. v. Orpheum Circuit, 8 Cir., 21 F.2d 720, 724–725. We think we may say that the fiction of the corporate entity will be disregarded where it is used as an instrumentality to defeat the public convenience or to perpetrate fraud. As the converse to the ruling enunciated by the Supreme Court in Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Ry. Co. v. Minneapolis Civic & Commerce Association, supra, we conclude that the agency rule should not be applied and that corporate entity should not be disregarded in order to avoid the effect of a regulatory statute enacted in the public interest. We think that where a remedial statute is involved the purpose of the legislation must be kept in view and that the agency rule should not be applied in derogation of the plain intention of the legislature. * * *

Conclusion.

For these reasons and with all respect to the able tribunals which have declared to the contrary, we deem the agency rule to be inapplicable and the coal company, not the railroad company, to be the producer of coal within the meaning of the act. It follows that the exemptions sought by the petitioner must be denied.

Accordingly the order of the Director is affirmed.

WEISSER et al. v. MURSAM SHOE CORPORATION et al.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Second Circuit, 1942. 127 F.2d 344.

Action by Rose Weisser and another against Mursam Shoe Corporation, Murray M. Rosenberg, Incorporated, Miles Shoes, Incorporated, Murray M. Rosenberg, and Samuel H. Rosenberg, to recover rent under a lease. From an order granting a motion for summary judgment made by the defendants Murray M. Rosenberg, Incorporated, Miles Shoes, Incorporated, Murray M. Rosenberg, and Samuel H. Rosenberg, and dismissing the complaint as to them, 40 F.Supp. 1007, the plaintiffs appeal.

Reversed and remanded.

Before AUGUSTUS N. HAND, CLARK, and FRANK, Circuit Judges.

FRANK, Circuit Judge. The issue before us is the extent to which stockholders and affiliated corporations are liable on a contract made by a so-called "leasehold" corporation.[1] The two individual defendants, Murray and Samuel Rosenberg, own substantially all of the capital stock of Murray M. Rosenberg, Inc., which was engaged in operating a chain of retail shoe stores. The shoes sold in these stores bore the name "Miles," a trade-name owned by Miles Shoes, Inc., also substantially owned by the individual defendants, and apparently used by Murray M. Rosenberg, Inc., under some undisclosed arrangement.

---

1 The general problem before us is extensively dealt with in Douglas and Shanks, Insulation from Liability through Subsidiary Corporations, 39 Yale L.J. (1929) 193; Powell, Parent and Subsidiary Corporations (1931). The pioneer studies of Wormser, Piercing the Veil of Corporate Entity, 12 Col.L.Rev. (1912) 496, and of Machen, Corporate Personality, 12 Harv.L.Rev. (1911) 253, 347, are still of interest.

Various facets of the problem have been recently discussed in Taylor v. Standard Gas & Electric Co., 306 U.S. 307, 618, 59 S.Ct. 543, 83 L.Ed. 669 and in Pepper v. Litton, 308 U.S. 295, 60 S.Ct. 238, 84 L.Ed. 281.

In 1926, Murray Rosenberg approached the plaintiffs to negotiate the terms of a lease of certain premises in Paterson, New Jersey. Their version of the negotiations is as follows: "When we had agreed upon the terms of the lease, Murray M. Rosenberg told us that the tenant was to be the Mursam Shoe Corporation. I asked him who was the Mursam Shoe Corporation. Murray M. Rosenberg represented to me that the name Mursam was an abbreviation for Murray and Samuel, and that he and his brother were the corporation and 'stood behind' the lease. He told us that the store to be opened at the leased premises by them, was to be part of the chain of stores which he and his brother were then operating. Relying upon these representations, the plaintiffs entered into a lease with Mursam for a term of fifteen years." The Mursam Shoe Corporation was organized by the Rosenbergs the day the lease was signed and sealed by the plaintiffs, and two days later it signed and sealed the lease as tenant. According to its books, the original capital investment in Mursam was $1; apart from paying legal and similar fees arising out of the organization of Mursam, the Rosenbergs paid nothing for their stock, and it does not appear that subsequently they made any contributions to capital. Mursam was, therefore, a corporation without assets. Its obligation under the lease was $10,000 annually, for the first five years, $11,000 for the next five and $12,000 for the last five years, or $165,000 for the entire term.

For fourteen years Mursam met its obligations on this lease. It was able to do so because of payments made to it by Murray M. Rosenberg, Inc., which occupied the leased premises under short term subleases. In March 1940, Murray M. Rosenberg, Inc., terminated the sublease then in effect (made February 1, 1939), which was of unspecified duration on a monthly basis, and vacated the premises. Mursam having no assets, this action for damages caused by breach of the lease by failing to pay rent was brought against the other individual and corporate defendants as well.

It is alleged that Mursam is only an instrumentality through which these other defendants carry on their chain store operations, and that it is necessary to pierce its corporate "veil" in order to prevent injustice and circumvent fraud. There is evidence that Mursam's corporate identity was often ignored by the other defendants themselves, and that funds were shifted about from one defendant to another without regard to formality and to suit their immediate convenience. Thus, the very first transaction under the lease was the payment of a $5,000 deposit by the personal check of Murray M. Rosenberg. Although this payment is asserted to be a loan to Mursam, its books are silent as to any arrangement with Murray M.

Rosenberg for the borrowing or repayment of this amount. For several years Murray M. Rosenberg, Inc., paid to Mursam the amount of the taxes on the property (which Mursam was required to pay by its lease with the plaintiffs), although no provision in the subleases required Murray M. Rosenberg, Inc., to pay these amounts. Rents due on a tobacco-stand on the premises which was sub-leased by Mursam to one Mourad Papas were, with a few exceptions, collected by Murray M. Rosenberg, Inc. Although by a surrender dated January 15, 1934, Murray M. Rosenberg, Inc., transferred title to the fixtures on the premises to Mursam, the fixtures were removed by Murray M. Rosenberg, Inc., when it vacated the store. Certainly Mursam was undercapitalized, and the payment of dividends and salaries soon relieved it of any surplus which it managed to accumulate by virtue of favorable subleases with Murray M. Rosenberg, Inc. For a substantial period Mursam lacked a bank account and books of account, and it never paid Murray M. Rosenberg, Inc., or Miles for accounting services rendered to it or for its use of their offices.

Enough of the facts have been stated to indicate that on a full trial it might be found that Mursam was only a tool of the other defendants, deliberately kept judgment-proof, to obtain the benefits of a lease with the plaintiffs without assuming any obligations. The plaintiffs allege that this was done fraudulently, in that Mursam was generally represented as being an integral part of their chain store operations and as having the same business and financial responsibility as the other defendants, so that the public was led to believe that dealing with Mursam was the same as dealing with them. The plaintiffs also state, in the language quoted above, that specific representations of these facts were made to them, and that they relied thereon. The defendants explain or deny many of the facts relied upon by the plaintiffs, but since this case comes up on motion for summary judgment,[2] we must give the plaintiffs the benefit of every doubt.

The trial judge granted the motion, saying that Wagner v. Manufacturers' Trust Co., 237 App.Div. 175, 261 N.Y.S. 136, 140, was controlling and that the complaint here is only an "artful attempt" to avoid the ruling of that case. In holding that New Jersey law is the same as New York, the court below was in error, but even if it were correct, we are not sure that the holding of the Wagner case disposes of the case at bar. There, on similar facts, the Appellate Division, affirmed without opinion by the Court of Appeals, 261 N.Y. 699, 185 N.E. 799, held that the Statute of Frauds prevented the substitution of a new party to the lease, and said:

"If, upon the allegations of this complaint, defendant were held equitably estopped from relying upon the statute of frauds, then in many cases a defendant might be impeded in obtaining the benefit of that statute. The courts would abound with cases where a plaintiff would claim that it might be more equitable to prevent the defendant from pleading and relying upon the statute of frauds, than to enforce that statute, and the statute would be, in large measure, nullified. Every litigant, of course, has as much right to rely upon that statute as upon any other legislative enactment and courts are not prone to deny its protection."

[2] By all defendants except Mursam.

The opinion hardly comes to grips with the real issue in such cases as these, which the Supreme Court has said to be whether or not ownership of the subsidiary "is resorted to, not for the purpose of participating in the affairs of the corporation in which it is held in a manner normal and usual with stockholders, but for the purpose of making it a mere agent, or instrumentality or department of another company." United States v. Reading Co., 253 U.S. 26, 62, 63, 40 S.Ct. 425, 434, 64 L.Ed. 760.[3] If this is found as a fact,[4] courts have seldom found the Statute of Frauds an obstacle to the imposition of liability, since it does not prevent penetration through an alias to hold the "real" signatory.[5] Even if, however, New York law were applicable (and, as we shall show, it is not), the rule of the Wagner case would not dispose of the case before us.

For, in that case, the court laid stress on the landlord's knowledge that it was accepting the subsidiary's signature on the lease; there was, the court said, no concealment by the tenant. Here, however, a jury might well have found a fraudulent concealment by the responsible individuals of the fact that the ostensible tenant, although named "Mursam Shoe Corporation," was only a leasehold corporation which, contrary to representations deliberately made by the other defendants, was never intended to operate a shoe store. This alone would, in our opinion, create a triable issue. * * *

We are not, however, bound by New York law in our decision of this case. For the contract, a lease of New Jersey real estate, was made and recorded in New Jersey. While the trial court held that New Jersey followed the doctrine of the Wagner case, the only case cited for this assertion is hardly in point.[8] It would, indeed, be strange if New Jersey did follow New York law, since even before the harsh doctrine of the Wagner case was established, the leading treatise[9] in this field said that New York law "is probably more conservative than the general run of most jurisdictions," contrasting Berkey v. Third Avenue R. Co., 244 N.Y. 84, 155 N.E. 58, 50 A.L.R. 599[10] (which refused to impose liability on the parent of a street

---

[3] Although the doctrine was there applied, as it had often been before, to a case involving the commodities clause of the Hepburn Act, 34 Stat. 584, 585, 49 U.S.C.A. § 1(8) and the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.A. §§ 1–7, 15 note, it has become a classic statement applied generally in cases piercing the corporate veil.

[4] That this is a question for the jury, see Summo v. Snare & Triest Co., 166 App.Div. 425, 428–430, 152 N.Y.S. 29.

[5] The policy of piercing the corporate veil on proper occasions is too strong to permit its circumvention by the defendants' reliance on the Statute of Frauds or the sealed instrument rule; the holding of the Wagner case, if taken as broadly as the defendant before us urges, would, in effect, destroy any possibility of holding the parent in contract cases.

[8] Beck v. Eagle Brewery of Newark, N.J.Ch.1895, 30 A. 1100. There the landlord sought to hold a corporation not named in the lease merely because it had some undisclosed agreement with the tenant and because it had paid the rent for several months. It did not occupy the premises, there was no evidence of any connection between it and the person who signed the lease, and the reason why it had paid any of the rent did not appear.

[9] Powell, Parent and Subsidiary Corporations (1931) 72.

[10] Although even that case was regarded as unusually conservative (Powell, su-railway operated as part of a unified system) with Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Dupont, 2 Cir., 128 F. 840, and Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Delachesa, 2 Cir., 145 F. 617, in which, on similar facts, this court (in the old untrammeled days before Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64, 58 S.Ct. 817, 82 L.Ed. 1188, 114 A.L.R. 1487) imposed liability. New Jersey law is as yet relatively undeveloped, but some clue to the rationale which would be followed by its courts is afforded by Ross v. Pennsylvania Railroad, 1930, 106 N.J.L. 536, 148 A. 741, 743, where an administrator sued a parent corporation for damages caused by the act of its subsidiary. In holding the parent, the Court of Errors and Appeals said that liability must be imposed "where a corporation holds stock of another, not for the purpose of participating in the affairs of the other corporation, in the normal and usual manner, but for the purpose of control, so that the subsidiary company may be used as a mere agency or instrumentality for the stockholding company." This language echoes that of the United States Supreme Court, quoted above, in the Reading case, and suggests that New Jersey is not as reluctant as New York to hold corporate parents for the acts of their children. The holding of the Ross case is in conflict with the majority opinion in Berkey v. Third Avenue R. Co., supra, but is consistent with the dissent in that case and with the decisions of this court cited above. New Jersey law, therefore, is not identical with New York's.

Outside of New York, the doctrine hardly seems challenged that a representation that the liability of the subsidiary is the same as that of its parent or affiliate will result in a piercing of the corporate veil of a subsidiary which is in fact under-capitalized, dominated and used as an instrument of the parent.[11] Stark Electric R. Co. v. Mc-pra; 36 Yale L.J. (1927) 878; cf. 27 Col. 702 (1927) 705–706) and stimulated a strong dissent, it certainly did not go nearly so far as the Wagner case in relieving the parent of liability. See especially 244 N.Y. 84, at pages 93–95, 155 N.E. 58, 50 A.L.R. 599.

---

[11] Although some commentators have distinguished between the "agency" and "instrumentality" (or "identity") rationales for imposing liability upon the parent, few (if any) courts consistently follow one or the other. See Douglas and Shanks, supra, note 1. Normally, the theories are interchangeable, although the "identity" notion is often used to overcome such ancillary problems as the sealed instrument rule, the Statute of Frauds, election of remedies, service of process, and various pleading and practice difficulties. New York seems to have planted its own seeds of confusion in this jurisprudential jungle by adding the ground of "estoppel." See Wagner v. Manufacturers' Trust Co., supra. Who is estopped by what and against whom, is left in convenient obscurity. Apparently neither a general representation of unified operation (Berkey v. Third Ave. R. Co., supra), nor a specific statement that the parent is liable for its subsidiary's acts (Wagner v. Manufacturers' Trust Co., supra) is enough to work an "estoppel," the New York courts having in this respect repudiated the broad holding of the Quaid case that "the defendant * * * is estopped from denying the truth of his representation to the plaintiffs of the substantial identity of the corporation and himself, and that its obligations were his obligations." If such commingling and utter domination as was shown in Quaid v. Ratkowsky, 183 App.Div. 428, 170 N.Y.S. 812, 815, constitutes an estoppel, then the notion is only a form of the agency and/or identity rationales. Yet it is clear that disregard for corporate formalities need not go so far as in the Quaid case. See Mangan v. Terminal Transportation System, supra. (Query: What was the "estoppel" there?). Douglas and Shanks, supra, note 1, acutely point out that court decisions depend on the specific facts of each case rather than on an application of the various theories of legal liability. And in 1911, Machen, supra, note 1, concluded that "no other guide is desirable than sturdy common sense."

Ginty Contracting Co., 6 Cir., 238 F. 657; Platt v. Bradner Co., 131 Wash. 573, 230 P. 633; cf. Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co. v. Allis-Chalmers Co., 3 Cir., 176 F. 362, 367. Powell (loc.cit., p. 111) says that such a representation is "almost always fatal." The Wagner case stands alone in disregarding such a representation. We cannot assume that New Jersey would follow it. A more reasonable assumption is that a New Jersey court would impose liability on the parent, as have most other courts, if the jury found as a fact that the parent ran the subsidiary as a division of its own business and represented that the subsidiary's debts were its own obligations. This would be consistent with the rationale accepted in the Ross case. That same rationale would also indicate that New Jersey would not be troubled by the sealed instrument rule or the Statute of Frauds, since neither—as pointed out above—bars the imposition of liability upon the puppeteer who directed his marionette to sign.

We do not, of course, decide here that Mursam was, in fact, a dummy; we hold only that triable issues were created by plaintiff's allegations and affidavits that Mursam was a tool of the other defendants, and that the lease was made because of representations, believed by plaintiffs, that its liabilities were the obligations of the other defendants.

The order granting summary judgment and dismissing the complaint is reversed, and the case is remanded.

STONE et al. v. EACHO.[1]

In re TIP TOP TAILORS, Inc.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Fourth Circuit, 1942. 127 F.2d 284.

Proceedings in the matter of Tip Top Tailors, Inc., a Virginia corporation, bankrupt, wherein Stuart A. Eacho was appointed trustee in bankruptcy, and wherein Gerald D. Stone, trustee in bankruptcy of Tip Top Tailors, Inc., a Delaware corporation, bankrupt, filed a claim and a petition asking as alternative relief that bankruptcy proceedings relating to the two corporations be consolidated. Meinhard-Greeff & Co., Inc., and others, creditors of Tip Top Tailors, Inc., a Delaware corporation, bankrupt, filed intervening petitions praying the same relief. From an order subordinating the claim of Gerald D. Stone, trustee in bankruptcy, and refusing the petition to consolidate the bankruptcy proceedings, Gerald D. Stone, trustee in bankruptcy, and the intervening creditors appeal.

Reversed and remanded.

PARKER, CIRCUIT JUDGE. This is an appeal in the bankruptcy proceedings of the Tip Top Tailors, a Virginia corporation, from an order subordinating a claim of the trustee in bankruptcy of the Tip Top Tailors, a Delaware corporation, to the claims of other creditors of the Virginia corporation and refusing a motion to consolidate the bankruptcy proceedings of the Virginia corporation with those of the Delaware corporation pending in the District of New Jersey.

[1] Rehearing den. 128 F.2d 16 (C.C.A.4, 1942), cert. den. 317 U.S. 635, 63 S.Ct. 54 (1942).

The Tip Top Tailors was incorporated under the laws of Delaware on January 23, 1939. Its principal place of business was in Newark, N. J., and it operated nine retail stores in various cities of the United States, one of these being located at Richmond, Va. On July 12, 1939 it secured a corporate charter from the State of Virginia for a corporation of the same name as that under which it was operating and caused three shares of stock, of the par value of $1 each, to be issued to its nominees to be held by them for its use and benefit. The officers of the two corporations were the same and no separate corporate activity of any sort on the part of the Virginia corporation is shown to have taken place. No money was paid into its treasury, no contracts were executed by it, no salaries were paid by it, unless the payment of wages to employees of the Richmond store from cash on hand be so regarded, and the only records kept for it were records kept in the office of the Delaware corporation at Newark, N. J., by an employee of that corporation. These records consisted of nothing more than transcriptions from the books of the Delaware corporation made by employees of that corporation at infrequent intervals.

Except for these book entries, and except for the fact that the Virginia charter was obtained, the Delaware corporation dealt with its Richmond, Va., store precisely in the same way as it dealt with the other stores that it was operating, as to which there was no pretense of separate incorporation. The manner of dealing with the Richmond store is thus described in the report of the special master approved by the court below, viz.:

"Sample bolts of goods and styles of suits were furnished the Richmond store by the parent corporation. A customer in Richmond, after selecting the style of suit and kind of cloth, was measured and the order was then sent from Richmond to Newark. In Newark the parent corporation then had the suit made up according to order, and shipped it back to the Richmond store, which made delivery to the customer and collected the price. At the end of each day the Richmond store would make out a complete and detailed report and send it by mail to Newark. Out of cash collected by the Richmond store salaries of the local store personnel were paid and petty items taken care of, and the balance of the money was deposited in a Richmond bank. This bank then forwarded these funds to the National City Bank of New York to the credit of the account of the Delaware corporation.

"In furnishing the Richmond store with cloth and their processing the suits for the local customers, the parent corporation made no profit. It furnished materials and labor at cost and debited the Richmond store with these amounts.

"Out of the cash collected in Richmond, the local store did not have authority to pay any bills over $10.00, with the exception of salaries. These petty cash items paid direct at Richmond in the course of a year's time would amount to not over $1,000.00. All other expenses incident to the operation and maintenance of the Richmond store were paid directly by the Delaware corporation by its own check, and then debited on its books to the Richmond Store. In this way the parent corporation paid direct all expenses incident to the operation of the Richmond store, such as rent, insurance, stationery and supplies, telephone bills, delivery charges, express charges, taxes, light, heat, and power bills, unemployment insurance, payroll, etc.

"The parent corporation operated the Richmond store on the same basis as it did the other eight stores and charged the Richmond store with its proportionate share of the main office expense. The said expense being allotted to each of the stores in the proportion that the sales of the respective stores bore to the total sales. The only corporate record pertaining to the Virginia corporation consisted of a general ledger and a general journal. Entries in these books were only made once a year when certain items were taken off the records of the parent corporation and entered for the whole year on the ledger and journal of the Virginia corporation. All books and records of both corporations, during the entire term of the operation of the Richmond store, were kept under the supervision and control of one Henry Wegener, regular bookkeeper for the Delaware corporation, at its Newark offices acting under the instructions of the comptroller of the Delaware corporation."

To this should be added the fact that contracts with dealers in hats, shirts, etc., were made by the Delaware corporation authorizing such dealers to operate in the Richmond store, just as they operated in the other stores of the corporation, and that the Richmond store was charged and credited with respect to transactions arising out of these contracts, just as were the other stores.

With the exception of the three shares of the par value of $1 each, nothing was subscribed to the capital stock of the Virginia corporation; and, so far as the record shows, it owned no property of any sort. Fixtures, it is true, were placed in the Richmond store by the Delaware corporation and $900 was furnished it to take care of initial expenses; but these were charged to the Virginia corporation on the books of the Delaware corporation just as similar items were charged to its other stores and just as the goods furnished to the Richmond store were charged. By the time of the closing of the store, the excess of these charges over credits amounted to $39,069.67. Other debts of the Richmond store amounted to only about $12,000, included in which was a claim for rent, subject to reduction or adjustment.

On November 20, 1940, the Delaware corporation was adjudged bankrupt and appellant Stone was appointed its receiver. Two days later, two creditors attached the property in the Richmond store as property of the Virginia corporation; and on the following day an involuntary petition in bankruptcy was filed against the Virginia corporation by Stone as receiver of the Delaware corporation. The Virginia corporation was adjudged bankrupt on this petition and Stone, as receiver, thereupon filed claim for the sum of $39,069.67 as the amount owing by the Virginia corporation to the Delaware corporation. The trustee in bankruptcy of the Virginia corporation resisted the allowance of this claim and asked that, at all events, it be postponed to the claims of other creditors on the ground that the Virginia corporation was not a separate entity, but a mere instrumentality or department of the Delaware corporation, and that the amount claimed was not a true indebtedness arising out of loans and advancements but represented a mere advancement of operating capital.

The issues thus arising on the objection to the claim were referred to a special master, who filed a report finding that the Virginia corporation was a "mere shell without reality" and a "mere agency or corporate pocket" of the Delaware corporation, and recommending that the claim be postponed to the claims of other general creditors of the Virginia corporation. Appellant duly excepted to this report and filed a petition asking, as alternative relief, that the corporate entity of the Virginia corporation be entirely disregarded and that the bankruptcy proceedings relating to that corporation be consolidated with the bankruptcy proceedings of the Delaware corporation, to the end that all creditors of the last-named corporation, including those who had proved claims in the Virginia proceedings, share pari passu in the distribution of the consolidated assets. Three creditors of the Delaware corporation filed intervening petitions praying this relief. The District Judge entered order denying this motion and affirming the report of the special master; and from this order the trustee of the Delaware corporation and the three intervening creditors have appealed.

There is nothing in the record before us to show that any of the creditors who filed claims in the bankruptcy proceedings of the Virginia corporation intended to extend credit particularly to that corporation; and the fact that the bills of the Richmond store were paid by the Delaware corporation from its Newark office would indicate that it must have been generally known to the creditors of the Richmond store that it was the Delaware corporation that was there engaged in business. There is no reason apparent from the record why all creditors of that corporation should not be treated in exactly the same way; and the fact that it had obtained a charter from the State of Virginia furnishes no good reason why the creditors dealing with its Richmond store should be dealt with differently from its other creditors, since there is no showing that business was done under that charter or that any of the creditors knew anything about it or relied on it in any way. If the Virginia corporation is treated as a separate entity and the property used in the Richmond business is applied to its debts, and the claim of the Delaware corporation is postponed in accordance with the ruling below, those creditors who have dealt with the Richmond store and have proven claims in the Virginia proceeding will have their claims practically paid in full, whereas other creditors of the Delaware corporation will receive less than 30% on their claims in the bankruptcy proceeding pending in New Jersey. If, on the other hand, the Virginia corporation is treated as a separate entity and the claim of the Delaware corporation is not postponed, this claim will so far absorb the assets at Richmond that other creditors proving in the Virginia proceeding will receive less than half the dividend received by creditors in the New Jersey proceeding. Only by entirely ignoring the separate corporate entity of the Virginia corporation and consolidating the proceedings here with those of the parent corporation in New Jersey can all the creditors receive that equality of treatment which it is the purpose of the bankruptcy act to afford; and this, we think, is the course that should be followed.

We agree with the court below that, if the separate existence of the Virginia corporation is recognized, the claim of the Delaware corporation should be postponed to the claims of other creditors. It is too well settled to admit of argument that the claims of a parent corporation against a subsidiary should be thus postponed where the subsidiary, as here, has in reality no separate existence, is not adequately capitalized and constitutes a mere instrumentality of the parent corporation or a mere "corporate pocket" or department of its business. [Citing cases.] And even in the case of the insolvency of both corporations there may be reason for recognizing the separate entity of the subsidiary and postponing the claim of the parent, where the subsidiary has been allowed to transact business as an independent corporation and credit has been extended to it as such on the faith of its ownership of the assets in its possession. Latty, Subsidiaries and Affiliated Corporations, supra, pp. 153–155. But in a case such as this, where both corporations are insolvent, where the business has been transacted by and the credit extended to the parent corporation, and where the subsidiary has no real existence whatever, there is no reason why the courts should not face the realities of the situation and ignore the subsidiary for all purposes, allowing the creditors of both corporations to share equally in the pooled assets. As said in Latty, supra: "Perhaps the fairest way of dealing with the situation when both the parent and the subsidiary corporations are insolvent is to let all the creditors of each share pro rata in the pooled assets of both. Such procedure would be especially equitable where the claimants are creditors of both the parent and the subsidiary."

It is well settled that courts will not be blinded by corporate forms nor permit them to be used to defeat public convenience, justify wrong or perpetrate fraud, but will look through the forms and behind the corporate entities involved to deal with the situation as justice may require. [Citing cases.] Not only is this done for the purpose of holding a stockholder or parent corporation for debts created by an insolvent corporate agent or subsidiary which is a mere instrumentality of the stockholder or parent, but also for the purpose of allowing the creditors of the stockholder or parent to reach assets held by such a subsidiary. [Citing cases.] And, where the court decides that the corporate entity of the subsidiary should be completely ignored and its assets and liabilities treated as those of the parent corporation, it is both logical and convenient that this be done in one proceeding. [Citing cases.]

* * * Through long practice courts have not hesitated to disregard the doctrine of corporate entities when the facts justify it. Although we know of no instance in which it has been done in matters of receivership, we cannot see why the same power does not exist in a court or why the law does not impose upon a court the same duty in a receivership matter when, as here, the facts are substantial enough to justify, indeed to compel, a finding that the five corporations were so identified with the parent corporation as to be a part of it. Being of opinion that the law makes no exception of receiverships, we tear asunder the legal maze of corporate fiction in which they have enveloped themselves and, observing that the six corporations were not merely related by stock ownership but, like wheels in a machine, were so closely meshed that all functioned together, we find from the bills that in legal effect they were one, a finding in consonance with the casual statement of the attorney for the parent corporation at the hearing that 'the whole thing from Alabama to Pennsylvania is really one company.' " * * *

If there are equities in favor of any of the creditors which have not been sufficiently explored in the motion for consolidation and as to which they desire to be heard further, hearing can be afforded them in the consolidated proceedings. In re Foley, 9 Cir., 4 F.2d 154, certiorari denied 269 U.S. 554, 46 S.Ct. 18, 70 L.Ed. 408. Since, however, the assets in Virginia are unquestionably the assets of the parent corporation, and since all of the creditors of that corporation, and not merely those who have dealt with the Virginia store, have rights with respect thereto, as well as with respect to other assets of the corporation, these rights should be determined in the bankruptcy proceeding of the parent corporation, and the two proceedings should be consolidated that this may be done, with a pooling of assets and with the treatment of claims filed in either proceeding as having been filed in the proceeding as consolidated. Proper provision should of course be made for the payment of the costs that have been incurred in the course of the Virginia proceeding.

For the reasons stated, the order appealed from will be reversed and the cause will be remanded for further proceedings in accordance herewith.

Reversed and remanded.

CONSOLIDATED ROCK PRODUCTS COMPANY et al. v. DU BOIS.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1941. 312 U.S. 510, 61 S.Ct. 675.

Proceeding in the matter of the reorganization of the Consolidated Rock Products Company, debtor, and the Union Rock Company and the Consumers Rock & Gravel Company, Incorporated, subsidiaries, wherein E. Blois du Bois, bondholder, objected to confirmation of reorganization plan. To review a decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals, 114 F.2d 102, reversing a judgment confirming the plan, the Consolidated Rock Products Company and others and F. D. Badgley and others bring certiorari.

Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case involves questions as to the fairness under § 77B of the Bankruptcy Act, 48 Stat. 912, 11 U.S.C.A. § 207, of a plan of reorganization for a parent corporation (Consolidated Rock Products Co.)

and its two wholly owned subsidiaries [1] Union Rock Co. and Consumers Rock and Gravel Co., Inc. The District Court confirmed the plan; the Circuit Court of Appeals reversed. In re Consolidated Rock Products Co., 9 Cir., 114 F.2d 102. We granted the petitions [2] for certiorari because of the importance in the administration of the reorganization provisions of the Act of certain principles enunciated by the Circuit Court of Appeals.

The stock of Union and Consumers is held by Consolidated. Union has outstanding in the hands of the public [3] $1,877,000 of 6% bonds secured by an indenture on its property, with accrued and unpaid interest [4] thereon of $403,555—a total mortgage indebtedness of $2,280,555. Consumers has outstanding in the hands of the public [5] $1,137,000 of 6% bonds secured by an indenture on its property, with accrued and unpaid interest [6] thereon of $221,715—a total mortgage indebtedness of $1,358,715. Consolidated has outstanding 285,947 shares of no par value preferred stock [7] and 397,455 shares of no par common stock.

The plan of reorganization calls for the formation of a new corporation to which will be transferred all of the assets of Consolidated, Union,[8] and Consumers free of all claims.[9] The securities of the new corporation are to be distributed as follows:

Union and Consumers bonds held by the public will be exchanged for income bonds [10] and preferred stock [11] of the new company. For 50 per cent of the principal amounts of their claims, those bondholders will receive income bonds secured by a mortgage on all of the

---

1 The proceedings under § 77B were instituted in 1935 by the filing of separate voluntary petitions by Consolidated, Union and Consumers. No trustees have been appointed, Consolidated remaining in possession.

2 The petition in No. 400 raises all of the questions discussed herein, while the petition in No. 444 raises only the question as to the authority of the reorganization court to approve a plan which substitutes one mortgage covering all of the property for so-called divisional mortgages on separate units of that property. The Interstate Commerce Commission and the Securities and Exchange Commission filed memoranda urging that the petition in No. 444 be granted and that the petition in No. 400 be granted to the extent that it raised the same question as that presented by the petition in No. 444. 311 U.S. 636, 61 S.Ct. 71, 85 L.Ed. 405; 311 U.S. 636, 61 S.Ct. 76, 85 L.Ed. 405.

3 $102,500 face amount of Union's bonds are held by Consolidated.

4 As of April 1, 1937, the effective date of the plan. Interest on Union bonds has been in default since March 1, 1934.

5 $63,500 face amount of Consumer's bonds are held by Consolidated.

6 Interest has been in default since July 1, 1934.

7 With a preference on liquidation of $25 per share plus accrued dividends.

8 Reliance Rock Co. is a wholly owned subsidiary of Union whose properties also were to be transferred to the new company.

9 The claims of general creditors will be paid in full or assumed by the new company.

10 These bonds will mature in 20 years and will bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent if earned. The interest will be cumulative if not paid. The bonds, as well as the preferred stock, to be issued to Union and Consumers bondholders will be in separate series. The net income of the new company is to be divided into two equal parts: each part to be used to pay, with respect to bonds and preferred stock of each series, first, interest and sinking fund payments on the bonds; second, dividends and sinking fund payments on the preferred stock. Income remaining will be available for general corporate purposes.

11 The new preferred stock will have a par value of $50 and will carry a dividend of 5 per cent. It will be noncumulative until the retirement of the bonds of the same series except to the extent that net income is available for dividends. Thereafter it will be cumulative.

property of the new company; for the balance they will receive an equal amount of par value preferred stock. Their claims to accrued interest are to be extinguished, no new securities being issued therefor. Thus Union bondholders for their claims of $2,280,555 will receive income bonds and preferred stock in the face amount of $1,877,000; Consumers bondholders for their claims of $1,358,715 will receive income bonds and preferred stock [12] in the face amount of $1,137,000. Each share of new preferred stock will have a warrant for the purchase of two shares of new $2 par value common stock at prices ranging from $2 per share within six months of issuance, to $6 per share during the fifth year after issuance.

Preferred stockholders of Consolidated will receive one share of new common stock ($2 par value) for each share of old preferred or an aggregate of 285,947 shares of new common.

A warrant to purchase one share of new common for $1 within three months of issuance will be given to the common stockholders of Consolidated for each five shares of old common.[13]

The new preferred stock, to be received by the old bondholders, will elect four out of nine directors of the new company; the new common stock will elect the remainder.[14] But on designated delinquencies in payment of interest on the new bonds, the old bondholders would be entitled to elect six of the nine directors.

The bonds of Union and Consumers held by Consolidated,[15] the stock of those companies held by Consolidated, and the intercompany claims (discussed hereafter) will be cancelled.

In 1929 when Consolidated acquired control of these various properties, they were appraised in excess of $16,000,000 and it was estimated that their annual net earnings would be $500,000. In 1931 they were appraised by officers at about $4,400,000, "exclusive of going concern, good will and current assets." The District Court did not find specific values for the separate properties of Consolidated, Union, or Consumers, or for the properties of the enterprise as a unit. The average of the valuations (apparently based on physical factors) given by three witnesses [16] at the hearing before the master were $2,202,733 for Union as against a mortgage indebtedness of $2,280,555; $1,151,033 for Consumers as against a mortgage indebtedness of $1,358,715. Relying on similar testimony, Consolidated argues that the value of its property, to be contributed to the new company, is over $1,359,000, or exclusive of an alleged good will of $500,000, $859,784. These estimated values somewhat conflict with the consolidated balance sheet (as at June 30, 1938) which shows assets of $3,723,738.15 and liabilities (exclusive of capital and sur-

---

12 All of the new income bonds and preferred stock are to be issued to the public holders of Union and Consumers bonds.

13 79,491 shares of new common will be reserved for the exercise of warrants issued to old common stockholders; an additional 60,280 shares of new common, for the exercise of warrants attached to the new preferred.

14 It is apparent that the majority of the new common will be held by the old preferred stockholders even if all warrants are exercised.

15 See notes 3 and 5, supra.

16 Two officers and one ex-employee. These valuation figures included the properties of Reliance. See note 8, supra.

plus) of $4,253,224.41. More important, the earnings record of the enterprise casts grave doubts on the soundness of the estimated values. No dividends were ever paid on Consolidated's common stock; and except for five quarterly dividends in 1929 and 1931, none on its preferred stock. For the eight and a half years from April 1, 1929, to September 30, 1937, Consolidated had a loss of about $1,200,000 before bond interest but after depreciation and depletion. And except for the year 1929, Consolidated had no net operating profit, after bond interest and amortization, depreciation and depletion, in any year down to September 30, 1937.[17] Yet on this record the District Court found that the present fair value of all the assets of the several companies, exclusive of good will and going concern value, was in excess of the total bonded indebtedness, plus accrued and unpaid interest. And it also found that such value, including good will and going concern value, was insufficient to pay the bonded indebtedness plus accrued and unpaid interest and the liquidation preferences and accrued dividends on Consolidated preferred stock. It further found that the present fair value of the assets admittedly subject to the trust indentures of Union and Consumers was insufficient to pay the face amount, plus accrued and unpaid interest of the respective bond issues. In spite of that finding, the District Court also found that "it would be physically impossible to determine and segregate with any degree of accuracy or fairness properties which originally belonged to the companies separately"; that as a result of unified operation properties of every character "have been commingled and are now in the main held by Consolidated without any way of ascertaining what part, if any thereof, belongs to each or any of the companies separately"; and that, as a consequence, an appraisal "would be of such an indefinite and unsatisfactory nature as to produce further confusion."

The unified operation which resulted in that commingling of assets was pursuant to an operating agreement which Consolidated caused its wholly owned subsidiaries to execute in 1929. Under that agreement the subsidiaries ceased all operating functions and the entire management, operation and financing of the business and properties of the subsidiaries were undertaken by Consolidated. The corporate existence of the subsidiaries, however, was maintained and certain separate accounts were kept. Under this agreement Consolidated undertook, inter alia, to pay the subsidiaries the amounts necessary for the interest and sinking fund provisions of the indentures and to credit their current accounts with items of depreciation, depletion, amortization and obsolescence. Upon termination of the agreement the properties were to be returned and a final settlement of accounts made, Consolidated meanwhile to retain all net revenues after its obligations thereunder to the subsidiaries had been met. It was specifically provided that the agreement was made for the benefit of the parties, not "for the benefit of any third person." Consolidated's books as at June 30, 1938, showed a net indebtedness under that agreement to Union and Consumers of somewhat over $5,000,000. That claim was cancelled by the plan of reorganization, no securities being issued to the creditors of the subsidiaries therefor. The District Court made no findings as respects the amount or validity of that intercompany claim; it summarily disposed of it by concluding that any liability under the operating agreement was "not made for the benefit of any third parties and the bondholders are included in that category."

[17] The hearings on the plan were held before a master during November, 1937.

We agree with the Circuit Court of Appeals that it was error to confirm this plan of reorganization.

I. On this record no determination of the fairness of any plan of reorganization could be made. Absent the requisite valuation data, the court was in no position to exercise the "informed, independent judgment" (National Surety Co. v. Coriell, 289 U.S. 426, 436, 53 S.Ct. 678, 681, 682, 77 L.Ed. 1300, 88 A.L.R. 1231) which appraisal of the fairness of a plan of reorganization entails. Case v. Los Angeles Lumber Products Co., 308 U.S. 106, 60 S.Ct. 1, 84 L.Ed. 110. And see First National Bank v. Flershem, 290 U.S. 504, 525, 54 S.Ct. 298, 306, 78 L.Ed. 465, 90 A.L.R. 391. * * *

There are no barriers to a valuation and enforcement of that claim. If as Consolidated maintains the subsidiaries have no present claim against it,[22] the claim can readily be discounted to present worth. It is provable by trustees of the subsidiaries, for the term "creditors" under § 77B, sub. b, includes "holders of claims of whatever character against the debtor or its property, including claims under executory contracts, whether or not such claims would otherwise constitute provable claims under this Act [title]."[23] Consolidated makes some point of the difficulty and expense of determining the extent of its liability under the operating agreement and of the necessity to abide by the technical terms of that agreement[24] in ascertaining that liability. But equity will not permit a holding company, which has dominated and controlled its subsidiaries, to escape or reduce its liability to those subsidiaries by reliance upon self-serving contracts which it has imposed on them. A holding company, as well as others in dominating or controlling positions (Pepper v. Litton, 308 U.S. 295, 60 S.Ct. 238, 84 L.Ed. 281), has fiduciary duties to security holders of its system which will be strictly enforced. See Taylor v. Standard Gas & Electric Co., 306 U.S. 307, 59 S.Ct. 543, 83 L.Ed. 669. In this connection Consolidated cannot defeat or postpone the accounting because of the clause in the operating agreement that it was not made for the benefit of any third person. The question here is not a technical one as to who may sue to enforce that liability. It is merely a question as to the amount by which Consolidated is in-

---

[22] Consolidated maintains that there is no present claim against it because no claim exists until termination of the operating agreement which ran until February, 1938, with an option in Consolidated to extend it for five years. But it does not assert, nor does the record show, that the option was exercised. But even if it had been, only the time when the amounts accrued were payable would be affected.

[23] For an equally broad definition of "creditor" under Ch. X of the Chandler Act, 52 Stat. 840, see § 106, subs. 1 and 4, 11 U.S.C.A. § 506, subs. 1, 4.

[24] Thus Consolidated argues that under the operating agreement the machinery for an appraisal provided therein must be employed. Yet assuming arguendo that that is true, Consolidated which has been in possession and control throughout cannot rely on the failure to have an appraisal as a reason for blocking or delaying its duty to account.

debted to the subsidiaries and the proof and allowance of that claim. The subsidiaries need not be sent into state courts to have that liability determined. The bankruptcy court having exclusive jurisdiction over the holding company and the subsidiaries has plenary power to adjudicate all the issues pertaining to the claim. The intimations of Consolidated that there must be foreclosure proceedings and protracted litigation in state courts involve a misconception of the duties and powers of the bankruptcy court. The fact that Consolidated might have a strategic or nuisance value outside of § 77B does not detract from or impair the power and duty of the bankruptcy court to require a full accounting as a condition precedent to approval of any plan of reorganization. The fact that the claim might be settled, with the approval of the Court after full disclosure and notice to interested parties, does not justify the concealed compromise effected here through the simple expedient of extinguishing the claim.

So far as the ability of the bondholders of Union and Consumers to reach the assets of Consolidated on claims of the kind covered by the operation agreement is concerned, there is another and more direct route which reaches the same end. There has been a unified operation of those several properties by Consolidated pursuant to the operating agreement. That operation not only resulted in extensive commingling of assets. All management functions of the several companies were assumed by Consolidated. The subsidiaries abdicated. Consolidated operated them as mere departments of its own business. Not even the formalities of separate corporate organizations were observed, except in minor particulars such as the maintenance of certain separate accounts. In view of these facts, Consolidated is in no position to claim that its assets are insulated from such claims of creditors of the subsidiaries. To the contrary, it is well settled that where a holding company directly intervenes in the management of its subsidiaries so as to treat them as mere departments of its own enterprise, it is responsible for the obligations of those subsidiaries incurred or arising during its management. * * * We are not dealing here with a situation where other creditors of a parent company are competing with creditors of its subsidiaries. If meticulous regard to corporate forms, which Consolidated has long ignored, is now observed, the stockholders of Consolidated may be the direct beneficiaries. Equity will not countenance such a result. A holding company which assumes to treat the properties of its subsidaries as its own cannot take the benefits of direct management without the burdens.

We have already noted that no adequate finding was made as to the value of the assets of Consolidated. In view of what we have said, it is apparent that a determination of that value must be made so that criteria will be available to determine an appropriate allocation of new securities between bondholders and stockholders in case there is an equity remaining after the bondholders have been made whole. * * *

Affirmed.

TAYLOR et al. v. STANDARD GAS & ELECTRIC COMPANY et al.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1939. 306 U.S. 307, 59 S.Ct. 543.

Proceedings for reorganization under section 77B of the Bankruptcy Act, 11 U.S.C.A. § 207, by the Deep Rock Oil Corporation, debtor, wherein H. N. Greis was appointed trustee, the Standard Gas & Electric Company filed proof of claim, the Reorganization Committee of the Deep Rock Oil Corporation intervened, and wherein John M. Taylor and others, as the Independent Committee for the Protection of the Holders of the Preferred Stock of the Deep Rock Oil Corporation, also intervened. Orders confirming a plan of reorganization and approving a compromise of a claim of the Standard Gas & Electric Company against the debtor as an integral part of the plan were affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals, 96 F.2d 693, and John M. Taylor and others, as the Independent Committee, bring certiorari.

Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE ROBERTS delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question presented is whether the District Court abused its discretion in approving the compromise of a claim by a parent against a subsidiary corporation and plan of reorganization based upon the compromise, in proceedings under Section 77B of the Bankruptcy Act.[1] The Circuit Court of Appeals, by a divided court, approved the District Court's order.[2]

The petitioners are a committee for the protection of preferred stockholders. The respondents are the trustee of the debtor, Deep Rock Oil Corporation (a Delaware corporation whose business was that of producing, refining, and selling gasoline, oil, and other petroleum products, from lands located in Oklahoma, Kansas, Texas, and Arkansas), a reorganization committee, representing note-holders and certain holders of preferred stock, and Standard Gas and Electric Company, which owns practically all of the common stock of the debtor, claiming as a creditor.

The debtor was organized in 1919 to take over the properties then being operated by one C. B. Shaffer.[3] Standard Gas & Electric Company, hereinafter called Standard, then had investments in various utility properties but had never been interested in oil. Byllesby & Company, hereinafter called Byllesby, an investment banking corporation which controlled Standard, entered into a contract with Shaffer whereby he was to organize the debtor corporation and to be paid by that corporation for his properties $15,580,000 made up of cash, a note, and preferred and common stock of the company. Byllesby agreed to purchase $11,000,000 par value of first mortgage bonds of an authorized issue of $15,000,000, $5,000,000 par value of preferred

1 U.S.C.A. Tit. 11, Sec. 207.

2 Taylor et al. v. Standard Gas & Electric Co. et al., 10 Cir., 96 F.2d 693.

3 The corporate name was Shaffer Oil & Refining Company. This was changed in 1931 to Deep Rock Oil Corporation. The company will be referred to by the latter name.

stock, and 120,000 shares of common stock, par $1, for $15,200,000 in cash, to be applied by the company to the cash payments to be made to Shaffer and for working capital.

Shaffer received for the properties turned over by him 80,000 shares of common stock, 50,000 shares of $100 par preferred stock, $9,500,-000 in cash and a note of Byllesby and Standard for $1,000,000. In fact $12,000,000 of the first mortgage bonds were underwritten by a syndicate formed by Byllesby and sold to the public. The result of the above transactions was to leave Deep Rock with approximately $6,700,000 of cash. Shortly thereafter the remaining $3,000,000 of bonds were pledged to secure Deep Rock's notes for $2,000,000. From its organization Deep Rock was, most of the time, "two jumps ahead of the wolf", as one of Standard's officers testified. The common stock went into a voting trust which gave Standard and Shaffer equal control. Shaffer undertook the management of the properties and business. After two years Standard became dissatisfied with Shaffer's management and he severed his connection with the company selling his common stock to Standard and surrendering to Deep Rock 50,000 shares of preferred stock which was canceled.

Thenceforward the debtor was under the complete control and domination of Standard through ownership of the common stock. Standard's officers, directors, and agents always constituted a majority of the Board. The remaining directors were operating officers or employes of Deep Rock who had been employed on behalf of Deep Rock by Standard or by Byllesby Management Corporation, hereafter called Management Corporation, a wholly owned subsidiary of Standard, or were under the complete control of Standard. A majority of Deep Rock's officers were officers or directors of Standard or of the Management Corporation, or of both. The officers of the debtor, who were chosen for their technical or business experience in the oil industry, although allowed some discretion in the matter of development and operation of the oil properties, reported to and were always subject to the direction of officers and directors of Standard. All of the fiscal affairs of the debtor were wholly controlled by Standard, which was its banker and its only source of financial aid.

Deep Rock was placed in the hands of a receiver in March 1933 and the present proceeding under Section 77B of the Bankruptcy Act was instituted in June 1934. Standard filed a claim as a creditor in the receivership and in the bankruptcy proceedings, which the receivers and the trustee resisted. The claim was referred to a master, before whom trial lasted many months. All the witnesses were officers, directors or agents of Standard, or its affiliates, and officers of the debtor. All the documentary evidence came from the books and records of Standard and Deep Rock. The basis of claim was an open account which embraced transactions between Standard and Deep Rock from the latter's organization in 1919 to the receivership in 1933. The account consists of thousands of items of debit and credit. The book entries were made under the direction of Standard's auditing department, which supervised the auditing department of Deep Rock, and it is not surprising, therefore, that the books of the two companies agree with respect to all items.

The account contains debits to Deep Rock in excess of $52,000,000 and credits of approximately $43,000,000 leaving a balance shown to be due Standard of $9,342,642.37, which was the amount of the claim presented. Cash payments by Standard to Deep Rock, or to others for its account, as shown by the books, total $31,804,145.04. Management and supervision fees paid or credited to Management Corporation amount to $1,219,034.83. Interest charges by Standard to Deep Rock on open account balances total $4,819,222.07. Rental charges upon a lease to Deep Rock of oil properties owned by a Standard subsidiary but claimed by petitioners to belong, in equity, to Deep Rock, amount to $4,525,000. Debits by Standard to Deep Rock of the amounts of dividends declared by Deep Rock to Standard, but not paid, reach the sum of $3,502,653. In addition there are hundreds of debits and credits representing other inter-company items.

Two preferred stockholders were permitted to intervene in the proceedings and they joined in the trustee's objections to the claim. Many transactions entered in the account were attacked as fraudulent and it was asserted that as Standard had made Deep Rock its mere agent or instrumentality it could not transmute itself from the status of the proprietor of Deep Rock's business to that of creditor. The hearings before the master were closed, but before he made any report, and as a result of negotiations intiated by the reorganization committee organized at the instance of Byllesby, representing approximately eighty-two per cent. of the noteholders and sixty per cent. of the preferred stockholders of Deep Rock, Standard proposed a compromise of its claim.

The court referred the proposal to the master who reported favorably. The trustee and his counsel also recommended the approval of the compromise, which involved the allowance of Standard's claim at $5,000,000. In contemplation of the approval of this compromise a reorganization of Deep Rock was proposed by the reorganization committee. The plan was based upon the trustee's appraisal of the debtor's assets at $16,800,000, of which $7,300,000 represented net current assets, mainly cash, and the remainder comprised fixed assets valued at $9,500,000. It provided that upon approval of the compromise of Standard's claim, the reorganization would be effected by the formation of a new company which would take over the debtor's assets and would issue $10,000,000 par value of fifteen year six per cent. income debentures which were to go to the holders of the debtor's unpaid notes of like amount; 25,000 shares of $7 cumulative preferred stock and 520,000 shares of no par common stock, of which the entire preferred stock and 390,000 shares of common should go to Standard on account of its claim, 80,000 shares of common to the noteholders, and 50,000 shares of common to the preferred stockholders of the old company. Standard's claim to the extent of $3,500,000 was to stand on a parity with the debtor's notes.

In the District Court the petitioners insisted that as the testimony before the master had been closed he should be required to pass upon the provability of Standard's claim and no reorganization plan should be considered until the validity of the claim had been adjudicated. The court, without passing on this demand, refused to approve the compromise or the plan of reorganization. Referring to the 50,000 shares of preferred stock outstanding, the judge stated that somebody had received the money represented by this stock from the public; that the plan in effect wiped out preferred stockholders and that he could not approve any plan which had this effect. In the course of the hearing he stated: "The evidence is overwhelming that Standard ran this company; they officered it; they capitalized it; it is just a child in their hands, and if there ever was a case the law is clear on, it is nothing but an instrumentality, according to the admissions." He indicated, however, that he would approve a plan according Standard a parity with the noteholders for a smaller proportion of its claim allowing the balance on a parity with the preferred stockholders, and suggested that the parties negotiate further in an effort to reach a fair result.

Months later the reorganization committee presented an amended plan which, as modified by the Court, contemplated the compromise of Standard's claim at $5,000,000, as before, and the organization of a new company which should issue $10,000,000 par value of debentures and 520,000 shares of common stock. These securities were to be distributed as follows: The new issue of debentures was to go to the holders of the old notes. In lieu of interest on the old notes accumulated to January 1, 1937, totaling $2,300,000, the noteholders were to receive $1,200,000 in cash and 40,000 shares of common stock; interest accruing subsequent to January 1, 1937, was to be paid in cash. The old preferred stockholders were to receive 100,000 shares of common stock and Standard was to receive for its claim 380,000 shares of common stock. Thus there was allocated to Standard approximately seventy-three per cent., to the old preferred stockholders nineteen per cent., and to the noteholders eight per cent. of the common stock. The District Court permitted the petitioners to intervene and, over their objections, approved the compromise and the plan. A majority of the Circuit Court of Appeals examined the record only to the extent of determining that it was possible that Standard might establish its claim in whole or in part, and concluded that the District Court had not exceeded the bounds of reasonable discretion in granting its approval. One judge thought that the instrumentality rule was applicable; that, under the rule, Standard had no provable claim; and that it was an abuse of discretion to approve the compromise and the reorganization plan. We agree with the conclusion of the dissenting judge, but for different reasons.

The petitioners insist that the appraisal upon which the plan was based was inordinately low and that, for this reason alone, the plan should not have been approved. The appraisal was supported by substantial evidence and the values shown by it were approved and adopted by the District Court and by the Circuit Court of Appeals. We accept the concurrent findings of the two courts that the value of the debtor's assets does not exceed $17,000,000.

As the debentures to be issued to the noteholders, plus the cash they are to get, total $11,200,000, the equity remaining in the property is not over $5,800,000. Standard's share of this equity will be seventy-three per cent., or $4,234,000, and will give it complete control of the new company. The preferred stockholders will receive nineteen per cent. or $1,020,000,—a minority interest without representation on the board of directors. The question is whether, within the bounds of reason and fairness, such a plan can be justified. We think the history of Standard's dealings with Deep Rock requires a negative answer.

Without going into the minutiæ of the transactions between the two companies, enough may be stated to expose the reasons for our decision. As has been stated, Standard came into complete control of Deep Rock in 1921. From the outset Deep Rock was insufficiently capitalized, was topheavy with debt and was in parlous financial condition. Standard so managed its affairs as always to have a stranglehold upon it.

At organization Deep Rock had cash working capital of only about $6,600,000 and a mortgage indebtedness of $12,000,000, the interest and sinking fund requirements of which were nearly $2,000,000 a year. Its assets at that time were appraised at about $16,000,000. Shortly thereafter it created a further note issue of $2,000,000. Upon the acquirement of Shaffer's interest, in 1921, Standard caused Deep Rock to issue short term notes of a par of $3,500,000. Deep Rock also, between 1921 and 1924, borrowed substantial sums on promissory notes some of which were discounted or subsequently taken up by Standard. So inadequate was Deep Rock's capitalization that, in the period from organization to 1926, the balance due on open account to Standard grew to more than $14,800,000. Standard determined to place some of this indebtedness of Deep Rock with the public. In order to do so it had to improve Deep Rock's balance sheet. This it did by purchasing 80,000 shares of preferred stock for which it credited Deep Rock $7,223,333.33. It then bought $7,500,000 face value two year six per cent. notes for $7,273,750, which were sold to the public through a syndicate organized by Byllesby. Deep Rock's requirements of additional capital persisted and, by the spring of 1928, the open account and a note which Deep Rock had given Standard for advances totaled over $11,000,000. As the two year notes held by the public were maturing, Standard found it necessary to make a new offering. There still remained nearly $2,000,000 of first mortgage bonds outstanding which had to be retired to make an unsecured note issue salable. Standard, therefore, determined that Deep Rock's balance sheet must again be put in such shape that notes could be sold. It accordingly purchased common stock from Deep Rock to the amount of the then open balance and commuted 90,000 shares of the preferred stock, which it held, into common. It caused Deep Rock to issue $10,000,000 of six per cent. notes which were sold by a syndicate organized by Byllesby and applied the proceeds to the redemption of the two year notes and the outstanding mortgage bonds. This financing, however, merely changed the character of Deep Rock's funded indebtedness and gave it no new working capital. This $10,000,000 note issue is the one now outstanding. As before, Deep Rock's resources were wholly insufficient for its business and the open account began again to build up so that between February 1928 and February 1933, the date of receivership, the account had grown to $9,342,642.37.

No dividends were paid on preferred stock until 1926. In that and the following year existing arrearages were paid by Standard, for Deep Rock's account, in the amount of $1,435,813. Between 1928 and 1931 Standard advanced Deep Rock, for payment of preferred dividends, $1,106,706.

During the period between 1926 and 1929 Deep Rock declared dividends on its common stock in a total of $3,064,685.50. Of these dividends $1,946,672 was charged by Standard, as owner of common stock, against Deep Rock in the open account. Standard took new common stock for dividends to the amount of $1,015,437.50 and advanced Deep Rock cash to pay dividends to outside holders of common stock in the sum of $102,576. Against the total of $2,645,095 advanced by Standard to pay Deep Rock's dividends, Standard credited payments received from Deep Rock in the open account in the sum of $927,500.

These dividends were declared in the face of the fact that Deep Rock had not the cash available to pay them and was, at the time, borrowing in large amounts from or through Standard.

About 1922 Standard decided that, in view of the unsatisfactory progress of Deep Rock, earnings must be increased by the acquisition of additional oil properties and by the erection of a modern gasoline cracking plant. Upon recommendation of the operating officials, Standard decided that Deep Rock should purchase the so-called Bradstreet properties, the price of which was $650,000. Of this amount $500,000 was advanced by Standard for account of Deep Rock and $150,000 paid by notes of Deep Rock. Title to the property was taken in the name of J. C. Kennedy, an employe of Deep Rock, as trustee. Kennedy never executed any declaration of trust. Deep Rock charged against him not only the original purchase price of the Bradstreet properties but the moneys thereafter expended in their development and in the acquisition of additional leases, amounting, to October 1, 1925, to $1,033,294.32, much of which represented advances by Standard.

In 1922 Deep Rock conveyed a small portion of its land to R. J. Graf, a Standard official, as trustee. Upon this land Deep Rock erected a new cracking plant at a total cost of $861,297.79. This expenditure was charged to R. J. Graf, trustee. Again part or all of the sums so expended were advanced by Standard to Deep Rock and charged against the latter.

In 1922 Standard had caused a company to be formed in Delaware known as Deep Rock Oil and Refining Company, intending that it should take title to the Bradstreet properties and the cracking plant. The purpose, as Standard's officers now state, was to keep these assets from going into direct ownership of Deep Rock and thus coming under the lien of its mortgage, so that they could be used as the basis of additional financing. The records of the Refining Company show that its capital stock was issued against the transfer by Kennedy and Graf as trustees of the Bradstreet and cracking properties but there are no corporate records of Deep Rock or of Standard concerning any actual transfer and no book entries of Deep Rock or Standard were made concerning the supposed transfer until December 1925, as of October 1, 1925. At that time, by direction of one Brahaney, the chief accounting officer of Standard, entries were made in Standard's books and those of Deep Rock to evidence the following transaction: Standard assumed the advances made by Deep Rock for improvement of the Bradstreet properties and the cracking plant totaling $1,894,592.11 by crediting Deep Rock with that sum and Refining Company gave its note to Standard in that amount. Deep Rock also credited Kennedy, Trustee, with the $650,000 paid for the Bradstreet properties and Standard assumed this charge. The entire capital stock of Refining Company, evidencing equity ownership in the Bradstreet properties and the cracking plant, was transferred to Standard. Thus, on the face of things, Standard, through ownership of the capital stock of Refining Company, owned and controlled the Bradstreet properties and the cracking plant and put itself in such a position that, without its continued cooperation, Deep Rock could not function.

As at October 1, 1925, but in fact somewhat later, at the dictation of Standard's officials, a lease was executed by the Refining Company to Deep Rock covering the properties in question whereby Deep Rock should, for the first three months, pay $75,000 per month and, for the ensuing four and three-quarters years, pay $50,000 a month to Refining Company as rental. Such rental as was paid by Deep Rock was at once declared by Refining Company as a dividend to Standard and such as was not paid was debited to Deep Rock by Standard in the open account. Under this lease, which expired October 1, 1930, Deep Rock paid, or became obligated to Standard in the total of, $3,075,000. During the term of the lease the operations of the leased properties showed a net loss of $30,401.40. The lease further provided that Deep Rock, at its own cost, should make all improvements and additions to the leased property, should make good all depreciation and return the property in the same condition as when leased. Additions to the cracking plant cost Deep Rock, during the term, $264,680.51; and there were charged against Deep Rock in alleged fulfilment of its obligations under the lease, taxes of Refining Company and other items amounting to $192,415.91. Meantime, in two letters written bankers in connection with the sale of notes of Deep Rock, the president of Deep Rock, who was also president of Standard, made statements, and warranted their truth, to the effect that Deep Rock owned these leased properties.

In spite of the losses entailed upon Deep Rock by the lease arrangement, Standard dictated its renewal for another term of five years commencing October 1, 1930, and from that date to the receivership Deep Rock paid, or was debited by Standard with, $1,450,000, as rental and suffered, in the operation of the properties leased, a total loss of $1,584,458.05. During the combined terms of the two leases Deep Rock was charged in the open account for Standard's subsidiary management corporation in payment of managerial, engineering, and financial advice, $1,020,000.

Immediately after the last and presently outstanding note issue was sold to the public Standard's annual report, for the first time, disclosed its claim to the ownership of the Refining Company properties. At the date of the receivership Standard claimed it owned the Refining Company's properties through stock ownership, and held its note in the amount of $1,894,592.11. The trustee in bankruptcy attacked this transaction as fraudulent and asserted Deep Rock's ownership of all the property represented by the Refining Company's stock free of any indebtedness to Standard in respect of it.

During the whole period from 1919 to the receivership, Standard charged Deep Rock interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum compounded monthly on the balance shown by the open account. During the entire period the Management Corporation charged Deep Rock with round annual sums for management and supervision of Deep Rock's affairs which totaled $1,219,034.83, all of which Standard assumed and charged into the open account.

It is impossible within the compass of this opinion to detail the numerous other transactions evidenced by the books of the two companies many of which were to the benefit of Standard and to the detriment of Deep Rock. All of them were accomplished through the complete control and domination of Standard and without the participation of the preferred stockholders who had no voice or vote in the management of Deep Rock's affairs.[4]

The suggested basis of compromise of Standard's claim needs comment. As has been said, when, in 1928, it became necessary to refinance Deep Rock's note obligations, Standard had to wipe out the enormous and threatening credit balance in its favor on Deep Rock's books. It, therefore, took common stock in payment of the balance. It is said that the compromise figure is reached by disregarding all transactions prior to February 24, 1928, when Standard commuted its then claim, starting fresh from that date, and considering only the items in the account thenceforward to the date of receivership. It is asserted that, during the period in question, Standard paid out, for account of Deep Rock, in cash, $6,850,971.50 and credited Deep Rock against these expenditures $4,475,803.59, leaving a balance of cash advanced of $2,375,167.91, as to which there can be no question; the Bradstreet properties and the cracking plant are to be returned to Deep Rock's ownership by transfer of the stock of the Refining Company and its note now held by Standard. It is asserted that in consideration of this transfer Deep Rock ought to assume the original cost of the Bradstreet properties advanced by Standard ($650,000), plus the amount of the disbursements by Deep Rock upon those properties which Standard had credited to Deep Rock when it took over the Refining Company stock ($1,894,592.11), less rentals charged by the Refining Company to Deep Rock prior to February 24, 1928, which rentals had been absorbed in the settlement by Standard of February 24, 1928 ($1,475,000). This leaves Deep Rock owing on the Bradstreet and cracking plant accounts $1,585,485.18. Simple interest at five per cent. is to be allowed on each of the two sums so ascertained. This brings the claim to approximately $5,000,000. It is said that this computation of the claim eliminates debits to Deep Rock made since 1928 for the fees of Management Corporation, for dividends on preferred and common stock held by Standard, and for every other questionable item; and that there can be no just criticism of the recognition of Standard's claim in the amount represented by the compromise offer.

[4] At no time did the charter confer voting power on preferred stockholders, except in case and so long only as the company should be in default in payment of dividends on the preferred for a period of more than six months. At no time did Standard have less than a majority of the voting stock outstanding.

Petitioners invoke the so-called instrumentality rule,—under which, they say, Deep Rock is to be regarded as a department or agent of Standard,—to preclude the allowance of Standard's claim in any amount. The rule was much discussed in the opinion below. It is not, properly speaking, a rule, but a convenient way of designating the application, in particular circumstances, of the broader equitable principle that the doctrine of corporate entity, recognized generally and for most purposes, will not be regarded when so to do would work fraud or injustice. This principle has been applied in appropriate circumstances to give minority stockholders redress against wrongful injury to their interests by a majority stockholder.[5] It must be apparent that the preferred stockholders of Deep Rock assert such injury by Standard as the basis of their attack on the decree below. We need not stop to discuss the remedy which would be available to them if Section 77B of the Bankruptcy Act had not been adopted for we think that, by that section, the court, in approving a plan, was authorized and required, as a court of equity, to recognize the rights and the status of the preferred stockholders arising out of Standard's wrongful and injurious conduct in the mismanagement of Deep Rock's affairs.

The Section contains a provision new in bankruptcy legislation with respect to the standing of stockholders in corporate reorganization. Subsection (b) provides: "A plan of reorganization * * * (2) may include provisions modifying or altering the rights of stockholders generally, or of any class of them, either through the issuance of new securities of any character or otherwise; * * *." In the present case there remains an equity after satisfaction of the creditors in which only the preferred stockholders and Standard can have an interest. Equity requires the award to preferred stockholders of a superior position in the reorganized company. The District Judge, we think, properly exercised his discretion in refusing to approve the first offer of compromise and concomitant plan because it partly subordinated preferred stockholders to Standard. The same considerations which moved him to reject that plan required the rejection of the new offer and the amended plan.

Deep Rock finds itself bankrupt not only because of the enormous sums it owes Standard but because of the abuses in management due to the paramount interest of interlocking officers and directors in the preservation of Standard's position, as at once proprietor and creditor of Deep Rock. It is impossible to recast Deep Rock's history and experience so as even to approximate what would be its financial condition at this day had it been adequately capitalized and independently managed and had its fiscal affairs been conducted with an eye single to its own interests. In order to remain in undisturbed possession and to prevent the preferred stockholders having a vote and a voice in the management, Standard has caused Deep Rock to pay preferred dividends in large amounts. Whatever may be the fact as to the legality of such dividends judged by the balance sheets and earnings statements of Deep Rock, it is evident that they would not have been paid over a long course of years by a company on the precipice of bankruptcy and in dire need of cash working capital. This is only one of the aspects in which Standard's management and control has operated to the detriment of Deep Rock's financial condition and ability to function. Others are apparent from what has been said and from a study of the record.

---

5 Compare Southern Pacific Co. v. Bogert, 250 U.S. 483, 39 S.Ct. 533, 63 L.Ed. 1099, infra, p. 1221.

If a reorganization is effected the amount at which Standard's claim is allowed is not important if it is to be represented by stock in the new company, provided the stock to be awarded it is subordinated to that awarded preferred stockholders. No plan ought to be approved which does not accord the preferred stockholders a right of participation in the equity in the Company's assets prior to that of Standard, and at least equal voice with Standard in the management. Anything less would be to remand them to precisely the status which has inflicted serious detriment on them in the past.

Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

PART II

CAPITAL STOCK AND ITS PROPERTY OR CONTRACT RIGHTS

SOCIAL CHANGE IN PROPERTY

The advent of the modern corporation as a means of doing business has had a profound effect on the institution of private property. Its full impact is not yet realized and still less its ultimate implication.

Its effect was to diffuse the atom of property into its various component protons, neutrons and electrons, but to keep them in relation to each other by a nucleus of management.

Before corporations became general, property was a tight bundle of rights establishing an immediate, direct, continuous relationship between an owner and a tangible (or, perhaps, intangible) res. A farm, or a forge, was actually possessed by its owner. He could do things to it, or with it; from the things he did, he might derive support or shelter or profit or satisfaction. He had title to it, he managed it, he occupied it, or could do so; the property contributed to his personality, and he contributed to the characteristics which the property assumed. Both economically and psychologically it brought the owner into a definite relationship with the thing. Out of this grew social relationships as well as economic relationships.

But, during the past century, the corporation has become dominant as a vehicle for the ownership and conduct of most business except agriculture, and is even making inroads there. Especially when the corporation attains any size, or the stockholder-owners become numerous, the old tight relationship is dissolved. In a large corporation, the relations have become so tenuous as to be almost invisible. Thus, the stockholder no longer has title to the corporate property. He has title to a share of stock. He no longer manages the corporate property. He votes (by proxy) for directors, whom he rarely knows. Probably he never sees the enterprise. His ownership in the stock gives him no right to have a job with the corporation.

The management has the right to establish policies, make decisions and handle the affairs, internal and external, of the corporation. They do not "own" the corporate property; nor have any necessary permanent relationship to it. Frequently they are not even stockholders or have such insignificant holdings of the stock that their motives differ widely from owners. Whereas the owner is guided by the desire to seek the largest profit from his property, the management, not being owner, do not have this incentive. Their incentive may be to maintain their jobs; or to increase the scope of the corporation so that their own importance is enhanced; or to pioneer new fields of technical development;—in other words, they have more nearly the motivations of good or bad men in public office than those of owners.

Except as labor contracts or special arrangements may exist, the people who work in and about the corporate property and enterprise have no permanent interest in it and no permanent relation to it. They have, of course, vivid interest in having jobs which pay them adequately and satisfy the human need to be an active part of civilization. The corporation affords them opportunity to do this while it is active; but as a rule undertakes no permanent responsibility to them—the relationship can be terminated almost at will by either party, subject to such limitations as may arise from labor organizations and renewal of contracts. The owner-laborer has disappeared.

Likewise the customer or patron who relies on the corporation or its competitors to supply him with certain kinds of goods and services has merely the relationship of habit, and of profitable intercourse. The corporation, outside the public utility field, is not normally bound to go on supplying customers but may shut down at will. The customer is not obligated to buy from the corporation; he may take his trade elsewhere. The owner who enjoyed the product or shelter or facilities of the farm or forge has likewise disappeared.

From the middle of the 19th to the middle of the 20th Century, nearly half of the entire national wealth of the United States changed from the possessor-ownership form of property into the corporate form. Rarely, if ever, in history has so great a change taken place without violence, or have the relationships of great masses of people to physical property, and its companion, intangible technical process and knowledge, altered so profoundly.

Corporation law has dealt with these changes piece-meal, and has not yet fully systematized them. The lines of corporation law affecting corporation management are reasonably well blocked out. So too there is an elaborate body of law relating to stockholders, though this appears to be shifting emphasis rather rapidly. There is still doubt as to whether the law will crystallize around the concept of a stockholder as part-owner, or around the idea that the stockholder has merely a specialized form of contract right.

The line of development affecting the relative rights of customers and the corporate supplier has followed the line of the old commercial law. Even as to that, Professor Bruce Wyman more than thirty years ago made a valiant argument in the last volume of his book on "Public Utilities" for the proposition that a corporation which achieved substantial monopoly, should be held to the standards of, and regulated as, a public utility.

The legal rules affecting relations between a corporation and its labor are still in their infancy. These two categories, i.e., corporation and customer, and corporation and labor, do not enter into these materials, and are not considered a part of the corporation field though plainly both are powerfully affected by the new form of property and enterprise organization.

* * * * * *

The aggregated enterprise is summarized by its statements (balance sheet, income statement) showing what property it has and the claims against that property; and the financial results of its operations. To these we first turn. They hardly suggest the depth of the actual social drama.

The Typical Manufacturing Company, Inc.

CONSOLIDATED BALANCE SHEET—DECEMBER 31, 1946

ASSETS

Item
1	CURRENT ASSETS:
2	Cash		$ 2,000,000
3	U. S. Government Securities		1,000,000
4	Accounts Receivable (less reserves)		2,000,000
5	Inventories (at lower of cost or market)		2,000,000
6	TOTAL CURRENT ASSETS		$ 7,000,000
7	INVESTMENT IN AFFILIATED COMPANY— Not consolidated (at cost, not in excess of net assets)		200,000
8	OTHER INVESTMENTS—AT COST, less than market		100,000
9	PLANT IMPROVEMENT FUND		550,000
10	PROPERTY, PLANT AND EQUIPMENT: Cost	$8,000,000
11	Less Reserve for Depreciation	5,000,000
12	NET PROPERTY		$ 3,000,000
13	PREPAYMENTS		50,000
14	DEFERRED CHARGES		100,000
15	PATENTS AND GOODWILL		100,000
	TOTAL		$11,100,000

LIABILITIES

Item
16	CURRENT LIABILITIES:
17	Accounts Payable		$ 300,000
18	Accrued Taxes		800,000
19	Accrued Wages, Interest and other Expenses		370,000
20	TOTAL CURRENT LIABILITIES		$ 1,470,000
21	FIRST MORTGAGE SINKING FUND BONDS, 3½% DUE 1966		2,000,000
22	RESERVE FOR CONTINGENCIES		200,000
23	CAPITAL STOCK:
24	5% Preferred Stock (authorized and issued 10,000 shares of $100 par value)	$1,000,000
25	Common Stock (authorized and issued 400,000 shares of no par value)	1,000,000	2,000,000
26	SURPLUS:
27	Earned	$3,530,000
28	Capital (arising from sale of common capital stock at price in excess of stated value)	1,900,000	5,430,000
	TOTAL		$11,100,000

HOW TO READ A FINANCIAL REPORT[1]

* * * The balance sheet represents the situation as it stood on one particular day, December 31, 1946, not the record of a year's operation. This balance sheet is broken into two parts; on the left are shown "Assets" and on the right "Liabilities." Under the asset column you will find listed the value of things the company owns or are owed to the company. Under liabilities, are listed the things the company owes to others, plus reserves, surplus and the stated value of the stockholders' interest in the company. * * *

ASSETS

The first notation on the asset side of the balance sheet is "Current Assets" (item 1). In general, current assets include cash and things that can be turned into cash in a hurry, or that in the normal course of business will be turned into cash in the reasonably near future, usually within a year.

Item 2 on our sample sheet is "Cash." Cash is just what you would expect—bills and silver in the till and money on deposit in the bank.

"United States Government Securities," is item 3. The general practice is to show securities listed as current assets at cost or market value, whichever is lower. The figure, for all reasonable purposes, represents the amount by which total cash could be easily increased if the company wanted to sell these securities.

The next entry is "Accounts Receivable" (item 4). Here we find the total amount of money owed to the company by its regular business creditors and collectible within the next year. Most of the money is owed to the company by its customers for goods that the company delivered on credit. If this were a department store instead of a manufacturer, what you owed the store on your charge account would be included here. Because some people fail to pay their bills, the company sets up a reserve for doubtful accounts which it subtracts from all the money owed.

Item 5, "Inventories", is the value the company places on the supplies it owns. The inventory of a manufacturer may contain raw materials that it uses in making the things it sells, partially finished goods in process of manufacture and, finally, completed merchandise that is ready to sell. Several methods are used to arrive at the value placed on these various items. The most common is to value them at their cost or present market value, whichever is lower. You can be reasonably confident, however, that the figure given is an honest and significant one for the particular industry if the report is certified by a reputable firm of public accountants.

Next on the asset side is "Total Current Assets" (item 6). This is an extremely important figure when used in connection with other items in the report, which we will come to presently. Then we will discover how to make total current assets tell their story.

[1] Excerpts, courtesy Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Beane, 1947.

"Investment in Affiliated Company" (item 7), represents the cost to our parent company of the capital stock of its subsidiary or affiliated company. A subsidiary is simply one company that is controlled by another. Most corporations that own other companies outright, lump the figures in a "Consolidated Balance Sheet." This means that under cash, for example, one would find a total figure that represented all of the cash of the parent company and of its wholly owned subsidiary. This is a perfectly reasonable procedure because, in the last analysis, all of the money is controlled by the same persons.

Our typical company shows that it has "Other Investments" (item 8), in addition to its affiliated company. Sometimes good marketable securities other than Government bonds are carried as current assets, but the more conservative practice is to list these other security holdings separately. If they have been bought as a permanent investment they would always be shown by themselves. "At cost, less than market" means that our company paid $100,000 for these other investments, but they are now worth more.

Among our assets is a "Plant Improvement Fund" (item 9). Of course, this item does not appear in all company balance sheets, but is typical of special funds that companies set up for one purpose or another. For example, money set aside to pay off part of the bonded debt of a company might be segregated into a special fund. The money our directors have put aside to improve the plant would often be invested in Government bonds.

FIXED ASSETS

The next item (10), is "Property, Plant and Equipment," but it might just as well be labeled "Fixed Assets" as these terms are used more or less interchangeably. Under item 10 the report gives the value of land, buildings and machinery and such movable things as trucks, furniture and hand tools. Historically, probably more sins were committed against this balance sheet item than any other.

In olden days, cattlemen used to drive their stock to market in the city. It was a common trick to stop outside of town, spread out some salt for the cattle to make them thirsty and then let them drink all the water they could hold. When they were weighed for sale the cattlemen would collect cash for the water the stock had drunk. Business buccaneers, taking the cue from their farmer friends, would often "write up" the value of their fixed assets. In other words, they would increase the value shown on the balance sheet, making the capital stock appear to be worth a lot more than it was. "Watered Stock" proved a bad investment for most stockholders. The practice has, fortunately, been stopped, though it took major financial reorganizations to squeeze the water out of some securities.

The most common practice today is to list fixed assets at cost. Often, there is no ready market for most of the things that fall under this heading, so it is not possible to give market value. A good report will tell what is included under fixed assets and how it has been valued. If the value has been increased by "write-up" or decreased by "write-down," a footnote explanation is usually given. A "write-up" might occur, for instance, if the value of real estate increased substantially. A "write-down" might follow the invention of a new machine that put an important part of the company's equipment out of date.

DEPRECIATION

Naturally, all of the fixed property of a company will wear out in time (except, of course, non-agricultural land). In recognition of this fact, companies set up a "Reserve for Depreciation" (item 11). If a truck costs $4,000 and is expected to last four years, it will be depreciated at the rate of $1,000 a year.

Two other terms also frequently occur in connection with depreciation—"depletion" and "obsolescence." Companies may lump depreciation, depletion and obsolescence under a single title, or list them separately.

"Depletion" is a term used primarily by mining and oil companies (or any of the so-called extractive industries). Depletion means exhaust or use up. As the oil or other natural resource is used up, a reserve is set up to compensate for the natural wealth the company no longer owns. This reserve is set up in recognition of the fact that as the company sells its natural product it must get back not only the cost of extracting, but also the original cost of the natural resource.

"Obsolescence" represents the loss in value because a piece of property has gone out of date before it wore out. Airplanes are modern examples of assets that tend to get behind the times long before the parts wear out.

In our sample balance sheet we have placed the reserve for depreciation under fixed assets and then subtracted, giving us "Net Property" (item 12), which we add into the asset column. Sometimes, companies put the reserve for depreciation in the liability column. As you can see, the effect is just the same whether it is subtracted from assets or added to liabilities.

The manufacturer, whose balance sheet we use, rents a New York showroom and pays his rent yearly, in advance. Consequently, he has listed under assets "Prepayments" (item 13). This is listed as an asset because he has paid for the use of the showroom, but has not yet received the benefit from its use. The use is something coming to the firm in the following year and, hence, is an asset. The dollar value of this asset will decrease by one-twelfth each month during the coming year.

"Deferred Charges" (item 14), represents a type of expenditure similar to prepayment. For example, our manufacturer brought out a new product last year, spending $100,000 introducing it to the market. As the benefit from this expenditure will be returned over months or even years to come, the manufacturer did not think it reasonable to charge the full expenditure against costs during 1946. He has "deferred" the charges and will write them off gradually.

INTANGIBLES

The last entry in our asset column is "Patents and Goodwill" (item 15). If our company was a young one, set up to manufacture some new patented product, it would probably carry its patents at a substantial figure. In fact, "intangibles" of both old and new companies are often of great but generally unmeasurable worth.

Company practice varies considerably in assigning value to intangibles. Procter & Gamble, despite the tremendous goodwill that has been built up for "Ivory Soap," has reduced all of its intangibles to the nominal $1. Some of the big cigarette companies, on the contrary, place a high dollar value on the goodwill their brand names enjoy. Companies that spend a lot for research and the development of new products are more inclined than others to reflect this fact in the value assigned to patents, license agreements, etc.

LIABILITIES

The liability side of the balance sheet is a little tricky at first glance. Several of the entries don't sound like liabilities by ordinary definition of the term.

The first item on the liability side of any balance sheet is usually "Current Liabilities" (item 16). This is a companion to the "Current Assets" item across the page and includes all debts that fall due within the next year. The relation between current assets and current liabilities is one of the most revealing things to be gotten from the balance sheet, but we will go into that quite thoroughly later on.

"Accounts Payable" (item 17), represents the money that the company owes to its ordinary business creditors—unpaid bills for materials, supplies, insurance and the like. Many companies itemize the money they owe in a much more detailed fashion than we have done, but, as you will see, the totals are the most interesting thing to us.

Item 18, "Accrued Taxes," is the tax bill that the company estimates it still owes for the past year, 1946. We have lumped all taxes in our balance sheet, as many companies do. However, sometimes you will find each type of tax given separately. If the detailed procedure is followed, the description of the tax is usually quite sufficient to identify the separate item.

Accounts Payable was defined as the money the company owed to its regular business creditors. The company also owes, on any given day, wages to its own employees; interest to its bondholders and to banks from which it may have borrowed money; fees to its attorneys; pensions, etc. These are all totaled under "Accrued Wages, Interest and Other Expenses" (item 19).

"Total Current Liabilities" (item 20) is just the sum of everything that the company owed on December 31 and which must be paid sometime in the next twelve months.

It is quite clear that all of the items discussed above are liabilities. The rest of the entries on the liability side of the balance sheet, however, do not seem at first glance to be liabilities.

Our balance sheet shows that the company, on December 31, had $2,000,000 of 3½ per cent First Mortgage Bonds outstanding (item 21). Legally, the money received by a company when it sells bonds is considered a loan to the company. Therefore, it is obvious that the company owes to the bondholders an amount equal to the face value or the "call price" of the bonds it has outstanding. The call price is a figure usually larger than the face value of the bonds at which price the company can "call" the bonds in from the bondholders and pay them off before they ordinarily fall due. The date that often occurs as part of the name of a bond is the date at which the company has promised to pay off the loan from the bondholders.

RESERVES

The next heading, "Reserve for Contingencies" (item 22), sounds more like an asset than a liability. "My reserves," you might say, "are dollars in the bank and dollars in the bank are assets."

In fact, the corporation treasurer also has his reserve for contingencies balanced by either cash or some kind of unspecified investment on the asset side of the ledger. His reason for setting up a reserve on the liability side of the balance sheet is a precaution against making his financial position seem better than it is. He decided that the company might have to pay out this money during the coming year if certain things happen. If he did not set up the "reserve" his surplus would appear larger by an amount equal to his reserve.

A very large reserve for contingencies or a sharp increase in this figure from the previous year should be examined closely by the investor. Often in the past companies tried to hide their true earnings by transferring funds into a contingency reserve. As a reserve looks somewhat like a true liability, stockholders were confused about the real value of their securities. When a reserve is not set up for protection against some very probable loss or expenditure it should be considered by the investor as part of surplus.

CAPITAL STOCK

Below reserves there is a major heading: "Capital Stock" (item 23). Companies may have one type of security outstanding, or they may have a dozen. All of the issues that represent shares of ownership are capital, regardless of what they are called on the balance sheet—preferred stock, preference stock, common stock, founders' shares, capital stock, or something else.

Our typical company has one issue of 5 per cent "Preferred Stock" (item 24). It is called "preferred" because those who own it have a right to dividends and assets before the "common" stockholders—that is, the holders are in a preferred position as owners. Usually preferred stockholders do not have a voice in company affairs unless the company fails to pay them dividends at the promised rate. Their rights to dividends are almost always "cumulative." This simply means that all past dividends must be paid before the other stockholders can receive anything.

Preferred stockholders are not creditors of the company so it cannot properly be said that the company "owes" them the value of their holdings. However, in case the company decided to go out of business, preferred stockholders would have a prior claim on anything that was left in the company treasury after all of the creditors, including the bondholders, were paid off. In practice, this right does not always mean much, but it does explain why the book value of their holdings is carried as a liability.

"Common Stock" (item 25) is simple enough as far as definition is concerned—it represents the rights of the ordinary owner of the company. Each company has as many owners as it has stockholders. The proportion of the company that each stockholder owns is determined by the number of shares he has. However, neither the book value of a no-par common stock, nor the par value of an issue that has a given par, can be considered as representing either the original sale price, the market value or what would be left for the stockholders if the company were liquidated.

A profitable company would seldom be dissolved. Once things have taken such a turn that dissolution appears desirable, the stated value of the stock is generally nothing but a fiction. Even if the company is profitable as a going institution, once it ceases to function even its tangible assets drop in value because there is not usually a ready market for its inventory of raw materials and semi-finished goods, or its plant and machinery.

SURPLUS

The last major heading on the liability side of the balance sheet is "Surplus" (item 26). The surplus, of course, is not a liability in the popular sense at all. It represents, on our balance sheet, the difference between the stated value of common stock and the net assets behind the stock.

Two different kinds of surplus frequently appear on company balance sheets and our company has both kinds. The first type listed is "Earned" surplus (item 27). Earned surplus is roughly similar to your own savings. To the corporation, earned surplus is that part of net income which has not been paid to stockholders as dividends. It still "belongs" to the stockholders just as your savings account belongs to you, but the directors have decided that it is best for the company and the stockholders to keep it in the business. The surplus may be invested in the plant just as you might invest part of your savings in your home. It may also be in cash or securities.

In addition to the earned surplus, our company also has a "Capital" surplus (item 28), of $1,900,000, which the balance sheet explains arose from selling the stock at a higher cost per share than is given as its stated value. A little arithmetic shows that the stock is carried on the books at $2.50 a share while the capital surplus amounts to $4.75 a share. From this we know that the company actually received an average of $7.25 net a share for the stock when it was sold. * * *

The Typical Manufacturing Company, Inc.

CONSOLIDATED INCOME AND EARNED SURPLUS

For the Year Ended December 31, 1946

Item
a	NET SALES		$10,000,000
b	COST OF SALES, EXPENSES AND OTHER OPERATING CHARGES:
c	Cost of Goods Sold	$7,000,000
d	Selling, Administrative and General Expenses	500,000
e	Depreciation	200,000
f	Maintenance and Repairs	400,000
g	Taxes (Other Than Federal Income Taxes)	300,000	8,400,000
h	NET PROFIT FROM OPERATIONS		$ 1,600,000
i	OTHER INCOME:
j	Royalties and Dividends	$ 250,000
k	Interest	25,000	275,000
l	TOTAL		$ 1,875,000
m	INTEREST CHARGES:
n	Interest on Funded Debt	$ 70,000
o	Other Interest	20,000	90,000
p	NET INCOME BEFORE PROVISION FOR FEDERAL INCOME TAXES		$ 1,785,000
q	PROVISION FOR FEDERAL INCOME TAXES		678,300
r	NET INCOME		$ 1,106,700
s	DIVIDENDS:
t	Preferred Stock—$5.00 Per Share	$ 50,000
u	Common Stock—$1.00 Per Share	400,000
v	PROVISION FOR CONTINGENCIES	200,000	650,000
w	BALANCE CARRIED TO EARNED SURPLUS		$ 456,700
x	EARNED SURPLUS—January 1, 1946		3,073,300
y	EARNED SURPLUS—DECEMBER 31, 1946		$ 3,530,000

THE INCOME ACCOUNT

The fundamental soundness of a company, as shown by its balance sheet, is important to investors, but of even greater interest is the record of its operation. Its financial structure shows much of its ability to weather storms and pick up speed when times are good. It is the income record, however, that shows us how a company is actually doing and gives us our best guide to the future. * * *

We have used a combined income and surplus account because that is the form most frequently followed by industrial companies. However, sometimes the two statements are given separately. Also, a variety of names are used to describe this same part of the financial report. Sometimes it is called "profit and loss account," sometimes "record of earnings" and often simply "income account." They are all the same animal.

The details that you will find on different income statements also vary a great deal. Some companies show only eight or ten separate items, while others will give a page or more of closely spaced entries that break down each individual type of revenue or cost. We have tried to strike a balance between extremes; give the major items that are in most income statements, omitting details that are only interesting to the expert analyst.

The most important source of revenue always makes up the first item on the income statement. In our company it is "Net Sales" (item "a"). If it were a railroad or a utility instead of a manufacturer, this item would be called "gross revenues." In any case it represents the money paid into the company by its customers. Net sales are given to show that the figure represents the amount of money actually received after allowing for discounts and returned goods.

Net sales or gross revenues, you will note, is given before any kind of miscellaneous revenue that might have been received from investments, the sale of company property, tax refunds or the like. A well prepared income statement is always set up this way so that the stockholder can estimate the success of the company in fulfilling its major job of selling goods or service. If this were not so, you could not tell whether the company was really losing or making money on its operations, particularly over the last few years when tax rebates and other unusual things have often had great influence on final net income figures.

COST OF SALES

A general heading, "Cost of Sales, Expenses and Other Operating Charges" (item "b") is characteristic of a manufacturing company, but a utility company or railroad would call all of these things "operating expenses."

The most important subdivision is "Cost of Goods Sold" (item "c"). Included under cost of goods sold are all of the expenses that go directly into the manufacture of the products the company sells—raw materials, wages, freight, power and rent. We have lumped these expenses together, as many companies do. Sometimes, however, you will find each item listed separately. Analyzing a detailed income account is a pretty technical operation and had best be left to the expert.

We have shown separately, opposite "d," the "Selling, Administrative and General Expenses" of the past year. Unfortunately, there is little uniformity among companies in their treatment of these important non-manufacturing costs. Our figure includes the expenses of management, that is, executive salaries and clerical costs; commissions and salaries paid to salesmen; advertising expenses, and the like.

"Depreciation" ("e") shows us the amount that the company transferred from income during 1946 to the depreciation reserve that we ran across before as item 11 on the balance sheet (page 4). Depreciation must be charged against income unless the company is going to live on its own fat; something that no company can do for long and stay out of bankruptcy.

MAINTENANCE

"Maintenance and Repairs" (item "f") represents the money spent to keep the plant in good operating order. For example, the truck that we mentioned under depreciation must be kept running day by day. The cost of new tires, recharging the battery, painting and mechanical repairs are all maintenance costs. Despite this day-to-day work on the truck, the company must still provide for the time when it wears out—hence, the reserve for depreciation. * * *

Taxes, * * * A profitable company always pays at least two types of taxes. One group of taxes are paid without regard to profits and include real estate taxes, excise taxes, social security and the like (item "g"). As these payments are a direct part of the cost of doing business, they must be included before we can determine the "Net Profit From Operations" (item "h").

Net profit from operations (sometimes called "gross profit") tells us what the company made from manufacturing and selling its products. It is an interesting figure to investors because it indicates how efficiently and successfully the company operates in its primary purpose as a creator of wealth. As a glance at the income account will tell you, there are still a lot of other items to be deducted before the stockholder can hope to get anything. You can also easily imagine that for many companies these other items may spell the difference between profit and loss. For these reasons we use net profit from operations as an indicator of progress in manufacturing and merchandising efficiency, not as a judge of the investment quality of securities.

Miscellaneous income not connected with the major purpose of the company is generally listed after net profit from operations. There are quite a number of ways that corporations increase their income, including interest and dividends on securities they own, fees for special services performed, royalties on patents they allow others to use and, recently, tax refunds. Our income statement shows "Other Income" as item "i," under which is shown income from "Royalties and Dividends" (item "j") and, as a separate entry, "Interest" (item "k") which the company received from its bond investments. The "Total" of other income (item "l") shows us how much the Typical Manufacturing Company received from so-called "outside" activities. Corporations with diversified interests often receive tremendous amounts of "other income."

INTEREST CHARGES

There is one other class of expenses that must be deducted from our income before we can determine the base on which taxes are paid and that is "Interest Charges" (item "m"). As our company has $2,000,000 worth of 3½ per cent bonds outstanding, it will pay "Interest on Funded Debt" of $70,000 (item "n"). During the year the company also borrowed money from the bank on which it, of course, paid interest, shown as "Other Interest" (item "o").

"Net Income Before Provision for Federal Income Taxes" (item "p"), is an interesting figure for historical comparison. It shows us how profitable the company was in all of its various operations. A comparison of this entry over a period of years will enable you to see how well the company had been doing as a business institution before the Government stepped in for its share of net earnings. Federal taxes have varied so much in recent years that earnings before taxes are often a real help in judging business progress.

A few paragraphs back we mentioned that a profitable corporation pays two general types of taxes. We have already discussed those that are paid without reference to profits. "Provision for Federal Income Taxes" (item "q") is ordinarily figured on the total income of the company after normal business expenses, so appears on our income account below these charges. Bond interest, for example, as it is payment on a loan, is deducted beforehand. Preferred and common stock dividends, which are "profits" that go to owners of the company, come after all charges and taxes.

NET INCOME

After we have deducted all of our expenses and income taxes from total income we get "Net Income" (item "r"). Net income is the most interesting figure of all to the investor. Net income is the amount available to pay dividends on the preferred and common stock. From the balance sheet we have learned a good deal about the company's stability and soundness of structure; from net profit from operations we judge whether the company is improving in industrial efficiency. Net income tells us whether the securities of the company are likely to be a profitable investment. * * *

The investor in stocks has a vital interest in "Dividends" (item "s"). The first dividend that our company must pay is that on its "Preferred Stock" (item "t"). Some companies will even pay preferred dividends out of earned surplus accumulated in the past if the net income is not large enough, but such a company is skating on thin ice unless the situation is most unusual.

The directors of our company decided to pay dividends totaling $400,000 on the "Common Stock," or $1 a share (item "u"). As we have noted before, the amount of dividends paid is not determined by net income, but by a decision of the stockholders' representatives —the company directors. Common dividends, just like preferred dividends, can be paid out of surplus if there is little or no net income. Sometimes companies do this if they have a long history of regular payments and don't want to spoil the record because of some special temporary situation that caused them to lose money. This occurs even less frequently and is more "dangerous" than paying preferred dividends out of surplus.

It is much more common, on the contrary, to "plough earnings back into the business"—a phrase you frequently see on the financial pages and in company reports. The directors of our typical company have decided to pay only $1 on the common stock, though net income would have permitted them to pay much more. They decided that the company should "save" the difference.

The next entry on our income account, "Provision for Contingencies" (item "v"), shows us where our reserve for contingencies arose. The treasurer of our typical company has put the provision for contingencies after dividends. However, you will discover, if you look at very many financial reports, that it is sometimes placed above net income.

All of the net income that was not paid out as dividends or set aside for contingencies is shown as "Balance Carried to Earned Surplus" (item "w"). In other words, it is kept in the business. In previous years the company had also earned more than it paid out so it has already accumulated by the beginning of 1946 an earned surplus of $3,073,300 (item "x"). When we total the earned surplus accumulated during 1946 to that which the company had at the first of the year, we get the total earned surplus at the end of the year (item "y"). You will notice that the total here is the same as that which we ran across on the balance sheet as item 27.

Not all companies combine their income and surplus account. When they do not, you will find that "balance carried to surplus" will be the last item on the income account. The statement of consolidated surplus would appear as a third section of the corporation's financial report. A separate surplus account might be used if the company shifted funds for reserves to surplus during the year or made any other major changes in its method of treating the surplus account. * * *

RADIO CORPORATION OF AMERICA AND DOMESTIC SUBSIDIARIES
STATEMENTS OF CONSOLIDATED INCOME AND EARNED SURPLUS FOR THE YEARS ENDED DECEMBER 31, 1946 AND 1945

	Amount per share	Year ended Dec. 31, 1946	Year ended Dec. 31, 1945
GROSS INCOME:
From Operations		$236,145,728	$278,327,902
Other Income, including Interest and Dividends from Other Investments		835,042	1,091,264
Dividends from Foreign Subsidiaries (Note 2)		—	84,449
TOTAL GROSS INCOME FROM ALL SOURCES		$236,980,770	$279,503,615
Deduct:
Cost of Goods Sold, General Operating, Development, Selling and Administrative Expenses (Note 7)		$219,160,007	$244,317,196
Depreciation (Note 8)		2,243,439	3,317,943
Amortization of Patents		1,000,000	900,000
Interest		230,971	484,408
TOTAL		$222,634,417	$249,019,547
BALANCE BEFORE PROVISION FOR FEDERAL TAXES ON INCOME AND SPECIAL CHARGES FOR RECONVERSION EXPENSES		$ 14,346,353	$ 30,484,068
Deduct:
Provision for Federal Income Taxes (including $9,762,000 for Excess Profits Tax in 1945)		$ 4,673,300	$ 14,683,000
Less:
Estimated Recovery of Prior Years' Excess Profits Tax Resulting from Carry-back of Unused Excess Profits Tax Credit		3,108,000	1,485,000
NET TAXES (Note 3)		$ 1,565,300	$ 13,198,000
Portion of Expenses (Totaling $5,858,505 for 1946 and $7,252,279 for 1945) incurred for postwar reconversion, being the amount of the related tax reduction (The balance was charged to the Reserve for Postwar Rehabilitation and Other Adjustments of Wartime Costs) (Note 1)		1,796,000	5,969,000
TOTAL DEDUCTIONS (Note 3)		$ 3,361,300	$ 19,167,000
NET INCOME FOR YEAR TRANSFERRED TO EARNED SURPLUS		$ 10,985,053	$ 11,317,068
EARNED SUPLUS AT BEGINNING OF YEAR		49,038,127	43,645,087
		$ 60,023,180	$ 54,962,155
Deduct:
Dividends:
On First Preferred Stock	$3.50	$ 3,152,800	$ 3,152,800
On Common Stock	.20	2,771,337	2,771,228
TOTAL DIVIDENDS		$ 5,924,137	$ 5,924,028
EARNED SURPLUS AT END OF YEAR (Notes 5 and 6)		$ 54,099,043	$ 49,038,127

RADIO CORPORATION OF AMERICA AND DOMESTIC SUBSIDIARIES
CONSOLIDATED BALANCE SHEETS AT DECEMBER 31, 1946 AND 1945

Assets

	Dec. 31, 1946	Dec. 31, 1945
CURRENT ASSETS:
Cash in Banks and on Hand	$ 29,524,845	$ 33,473,686
United States Tax Anticipation Notes and Government Bonds, at Cost	3,432,105	8,539,374
Notes and Accounts Receivable (Less Reserves—1946, $1,808,665; 1945, $1,787,745)	36,842,250	38,295,721
Estimated Recovery of Prior Years Excess Profits Taxes	3,108,000	1,485,000
Inventories (at the Lower of Cost or Market)	55,842,929	37,560,704
TOTAL CURRENT ASSETS	$128,750,129	$119,354,485
INVESTMENTS AND ADVANCES:
Wholly-owned Foreign Subsidiary Companies (Note 2) (Less Reserves—1946, $1,000,000; 1945, $1,000,000)	$ 2,979,126	$ 2,697,306
Associated and Other Companies, at Cost (Less Reserves—1946, $1,675,543; 1945, $1,686,399)	492,181	492,181
TOTAL INVESTMENTS AND ADVANCES	$ 3,471,307	$ 3,189,487
PLANT AND EQUIPMENT:
Factories, Radio Communication and Broadcasting Stations, Laboratories, Warehouses, Service Shops, Offices, etc., at cost	$103,174,043	$ 85,075,070
Less: Reserve for Depreciation and Write-down of Plant and Equipment	53,707,290	53,361,225
	$ 49,466,753	$ 31,713,845
PATENTS AND PATENT RIGHTS	$ 14,844,884	$ 14,492,630
Less: Reserve for Amortization	9,890,367	9,900,365
	$ 4,954,517	$ 4,592,265
DEFERRED CHARGES	$ 2,983,541	$ 2,298,766
TOTAL ASSETS	$189,626,247	$161,148,848

Liabilities and Capital

	Dec. 31, 1946	Dec. 31, 1945
CURRENT LIABILITIES:
Accounts Payable and Accruals	$ 35,835,330	$ 29,475,143
Provision for Federal Taxes on Income (Note 3)	14,669,523	24,033,031
Preferred Dividend Payable	788,200	788,200
Common Dividend Payable	2,771,337	2,771,228
TOTAL CURRENT LIABILITIES	$ 54,064,390	$ 57,067,602

BANK LOANS:
Notes Due December 30, 1948 under Credit Agreement (Note 6)	$ 30,000,000	--
RESERVE FOR POSTWAR REHABILITATION AND FOR OTHER ADJUSTMENTS OF WARTIME COSTS (Note 1)	—	$ 3,666,345
RESERVE FOR CONTINGENCIES	$ 3,685,040	$ 3,599,000
GENERAL RESERVE	$ 5,441,301	$ 5,441,301
CAPITAL STOCK (Note 4):
$3.50 Cumulative First Preferred, No Par Value:
Authorized —920,300 Shares
Outstanding—900,824 Shares
At a Stated Value of	$ 14,574,441	$ 14,574,441
(Preference on Involuntary Liquidation $100 per Share or an Aggregate of $90,082,400)
Common, No Par Value:
Authorized —18,500,000 Shares
Outstanding—13,881,016 Shares
At a Stated Value of	27,762,032	27,762,032
TOTAL CAPITAL STOCK	$ 42,336,473	$ 42,336,473
EARNED SURPLUS (Notes 5 and 6)	$ 54,099,043	$ 49,038,127
TOTAL LIABILITIES AND CAPITAL	$189,626,247	$161,148,848

A. "CAPITAL"

NOTE

After the British Companies Act of 1863, Sir W. S. Gilbert (of Gilbert and Sullivan fame) filed a commentary on the concept of corporate capital, in the form of the following Bab Ballad:

LIMITED LIABILITY

Some seven men form an Association
    (If possible, all Peers and Baronets),
They start off with a public declaration
    To what extent they mean to pay their debts.
That's called their Capital: if they are wary
    They will not quote it at a sum immense.
The figure's immaterial—it may vary
    From eighteen million down to eighteenpence.
        I should put it rather low;
        The good sense of doing so
    Will be evident at once to any debtor.
        When it's left to you to say
        What amount you mean to pay,
    Why, the lower you can put it at, the better.
They then proceed to trade with all who'll trust 'em,
    Quite irrespective of their capital
(It's shady, but it's sanctified by custom);
    Bank, Railway, Loan, or Panama Canal.
You can't embark on trading too tremendous—
    It's strictly fair, and based on common sense—
If you succeed, your profits are stupendous—
    And if you fail, pop goes your eighteenpence.
        Make the money-spinner spin!
        For you only stand to win,
    And you'll never with dishonesty be twitted.
        For nobody can know,
        To a million or so,
    To what extent your capital's committed!
If you come to grief, and creditors are craving
    (For nothing that is planned by mortal head
Is certain in this Vale of Sorrow—saving
    That one's liability is Limited),—
Do you suppose that signifies perdition?
    If so you're but a monetary dunce—
You merely file a Winding-Up Petition,
    And start another Company at once!
        Though a Rothschild you may be
        In your own capacity,
    As a Company you've come to utter sorrow—
        But the Liquidators say,
        "Never mind—you needn't pay,"
    So you start another Company tomorrow!

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS

Business corporations were assumed to be "artificial persons". During the early period of corporation laws, it was inconceivable that an "artificial person" should go into business without some body of assets which could respond to its debts. This presupposition was natural at a time when an individual in business was obliged to subject all of his property to the payment of his debts, and, if that did not suffice, was liable to be imprisoned for any unpaid balance. Corporation laws, then and now, accordingly prescribed that a certain amount of assets should be paid in, and this amount was subject to special rules intended to prevent the corporation from distributing it among its shareholders. In modern terminology, this amount is called the corporation's "capital".

Economists and businessmen have other and probably more exact ideas of what "capital" should be. A businessman will talk usually of the "capital" of an enterprise as including the money raised for more or less permanent investment, where the money is raised by floating a bond issue (which is a debt), or by stock issue, or otherwise. The economist will define "capital" as the assets permanently devoted to the enterprise of production. From the point of view of the lawyer, these definitions are only occasionally relevant.

In earlier days, corporation laws not unusually provided that the corporation should not be allowed to begin business unless and until a statutory minimum amount of "capital stock" had been subscribed and paid for. Only vestigial remnants of their earlier requirement remain in modern corporation laws. Instead modern statutes enact a formula which fixes a method for determining the amount of corporate assets which must be treated as "capital" within the applicable rules.

So long as all shares of stock had a par value the formula was easy. When such stock was issued the corporation was in general obliged to exact payment of not less than such par value; and the "capital" of the corporation (for legal purposes) was defined to be an amount equal to the total par value of all the shares issued. Any balance of assets over that amount (after deducting the amount of any debts) was "surplus".

When, after 1912, statutes permitted issues of stock without par value, the formula had to be elaborated. If nothing was said on the subject, the presumption was (and still is) that all consideration paid for the non-par shares must be considered as "capital", the theory being that the subscriber for these shares made his payment and intended the payment to be permanently devoted to the business, and did not contemplate that part of what he paid in might promptly be redistributed as dividends. At this point, a corporation's capital was an arithmetical figure equal to the aggregate par value of all issued shares having par value, plus all the consideration received for shares without par value.

Businessmen, however, struggled against being limited in this fashion. For various reasons, some legitimate and some not, they increasingly desired to have part of the consideration paid in for shares freed from the limitations which the law throws around statutory "capital". Some wished to start business with "surplus". Accordingly, corporate statutes were revised to permit directors, on the issue of no par stock, to state that a certain amount per share of non-par stock would be regarded as "capital" and any balance over such amount would be regarded as "surplus"—surplus in this context being, of course, merely a part of the consideration received for shares which was not subject to the restriction surrounding capital.

The clearest statutory formula appears in § 12 of the New York Stock Corporation Law (as amended L. of 1945, c. 855, § 75) which requires that every certificate of incorporation shall contain either one of the following statements:

"A. 'The capital of the corporation shall be at least equal to the sum of the aggregate par value of all issued shares having par value, plus ——— dollars (the blank space being filled in with some number representing one dollar or more) in respect to every issued share without par value, plus such amounts as, from time to time, by resolution of the board of directors, may be transferred thereto;' or

"B. 'The capital of the corporation shall be at least equal to the sum of the aggregate par value of all issued shares having par value, plus the aggregate amount of consideration received by the corporation for the issuance of shares without par value, plus such amounts as, from time to time, by resolution of the board of directors, may be transferred thereto."

This laid down a clear formula for determining what amount of assets originally paid in for stock was regarded by the law as "capital". Obviously it is only an arithmetical figure. If the corporation suffered losses, the figure remained the "capital" of the corporation on its books, though the assets did not then equal the capital; and the amount of the impairment of capital would show up as a "deficit" —just as if more assets were acquired by the corporation so that its assets were more than its "capital", the balance would appear as "surplus".

The last development again responded to the exigencies of businessmen. During the 1928–1929 bubble, they sought and got from the Delaware Legislature (the Delaware law being then most popular), a singular provision permitting issuance of no par stock by a corporation and the receipt of consideration therefor, but permitting the directors within 60 days after the issue of non-par stock to determine how much of the consideration should be set up as "capital" and how much as "surplus". In such case, a buyer of the stock during that period would not even know whether his subscription was to be part of the permanent investment of the business, or whether it might not promptly be distributed as dividends. But, before the expiration of the period, the corporation was required to file a certificate stating how the consideration for these shares had been set up, so that there was at length on the record in the Office of the Secretary of State of Delaware, and presumably also on the books of the corporation, the statement of the corporation that it had set aside a stated amount of the consideration required for the issued shares as "capital" which resolved the uncertainty.

CAPITAL SEGREGATED TO CLASSES OF STOCK

The arithmetical formula for determining legal capital of a corporation still did not meet the desires of certain businessmen. As will be seen in the cases, the law restricts the use of "capital" in two principal ways: dividends cannot be paid out of capital; and the corporation cannot buy back or retire its own stock out of capital. To do either of these things would be to diminish the amount of assets which in theory the corporation was to conserve to take care of creditors.

The business conflict arose with the development of preferred stock. The businessmen looked on preferred stock really as a credit instrument—a method of securing money (he would call it "capital" whereas as we have seen the legal rule may be different) in return for which the preferred shareholder got an agreement that in case the corporation were liquidated or wound up, his preferred share should be paid before the common stock up to a stated amount (say, $100) and would receive an annual fixed dividend—(say, 6% and no more) before the common stock got anything. The preferred stockholder was supposed to take less risk and a limited dividend in return for greater security.

The managements of corporations, however, liked the idea of being able to retire, or "redeem" preferred stock whenever it was advantageous to do so, just as they would pay off a note or a debt. Especially when it was possible to secure money at a lower rate than the preferred dividend, it was highly profitable to call in the preferred stock, paying the stated amount, and refinancing by issuing a new preferred stock at a lower dividend rate. Consequently, preferred stock, besides being limited as to dividend, and limited as to the amount it would receive if the corporation should be wound up, was made "redeemable" on call by the corporation at a fixed amount—commonly with a slight premium over the amount originally paid for it. But at this point the management ran into the classic conception that stock could not be bought back or retired or redeemed out of "capital", since this was supposed to be held intact for creditors. By consequence, in certain states, notably Delaware, statutory privilege was granted, when preferred stock was redeemed or retired, to deduct the amount used for redemption from capital, and not from surplus. This was handy: the amount of capital (determined by the statutory formula) was reduced; the surplus was undiminished and could be used to pay dividends and so forth.

Where preferred stock had a par value, and was thus retired, the formula was simple: the aggregate par value of the preferred stock so redeemed could easily be taken and subtracted from the previous legal capital.

But, when the preferred stock had not a par value, and especially when the preferred stock had been issued and the price paid to the corporation had been declared by the corporation to be partly capital and the rest surplus, matters became complicated. For the management naturally wanted to deduct from its legal capital, not the amount that the statute or the certificate of incorporation had made it set up as capital when the stock was issued, but rather the amount it paid out to retire the stock. Thus a share of non-par preferred might have been issued originally for $100, of which $50 was required to be set up as capital and the remaining $50 as paid in surplus; the share to be redeemable at $100. When it redeemed the share, the management would like, if it could, to deduct the full $100 from its capital account, leaving its surplus intact. But only $50 per share had been set up as legal capital; and if the corporation were permitted to deduct $100 per share on redemption, the result might be that the redemption would wipe out the entire capital account. So the Delaware law permitted the corporation only to deduct from the capital account, on redemption of any class of stock, the amount of capital "represented by" the shares of stock so redeemed. The statutory phrase was unhappy and vague.

The law had always permitted a corporation to transfer from surplus to capital additional amounts if the corporation so desired. The new practice suggested, and the new Delaware law provided, that such transfers could be made from surplus to capital and "allocated" to a particular class of stock. Thus, in our supposed case of an issue put out at $100, of which $50 was set up as the capital and $50 as surplus, at some future time the directors might decide to transfer from surplus to capital a sum equal to $50 per share of that particular class of stock and "allocate" the transfer to that class. Then, of course, they could redeem or retire the stock and write off the entire amount for capital. The precise implications of this new development—capital which is or can be "allocated" to particular classes of stock, have yet to be fully worked out. Before this development, legal capital had merely been (and indeed still usually is) merely a figure worked out by a formula. The balance sheet must show assets equal to the amount of all outstanding debts, plus the legal capital, if the corporation is to be able to declare dividends, or buy back its stock. When the assets are not equal to the total of its debts, plus its "capital", the capital of the corporation is said to be "impaired" by the amount of the deficit.

SURPLUS

Surplus may be defined as the excess of assets of a corporation over the sum of its outstanding debts, plus its legal capital.

Correspondingly, a "deficit" occurs when the sum of the assets adds up to less than the sum of the debts, plus legal capital.

Surplus may arise in several ways.

(1) Earned surplus. These are profits arising from the operation of the business, not yet distributed to the shareholders. Clearly if a corporation goes into business, and makes money, at the end of a period of time its assets will have been increased. After deducting the amount of debts, and the legal capital, there will be a balance over arising from operations. This is "earned surplus".

(2) Capital surplus.

(a) Paid in surplus. As we have seen above, a corporation when it issues its shares may exact a price greater than the amount required to be set up as "capital". It may, for example, sell a share having $100 par value for $150, the additional $50 being "paid in surplus"; or it may sell a no par share under an arrangement like the New York option A when the charter requires that, say, $5 in respect of each no par share shall be set up as capital, and any balance over may be set up as "surplus". This also would be "paid in surplus". Under the extreme Delaware permission, a corporation might sell no par stock for $25 and within the statutory period file a certificate determining that $5 of this should be set up as capital and the balance as surplus—again, paid in surplus. The paid in surplus is in theory at least not subject to the restrictions surrounding capital, can be paid out as dividends, or used to buy in shares of the corporation's own stock;

(b) Revaluation surplus. A corporation may invest part of its assets—for example, one million dollars—in a plant. Later it may reappraise that plant, finding that the value doubled since the plant was acquired. Following this appraisal it would then raise the figure on its asset aside from one million to two million dollars. The additional million on the asset side would then show up as an additional balance of assets over debts and capital, thus increasing the surplus figure. The additional amount was not earned; and it was not paid in; but it arises from revaluation.

(c) Non-recurring profit credited to surplus. This is really a variation on revaluation surplus. A fixed asset may have been acquired for the business—say, for instance, a piece of land. Some years later, the corporation sells the land at a large profit. The land previously appeared as an asset on the corporation books at its cost; on sale, it disappears from the corporation's asset list and is represented instead by an amount of cash considerably larger. The excess is profit; but not profit derived from the operation of the corporation's business but rather in the nature of a windfall. Careful accountants regard this as "non-recurring income", do not let it appear in the statement of earnings, and credit it directly to the surplus account.

A careful accountant, today, when he deals with corporate surplus, distinguishes between the surplus that has been earned and the capital surplus. Commonly he will attach to the corporation's balance sheet a statement of surplus, or an analysis of the surplus account, showing not only what the surplus is, but where it came from.

There are other ways in which the surplus account may be swelled: For instance, retirement of debts by payment at less than face, or purchase and retirement by the corporation of its own stock for a price less than its par or capital amount.

1. CONCEPT OF CAPITAL AS REPRESENTED BY STOCK

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW

§ 13. Capital. For the purpose of any rule of law or of any statutory provision relating to the amount of the capital of a stock corporation, the capital of any corporation authorized to issue shares without par value shall be deemed to be an amount computed in accordance with the statements respecting its capital contained in its certificate of incorporation or other certificate filed pursuant to law, or in a special law creating the corporation; and the capital of any corporation not authorized to issue shares without nominal or par value shall be deemed to be the aggregate par value of its issued shares plus such amounts as, from time to time, may be transferred to capital by resolution of the board of directors.

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

§ 14. * * * Any corporation may by resolution of its Board of Directors determine that only a part of the consideration which shall be received by the corporation for any of the shares of its capital stock which it shall issue from time to time shall be capital; provided, however, that, in case any of the shares issued shall be shares having a par value, the amount of the part of such consideration so determined to be capital shall be in excess of the aggregate par value of the shares issued for such consideration having a par value, unless all the shares issued shall be shares having a par value, in which case the amount of the part of such consideration so determined to be capital need be only equal to the aggregate par value of such shares. In each such case the Board of Directors shall specify in dollars the part of such consideration which shall be capital. If the Board of Directors shall not have determined (a) at the time of issue of any shares of the capital stock of the corporation issued for cash or (b) within sixty days after the issue of any shares of the capital stock of the corporation issued for property other than cash what part of the consideration for such shares shall be capital, the capital of the corporation in respect of such shares shall be an amount equal to the aggregate par value of such shares having a par value, plus the amount of the consideration for such shares without par value. The capital of the corporation may be increased from time to time by resolution of the Board of Directors directing that a portion of the net assets of the corporation in excess of the amount so determined to be capital be transferred to capital account. The Board of Directors may direct that the portion of the excess net assets so transferred shall be treated as capital in respect of any shares of the corporation of any designated class or classes. The excess, if any, at any given time, of the total net assets of the corporation over the amount so determined to be capital shall be surplus.

In any case in which the law requires that the par value of the shares of the capital stock of a corporation be stated in any certificate or paper, it shall be stated in respect of any shares without par value that such shares are without par value and wherever the amount of the authorized or issued capital stock of the corporation is required to be stated and the corporation shall have any shares without par value, it shall be sufficient to state the total number of shares authorized or issued, as the case may be, the number and par value of shares having a par value and the number of shares without par value.

WILLIAMS v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1883. 93 N.Y. 162.

Appeal by defendant from an order of General Term of the Superior Court of the city of New York, reversing a judgment for defendant and granting a new trial.

[The directors of defendant company had entered into an agreement to take over the properties, privileges, and franchises of the Atlantic and Pacific Telegraph Co. and of the American Union Telegraph Co. in exchange for stock of defendant company. In order to carry out the agreement, defendant planned to increase its capital stock from $38,926,590 to $80,000,000. $23,400,000 was to be used to acquire the assets of the two corporations and $15,526,580 was to be paid out in stock dividends to defendant's shareholders.

The consolidation plan was approved by a three-quarters vote of defendant's shareholders at a special meeting. Plaintiff, a shareholder, voted against the plan.

Plaintiff brought suit in equity against the corporation and its directors to enjoin the issuance and delivery of any certificates of stock except for cash, and to restrain the company from transferring on its books any of such increased capital stock beyond its authorized capital. Plaintiff alleged: (1) the proposed consolidation was an unlawful conspiracy; (2) the prices agreed upon for the purchase were a fraud upon plaintiff and other shareholders; (3) defendant did not have surplus property over and above its capital stock sufficient to represent the stock dividend, and hence the declaration of the dividend was a violation of N.Y.Rev.Stat., 1829, c. 18, § 2.[1]

The trial court found: (1) the agreement was a legitimate purchase and consolidation; (2) the stock dividend was not in violation of the statute; (3) the agreements were so far under way that no shareholder had any right to seek to restrain their completion; (4) plaintiff neither had nor would suffer any injury from the execution of the plan; judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appealed; General Term condemned the dividend as a violation of the statute and reversed the trial court. Defendant company alone appeals.]

EARL, J. * * * A careful reading of the section shows that it has reference only to the property of a corporation and not to its share capital. The first clause prohibits dividends of property except from surplus profits. It is further provided that the directors of any corporation shall not divide, withdraw or in any way pay to the stockholders, or any of them, any part of the capital stock of such company, or to reduce the capital stock without the consent of the legislature. These provisions were intended to prevent the division, distribution, withdrawal and reduction of the property of a corporation below the sum limited in its charter or articles of association for its capital, but not to prevent its increase above that sum. The purpose was to prevent the depletion of the property of the corporation thereby endangering its solvency. All the other provisions of the section show very clearly that such was the intention. Careful provision was made that the whole amount of capital stock should be paid in, and hence there was a prohibition against receiving a note or other evidence of debt in payment of any installment actually called in and required to be paid; and in case the directors violated any of the provisions of the section they were made individually liable to the corporation and to its creditors, in the event of its dissolution, to the full amount of the capital stock of the company so divided, withdrawn or reduced. All these provisions show that it was the purpose of the legislature, by means of them, to create a property capital for the corporation, and then to keep that intact so as to secure the solvency of the corporation and its responsibility to its creditors. The "capital stock" in this section does not mean share stock, but it means the property of the corporation contributed by its stockholders or otherwise obtained by it, to the extent required by its charter. While the term "capital stock" is frequently used in a loose and indefinite sense, in this section and in legal phrase generally it means that and no more. In State v. Morristown Fire Association, 3 Zabr., 23 N.J.Law, 195, Green, Ch. J., said: "The phrase 'capital stock' is very generally, if not universally, used to designate the amount of capital to be contributed for the purposes of the corporation. The amount thus contributed constitutes the 'capital stock' of the company." In Burrall v. Bushwick R. R. Co., 75 N.Y. 211, Folger, J., defined "capital stock" as "that money or property which is put in a single corporate fund by those who by subscription therefor become members of a corporate body." In Barry v. Merchants' Exchange Co., 1 Sandf.Ch. 280, Vice-Chancellor Sanford said: "The capital stock of a corporation is like that of a copartnership or joint-stock company, the amount which the partners or associates put in as their stake in the concern." By loss or misfortune, or misconduct of the managing officers of a corporation, its capital stock may be reduced below the amount limited by its charter; but whatever property it has up to that limit must be regarded as its capital stock. When its property exceeds that limit, then the excess is surplus. Such surplus belongs to the corporation and is a portion of its property, and, in a general sense, may be regarded as a portion of its capital, but in a strictly legal sense it is not a portion of its capital, and is always regarded as surplus profits. The very section we are considering contemplates that there may be a surplus, and that such surplus may be divided. The surplus may be in cash, and then it may be divided in cash; it may be in property, and if the property is so situated that a division thereof among the stockholders is practicable, a dividend in property may be declared, and that may be distributed among stockholders. All such dividends diminish and deplete the property of the corporation, and that section was designed to prevent dividends of property which tended to deplete the assets of the company below the sum limited in its charter as the amount of its capital stock. * * *

[1] "It shall not be lawful for the directors or managers of any incorporated company in this State to make dividends excepting from the surplus profits arising from the business of such corporation; and it shall not be lawful for the directors of any such company to divide, withdraw, or in any way pay to the stockholders, or any of them, any part of the capital stock of such company, or to reduce the said capital stock without the consent of the legislature * * *"

Cf. N. Y. Stock Corporation Law, § 58, infra, p. 384.

Order of General Term reversed, and judgment accordingly.[2]

PEOPLE ex rel. UNION TRUST CO. v. COLEMAN.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1891. 126 N.Y. 433, 27 N.E. 818, 12 L.R.A. 762.

Appeal from a judgment of General Term entered on an order affirming an order of Special Term dismissing a writ of certiorari to review an assessment of the relator's capital for the year 1889.

[Plaintiff is a trust company in New York. It furnished a statement of its assets and liabilities to the tax commissioner and claimed that since all its capital stock and surplus was invested in United States securities, it was tax exempt. The commissioners held that the capital stock, the actual value of which they were to assess pursuant to statute,[3] was the shares, and they ascertained such value by multiplying the nominal capital by the market price of the shares and deducted therefrom 10% of the nominal capital, the assessed value of the real estate, and the investments in United States securities.]

FINCH, J. The relator has been assessed upon an "actual value" of its capital stock derived entirely from the market value of its shares. These are selling at the large premium of something over $500 for each share of $100, and the assessors have concededly taken that valuation, or the principal part thereof, as the "actual value" of the company's stock liable to taxation, instead of its own proved and established value. The relator challenges the assessment, and through all the proceeding has persistently raised and pressed the inquiry, not so much as to the mode or manner of ascertaining value, but, rather, as to what is the precise thing to be valued,—whether the capital stock of the company, or the capital stock held in shares by the corporators. If these are the same, or, in any just sense, equivalents, either might be valued without substantial error; but, if they are not such, we must determine which is to be valued before we can solve the problem of how to value it.

Now, it is certain that the two things are neither identical nor equivalents. The capital stock of a company is one thing; that of the shareholders is another and a different thing. That of the company is simply its capital, existing in money or property or both; while that of the shareholders is representative, not merely of that existing and tangible capital but also of surplus, of dividend earning power, of franchise, and the goodwill of an established and prosperous business. The capital stock of the company is owned and held by the company in its corporate character; the capital stock of the shareholders they own and hold in different proportions as individuals. The one belongs to the corporation; the other, to the corporators. The franchise of the company, which may be deemed its business opportunity and capacity, is the property of the corporation, but constitutes no part or element of its capital stock; while the same franchise does enter into and form part, and a very essential part, of the shareholder's capital stock. While the nominal or par value of the capital stock and of the share stock are the same, the actual value is often widely different. The capital stock of the company may be wholly in cash or in property, or both, which may be counted and valued. It may have in addition a surplus, consisting of some accumulated and reserved fund, or of undivided profits, or both; but that surplus is no part of the company's capital stock, and therefore is not itself capital stock. The capital cannot be divided and distributed; the surplus may be. But that surplus does enter into and form part of the share stock, for that represents and absorbs into its own value surplus as well as capital, and the franchise in addition; so that the property of every company may consist of three separate and distinct things, which are its capital stock, its surplus, and its franchise; but these three things, several in the ownership of the company, are united in the ownership of the shareholders. The share stock covers, embraces, represents all three in their totality; for it is a business photograph of all the corporate possessions and possibilities. A company also may have no surplus, but, on the contrary, a deficiency which works an impairment of its capital stock. Its actual value is then less than its nominal or par value, while yet the share stock, strengthened by hope of the future and the support of earnings, may be worth its par, or even more. And thus the two things, the company's capital stock and the shareholder's capital stock, are essentially and in every material respect different. They differ in their character, in their elements, in their ownership, and in their values. How important and vital the difference is became evident in the effort by the state authorities to tax the property of the national banks. The effort failed, and yet the share stock in the ownership of individuals was held to be taxable as against them. The corporation and its property were shielded, but the shareholders and their property were taxed. * * *

---

[2] That part of the opinion dealing more fully with stock dividends appears infra, p. 443.

[3] N.Y.Laws 1857, c. 456, § 3: "The capital stock of every company liable to taxation, except such part of it as shall have been exempted by law, together with its surplus profits or reserved funds exceeding 10% of its capital, after deducting the assessed value of its real estate, and all shares of stock in other corporations actually owned by such company which are taxable upon their capital stock under the laws of this state shall be assessed at its actual value and taxed in the same manner as the other real and personal estate of the county."

There are reasons in abundance for the conclusion that by the phrase "capital stock" the statute means not the share stock, but the capital owned by the corporation; the fund required to be paid in and kept intact as the basis of the business enterprise, and the chief factor in its safety. * * *

Judgment reversed and assessment vacated and canceled.

NOTES

(A) "Note the distinction between capital stock in a corporation and the capital of that corporation, the latter being the entire amount of property owned by the corporation. A corporation's capital consists of that portion of its property which represents capital stock plus whatever surplus it may have at the time. The difference between the two is real, being one of kind and not in amount. Capital is tangible. Capital stock is a mental conception * * * Capital may and usually does, change constantly. Capital stock remains the same unless and until the charter of the corporation is amended and its capitalization changed. Capital stock when issued becomes the property of the shareholders. Capital remains the property of the corporation for as long a time as the corporation itself remains in existence * * *" Pomeroy, Capital Stock, 1938, 2 Peabody L.Rev. 77. See, also, 11 Fletcher, Cyclopedia of the Law of Private Corporations, Rev. and Perm. Ed.1932, §§ 5083, 5084; Dwight, Capital and Capital Stock, 1907, 16 Yale L.J. 161; Note, 1936, 35 Mich.L.Rev. 283.

(B) "A share of stock is generally defined as a chose in action entitling the holder to participate in the net profits earned by the corporation, and on dissolution of the corporation, to a proportion of the property of the corporation remaining after the payment of debts." 1923, 23 Col.L.Rev. 303.

EQUITABLE LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY OF THE UNITED STATES v. UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD CO.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1914.
212 N.Y. 360, 106 N.E. 92, L.R.A.1915D, 1052.

Appeal, by permission, from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in the first judicial department, entered May 1, 1914, which affirmed an order of Special Term granting a motion by defendant for judgment in its favor upon the pleadings.

The following question was certified: "Does the complaint state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action?"

HISCOCK, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff as the holder of a large amount of the preferred stock issued by defendant to restrain the distribution by the latter of about $80,000,000 as a dividend among its common stockholders. The material facts set forth in the complaint which asks this relief are as follows:

At the times involved the defendant had a large outstanding issue both of preferred and common stock. Prior to January 8, 1914, it had carried to the credit of its profit and loss account large amounts based on valuations which are not questioned, and at that date the credit balance of this account was more than $80,000,000. Of this amount upwards of $15,000,000 had accrued through the retirement of defendant's convertible bonds with common stock on a basis of one share of stock at par for $175 par value of bonds, and upwards of $58,000,000 had accrued as gain or profit on the sale of stocks of other corporations purchased and held by or for the benefit of the defendant. On the date above mentioned the defendant declared the extraordinary dividend in issue payable in cash and property to its common stockholders and chargeable against said balance so standing to the credit of its profit and loss account. The plaintiff holds its preferred stock under a clause in the defendant's articles of association which reads as follows:

"Such preferred stock shall be entitled, in preference and priority over the common stock of said corporation, to dividends in each and every fiscal year, at such rate, not exceeding four per cent. per annum, payable out of net profits, as shall be declared by the Board of Directors. Such dividends are to be non-cumulative, and the preferred stock is entitled to no other or further share of the profits."

It is conceded that the plaintiff has received all of the dividends and "profits" to which it is entitled under the foregoing article. It is also conceded that the amount carried to the credit of profit and loss as above stated need not be retained by the defendant but may be distributed among its stockholders. It is, however, insisted that this balance does not represent profits which under the foregoing article may be distributed exclusively amongst holders of common stock, but that it represents to the extent of the two items above mentioned an increase of or accretion to capital which must be distributed as capital amongst all the stockholders including those holding preferred stock. Thus arises the question which we are required to decide. If this is a distribution, even though unusual in amount, of accumulated gains or profits of a character which the directors of a going corporation may at any time in their discretion divide amongst the stockholders as returns or income on their investment, the plaintiff has no ground for complaint. It elected to take stock having a preferred but limited right to dividends and profits. It chose the right to returns on its investment which made up in certainty for what they lacked in possible quantity, and there is no inequity in holding it to its choice. If, on the other hand, all or part of the gains which it is proposed to distribute are accretions to and have somehow become permanent capital and been withdrawn from availability for dividends it will be assumed that they must be distributed amongst all the stockholders.

When a corporation is organized it secures capital by the issue of shares of capital stock. The fund or property thus secured answers the twofold purpose of furnishing means for carrying on the operations of the corporation and also security for the payment of creditors. This capital stock is carried as a liability and universally, so far as I am aware, at its par amount. It is thus carried as a liability because this is the proper bookkeeping entry. But aside from this, such entry also serves to emphasize the duty of the corporation to keep its capital stock unimpaired for the protection of those dealing with it. If the operations of the corporation result in gains, such gains are carried to the credit, not of the capital stock account but of some other account as surplus or profit and loss. Of course they may be capitalized by the issue of stock against them and sometimes in the cases of certain corporations like banks or insurance corporations where a certain ratio between assets and liabilities other than to capital stock is required, such surplus or profits may be counted and maintained as capital although not formally capitalized.

In the absence of some such special consideration I think we may take notice that it is the ordinary rule of corporate management established by decisions, statutes and business usages that the surplus of these gains or profits beyond what may be necessary to keep good the liability to capital stock which has been issued, may, in the discretion of a board of directors, be distributed amongst its stockholders as dividends and returns on their investment. Such being the general rule, it is incumbent on the plaintiff to show that there is something so peculiar in the two transactions being considered that the profits resulting therefrom are of a different nature in respect of this subject than those ordinarily realized in corporate business, and I think it has failed to do this.

I shall not attempt to discuss whether there might be an accretion to or increment of capital of a going corporation under such circumstances and of such a character that it would become permanent capital and might not be distributed as dividends. That question for the purposes now concerning us doubtless would be surrounded with some uncertainty and difficulties. It is sufficient for this appeal to consider the transactions before us and see, as I think we must, that there is nothing about them which impresses their results with any other character than that of ordinary current profits which the directors may in their discretion divide among the stockholders entitled to dividends.

It is said, because in the retirement of its convertible bonds defendant sold and issued its capital stock at $175 per share of $100 par value, that this entire sum was paid in as capital and must be held and distributed as such. That is not my interpretation of the transaction under the allegations of the complaint. The amount at par value paid for each share of stock undoubtedly became capital which the corporation was required to preserve and maintain as against its liability on the outstanding share of stock which had been issued for it. Just as undoubtedly the extra $75 paid per share represented the amount of accumulated profits or surplus which it was supposed would be apportionable to each share of new stock after payment and issue as aforesaid. In other words, as I think we must assume, the payment of this premium was not for permanent capital but for the purpose of equalizing as between new and old stockholders their respective rights in accumulated profits which so far as we know were current and distributable in dividends. When paid in this premium became part of such accumulation of profits and surplus and distributable as such. It was credited to profit and loss and not to capital.

It is unnecessary to decide what would be the rule of distribution in the case stated by plaintiff by way of illustration where stockholders on the organization of a bank subscribe for stock at double its par value for the express purpose of creating a permanent surplus or capital with the intent of affording a greater security to creditors and attracting depositors. That case is utterly different from this one.

The other transaction which produced a large item in the profit and loss account was the purchase and sale at an advance of various stocks. Ordinarily the profits made by a corporation on the purchase and sale of property would so clearly belong to a fund applicable to the payment of dividends that there would be no debate about it. The plaintiff in this case, however, says in substance that the defendant was not organized to deal in stocks and, therefore, the preferred shareholders could not have had such profits in mind when they agreed to take four per cent. dividends in full of their share of the profits and, therefore, further, "an accretion realized from such traffic is not profits within the contemplation of the instrument (defendant's charter), but belongs to capital." It seems to me that this reasoning involves a misinterpretation of the charter and a decided non sequitur. The language by which these stockholders relinquished all other claims to profits in consideration of preferential dividends was broad and comprehensive. They were to be "entitled to no other or further share of the profits." There is no limitation on this exclusion from any farther participation in whatever was profits, nothing to suggest that one item of profits was to be differentiated from another by the nature of the transaction which produced it. The contract was that whatever in the way of profits went into the profit and loss account should be subject to a payment of certain dividends on preferred stock before common stock received any and that was the end of the rights of the former class of stock so far as profits were concerned. The result of the transaction in question was a profit and the distribution of it is subject to this agreement. This seems so clear that it is difficult by discussion to make it more so. The proposition that these profits because resulting from what was perhaps an unusual transaction are not profits, but are an accretion which "belongs to capital," notwithstanding the painstaking argument of counsel, does not seem to have any foundation on which to rest except earnest assertion. * * *

As against the contentions of the plaintiff, I think it is abundantly established by decisions which are in conformity with and fortified by commercial understanding and experience that the gains or profits realized by a corporation at least from its active transactions such as those under consideration here constitute profits and surplus which are available for dividends. Williams v. Western Union Tel. Co., 93 N.Y. 162, 191; Lubbock v. British Bank of So. Amer., L.R. [1892] 2 Ch.Div. 198; Mackintosh v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., C.C., 34 F. 582, 606. * * *

The order appealed from should be affirmed, with costs, and the question certified to us answered in the negative.

WERNER, COLLIN, HOGAN, MILLER and CARDOZO, JJ., concur; WILLARD BARTLETT, Ch. J., not sitting.

Order affirmed.[5]

---

[5] Reiter, Profits, Dividends and the Law, 1926, 221–222, 228–229; Note, 1914, 14 Col.L.Rev. 524; 1914, 14 Col.L.Rev. 534, 601; 1914, 27 Harv.L.Rev. 758.

The Supreme Court decision is commented upon, 1914, 27 Harv.L.Rev. 758.

B. STOCK

STOKES v. CONTINENTAL TRUST COMPANY OF CITY OF NEW YORK.[1]

Court of Appeals of New York, 1906. 186 N.Y. 285, 78 N.E. 1090.

VANN, J. * * * What is the nature of the right acquired by a stockholder through the ownership of shares of stock? What rights can he assert against the will of a majority of the stockholders, and all the officers and directors? While he does not own and cannot dispose of any specific property of the corporation, yet he and his associates own the corporation itself, its charter, franchises, and all rights conferred thereby, including the right to increase the stock. He has an inherent right to his proportionate share of any dividend declared, or of any surplus arising upon dissolution, and he can prevent waste or misappropriation of the property of the corporation by those in control. Finally, he has the right to vote for directors and upon all propositions subject by law to the control of the stockholders, and this is his supreme right and main protection. Stockholders have no direct voice in transacting the corporate business, but through their right to vote they can select those to whom the law intrusts the power of management and control.

A corporation is somewhat like a partnership, if one were possible, conducted wholly by agents where the copartners have power to appoint the agents, but are not responsible for their acts. The power to manage its affairs resides in the directors, who are its agents, but the power to elect directors resides in the stockholders. This right to vote for directors, and upon propositions to increase the stock or mortgage the assets, is about all the power the stockholder has. So long as the management is honest, within the corporate powers, and involves no waste, the stockholders cannot interfere, even if the administration is feeble and unsatisfactory, but must correct such evils through their power to elect other directors. Hence, the power of the individual stockholder to vote in proportion to the number of his shares is vital, and cannot be cut off or curtailed by the action of all the other stockholders, even with the co-operation of the directors and officers. * * *

1. CREATION

TRIPLEX SHOE COMPANY et al. v. RICE & HUTCHINS, Incorporated, et al.

Supreme Court of Delaware, 1930. 17 Del.Ch. 356, 152 A. 342.

Application by Rice & Hutchins, Incorporated, for the determination of election of directors of the Triplex Shoe Company, opposed by the Triplex Shoe Company and others. Decree for petitioner (147 A. 317), and respondents appeal.

---

1 Statement of facts and remainder of opinion appears, infra, p. 339.

Affirmed.

PENNEWILL, C. J. This case is an appeal from the decision, 147 A. 317, of the Chancellor determining, under the provisions of section 31 of the General Corporation Law of the State (Rev.Code 1915, § 1945, as amended by 35 Del.Laws, c. 85, § 15), who were elected directors of the Triplex Shoe Company at the last annual meeting of the stockholders thereof held January 28th, 1929. The proceeding below was on a stockholder's petition asking for the determination by the Chancellor of the validity or invalidity of such election. * * *

Notwithstanding the voluminous briefs filed in the case, and the elaborate arguments and numerous contentions made by counsel, the Court think the case, so far as the real issues are concerned, lies within a narrow compass. The important question is, was there any common stock voted for the "B" ticket at the election in 1929 that was legally issued and outstanding at that time? It is admitted by the appellees that if there was any such stock the preferred stock could not be voted because the sole voting power resided in the holders of the common stock, and the "B" ticket was, therefore, properly declared elected.

It is admitted by the appellants that the preferred par value stock was valid stock and outstanding at the time of the election, but denied that it was entitled to vote for a reason considered in the Court's opinion.

The Chancellor decided that there was no valid common stock outstanding at the time of the election that had a right to vote, and that the preferred stock was legally voted.

To determine the correctness of the Chancellor's decision three questions must be considered, viz.:

1. Was there any common stock legally issued by the corporation under its original certificate of incorporation? * * *

The original certificate provided that

"Fourth: The amount of the total authorized capital stock of this corporation is One Hundred and Fifty Thousand Dollars ($150,000.00) divided into seven hundred and fifty preferred shares of the par value of One Hundred Dollars ($100.00) each. And the remaining seventy-five thousand dollars in shares of common stock without any par value.

"The amount of capital stock with which this corporation will commence business is five thousand dollars ($5,000.00)."

It will be observed that in the original certificate of incorporation two classes of stock were created, a preferred with par value, and a common with no par value. The preferred, however, was such only in name, no preference being stated, as required by law.

It is claimed by the appellee that the language in the charter providing that the remaining $75,000 (of capital) in shares of common stock without par value, is inoperative as a grant of authority for the issue of such shares, in that it is in direct violation of section 5 of paragraph 4 of the Delaware Corporation Law (Rev.Code 1915, § 1919, par. 4, as amended by 35 Del.Laws, c. 85, § 4), which provides that with respect to no par value stock, the certificate shall state the total number of shares authorized, that they are without nominal or par value, and the number of shares with which it will commence business, which shall not be less than ten shares.

This was the law at the time the original certificate of incorporation was granted and we can see no answer to the contention that the language of the certificate respecting the shares of common stock without par value was unauthorized by law, and therefore, inoperative. Certainly no authority or argument is needed to support the proposition that the authority of a corporation to issue stock is fixed by the law of the State which grants the authority, and neither the incorporators or any other officers can change, modify or supplement the law in that regard. The provision, therefore, in the certificate of incorporation that a certain part of the capital of the incorporation is in shares of common stock without any par value, without stating the number of shares is not only unauthorized by any law of the State, and inoperative, but it is also meaningless in view of the law.

Such being the case, we can see no escape from holding that the no par value stock attempted to be issued under the original certificate of incorporation was invalid stock.

Manifestly the appellants appreciate the difficulty of maintaining the validity of such stock issue and seek to show that even if it was illegally issued, it had a right to vote because it was de facto stock.

As to this point we think that if there is such stock as de facto stock, recognized by the law in any case, there could not be and has not been, in a case where the charter provision respecting the issuance of no par stock was wholly unauthorized by the law of the State which granted the charter, and where there has not been a compliance with the law under which the corporation was organized. If there was no authority at all for the issuance of the stock, certainly its purported or attempted issue could not impress upon it the character of any kind of stock that the law would recognize. It may be that appellants think there can be de facto stock because the law recognizes, under some circumstances, de facto corporations. But being clear that there was no de facto stock in the present case it would be unprofitable to state at length the reasons for the recognition of de facto corporations, and the persons who can invoke the doctrine. The principle underlying the rule is largely one of estoppel. * * *

The cases relied on by appellants to show the curative effect of an amendment to a charter are distinguishable, we think, either on the ground that in such cases the corporation had the power to issue the kind of stock that was issued, or on the ground of estoppel.

The following authorities cited by appellants hold that an unauthorized over-issue may afterwards be rendered valid by a duly authorized increase. 14 C.J. 404; Thompson on Corp. 3561; Cook on Corporations 292; In re New Zealand Banking Corp., L.R. 3 Ch. 131, and Murphy v. Braker, 89 Hun. 387, 35 N.Y.S. 387.

But in the present case the corporation had no power to issue the kind of stock that was attempted to be issued; the act was void and not merely voidable, and under practically all the authorities, it is incapable of being cured or validated by an attempted ratification by amendment or other subsequent proceeding. * * *

The certificate of incorporation did not confer upon the Board of Directors authority to fix the consideration for no par value stock, and, therefore, the consideration could be fixed only by the stockholders as provided by the statute. The stockholders never fixed the consideration for any of the no par value stock issued by the corporation after its organization, and there is no escape from the conclusion that all such stock was invalid at the time of the election in question and not entitled to be voted. * * *

The decree of the Chancellor will be affirmed.

(a) Authorization

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW

§ 11. Preferred and common shares. Every stock corporation shall have power to create and issue shares of stock. Every such corporation shall have power to create and issue two or more classes of shares, with such designations, preferences, privileges and voting powers or restrictions or qualifications thereof as the certificate of incorporation, or other certificate creating such shares and filed pursuant to law, provides; but no shares which are entitled to preference in the distribution of dividends or assets shall be designated as common stock or shares.

If any class of stock is preferred as to dividends or assets, the certificate of incorporation, or other certificate filed pursuant to law, may authorize the issuance from time to time in one or more series of the shares of any such class, and may authorize the board of directors to fix from time to time before issuance the designations, preferences, privileges and voting powers of the shares of each series of such class, and the restrictions or qualifications thereof; provided that the shares of all series of the same class having voting power shall not have more than one vote each, and when the stated dividends and amounts payable on liquidation are not paid in full, the shares of all series of the same class shall share ratably in the payment of dividends including accumulations, if any, in accordance with the sums which would be payable on said shares if all dividends were declared and paid in full, and in any distribution of assets other than by way of dividends in accordance with the sums which would be payable on such distribution if all sums payable were discharged in full.

Before the issuance of the shares of each series of such class, unless stated in respect to the first series in the certificate of incorporation or other certificate filed pursuant to law, and in that case before the issuance of each subsequent series, the corporation shall file a certificate entitled and endorsed "Certificate of (name of corporation) pursuant to section eleven of the stock corporation law," stating:

1. The name of the corporation, and, if it has been changed, the name under which it was originally incorporated;

2. The date of filing the certificate of incorporation in each state office where filed, or, if the corporation is created by a special law and has no certificate of incorporation, the chapter number and year of passage of such law;

3. The designations, preferences, privileges and voting powers of the shares of such series, and the restrictions or qualifications thereof. * * *

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

Sec. 13. Classes of Stock; Certificates Filed and Recorded in Certain Cases:—Every corporation shall have power to issue one or more classes of stock or one or more series of stock within any class thereof, any or all of which classes may be of stock with par value or stock without par value, with such voting powers, full or limited, or without voting powers and in such series and with such designations, preferences and relative, participating, optional or other special rights, and qualifications, limitations or restrictions thereof, as shall be stated and expressed in the Certificate of Incorporation or of any amendment thereto, or in the resolution or resolutions providing for the issue of such stock adopted by the Board of Directors pursuant to authority expressly vested in it by the provisions of the Certificate of Incorporation or of any amendment thereto. The power to increase or decrease or otherwise adjust the capital stock as in this Chapter elsewhere provided shall apply to all or any such classes of stock. Any preferred or special stock may be made subject to redemption at such time or times and at such price or prices and may be issued in such series, with such designations, preferences and relative, participating, optional or other special rights, and qualifications, limitations or restrictions thereof as shall be stated and expressed in the Certificate of Incorporation, or any amendment thereto, or in the resolution or resolutions providing for the issue of such stock adopted by the Board of Directors as hereinabove provided. The holders of preferred or special stock of any class or of any series thereof shall be entitled to receive dividends at such rates, on such conditions and at such times as shall be stated and expressed in the Certificate of Incorporation, or in any amendment thereto, or in the resolution or resolutions providing for the issue of such stock adopted by the Board of Directors as hereinabove provided, payable in preference to, or in such relation to, the dividends payable on any other class or classes of stock, and cumulative or non-cumulative as shall be so stated and expressed. When dividends upon the preferred and special stocks, if any, to the extent of the preference to which such stocks are entitled, shall have been paid or declared and set apart for payment, a dividend on the remaining class or classes of stock may then be paid out of the remaining assets of the corporation available for dividends as elsewhere in this Chapter provided. The holders of the preferred or special stock of any class or of any series thereof shall be entitled to such rights upon the dissolution of, or upon any distribution of the assets of, the corporation as shall be stated and expressed in the Certificate of Incorporation, or any amendment thereto, or in the resolution or resolutions providing for the issue of such stock adopted by the Board of Directors as hereinabove provided; and any preferred or special stock of any class or of any series thereof may be made convertible into, or exchangeable for, shares of any other class or classes or of any other series of the same or any other class or classes of stock of the corporation at such price or prices or at such rates of exchange and with such adjustments as shall be stated and expressed or provided for in the Certificate of Incorporation, or in any amendment thereto, or in the resolution or resolutions providing for the issue of such stocks adopted by the Board of Directors as hereinabove provided. * * * Before any corporation shall issue any shares of stock of any class or of any series of any class of which the voting powers, designations, preferences and relative, participating, optional or other rights, if any, or the qualifications, limitations or restrictions thereof, if any, shall not have been set forth in the Certificate of Incorporation or in any amendment thereto but shall be provided for in a resolution or resolutions adopted by the Board of Directors pursuant to authority expressly vested in it by the provisions of the Certificate of Incorporation or an amendment thereto, a certificate setting forth a copy of such resolution or resolutions and the number of shares of stock of such class or series shall be made under the seal of the corporation * * * shall be filed and a copy thereof shall be recorded in the same manner as Certificates of Incorporation are required to be filed and recorded * * *. Unless otherwise provided in any such resolution or resolutions, the number of shares of stock of any such class or series so set forth in such resolution or resolutions may be increased or decreased (but not below the number of shares thereof then outstanding) by a certificate likewise made, signed, filed and recorded setting forth a statement that a specified increase or decrease therein had been authorized and directed by a resolution or resolutions likewise adopted by the Board of Directors; and in case the number of such shares shall be so decreased, the number of shares so specified in said certificate shall resume the status which they had prior to the adoption of the first resolution or resolutions.

CHICAGO CITY RY. CO. v. ALLERTON.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1873. 18 Wall. 233, 21 L.Ed. 902.

The appellant in this case is a corporation owning a street railroad in the city of Chicago. The directors of the company, without consulting or calling a meeting of the stockholders, resolved to increase the capital stock of the company from $1,250,000 to $1,500,000. To this the appellee, who is a stockholder, objected and filed the bill in this case, praying for an injunction to prevent the increase. His position is, that it cannot be lawfully made without the concurrence of the stockholders, and in support of this view he relies upon the recent Constitution of Illinois adopted in July 1870, by the 13th section of the 11th article of which it is declared as follows:

"No railroad corporation shall issue any stock or bonds except for money, labor, or property actually received and applied to the purposes for which such corporation was created, and all stock dividends and other fictitious increase of the capital stock or indebtedness of any such corporation, shall be void. The capital stock of no railroad corporation shall be increased for any purpose, except upon giving sixty days' public notice in such manner as may be provided by law."

The complainant also relies on an act of the legislature of Illinois[2] passed March 26, 1872, to execute and carry out the above provision of the Constitution by which, amongst other things, it is enacted that no corporation shall change its name or place of business, increase or decrease its capital stock, or the number of its directors, or consolidate with other corporations, without a vote of two thirds of the stock at a stockholders' meeting.

The defendant in its answer relies upon its charter, which was granted February 14, 1859, the 3d and 4th sections of which are as follows:

"Sec. 3. The capital stock of said corporation shall be $100,000 and may be increased from time to time at the pleasure of said corporation."

"Sec. 4. All the corporate powers of said corporation shall be vested in and exercised by a board of directors and such officers and agents as said board shall appoint."

[It is claimed that the 3d section confers an unrestricted right to increase the capital stock at will, and that the 4th vests this power in the board of directors, and that the constitutional provision and act above referred to, if applied to this corporation, would impair the validity of the contract. It is further claimed, however, that they do not apply to railways operated by horse power. The court below decreed in favor of the complainant and the company appealed:]

MR. JUSTICE BRADLEY:—Without attempting to decide the constitutional question, or to give a construction to the act of the legislature, we are satisfied that the decree must be affirmed on the broad ground that a change so organic and fundamental as that of increasing the capital stock of a corporation beyond the limit fixed by the charter cannot be made by the directors alone, unless expressly authorized thereto. The general power to perform all corporate acts refers to the ordinary business transactions of the corporation, and does not extend to a reconstruction of the body itself, or to an enlargement of its capital stock. A corporation, like a partnership, is an association of natural persons who contribute a joint capital for a common purpose, and although the shares may be assigned to new individuals in perpetual succession, yet the number of shares and amount of capital cannot be increased except in the manner expressly authorized by the charter or articles of association.

Authority to increase the capital stock of a corporation may, undoubtedly, be conferred by a law passed subsequent to the charter; but such a law should regularly be accepted by the stockholders. Such assent might be inferred by subsequent acquiescence; but in some form or other it must be given to render the increase valid and binding on them. Changes in the purpose and object of an association, or in the extent of its constituency or membership, involving the amount of its capital stock, are necessarily fundamental in their character, and cannot, on general principles, be made without the express or implied consent of the members. The reason is obvious.

---

2 Cf. Ill. Business Corporation Act 1933, §§ 52, 53.

First, as it respects the purpose and object. This may be said to be the final cause of the association, for the sake of which it was brought into existence. To change this without the consent of the associates, would be to commit them to an enterprise which they never embraced, and would be manifestly unjust.

Second, as it respects the constituency, or capital and membership. This is the next most important and fundamental point in the constitution of a body corporate. To change it without the consent of the stockholders, would be to make them members of an association in which they never consented to become such. It would change the relative influence, control and profit of each member. If the directors alone could do it, they could always perpetuate their own power. Their agency does not extend to such an act unless so expressed in the charter, or subsequent enabling act; and such subsequent enabling act, as before said, would not bind the stockholders without their acceptance of it, or assent to it in some form. Even when the additional stock is distributed to each stockholder pro rata, it would often work injustice, because many of the stockholders might be unable to take their respective shares, and might thus lose their relative interest and influence in the corporate concerns.

These conclusions flow naturally from the character of such associations. Of course, the associates themselves may adopt or assent to a different rule. If the charter provides that the capital stock may be increased, or that a new business may be adopted by the corporation, this is undoubtedly an authority for the corporation (that is, the stockholders) to make such a change by a stockholders' vote, in the regular way. Perhaps a subsequent ratification or assent to a change already made, would be equally effective. It is unnecessary to decide that point at this time. But if it is desired to confer such a power on the directors, so as to make their acts binding and final it should be expressly conferred.

Where the stock expressly allowed by a charter has not been all subscribed, the power of the directors to receive subscriptions for the balance may stand on a different footing. Such an act, might, perhaps, be considered as merely getting in the capital already provided for the operations and necessities of the company and, therefore, as belonging to the orderly and proper administration of the company's affairs. Even in such case, however, prudent and fair directors would prefer to have the sanction of the stockholders to their acts. But that is not the present case, and need not be further considered.

Decree affirmed.

NOTES

(A) The charter of the Albany Iron Manufacturing Co. fixed its capital stock at $300,000 with power in the corporation to increase it to $1,000,000. The directors increased the capital stock; later they fixed and limited it to a lesser amount. The statute under which the company was incorporated provided that shareholders should be individually liable to corporate creditors until the whole amount of the capital stock of the company is paid in. Sutherland, a judgment creditor of the corporation, sued Olcott, a shareholder, to recover the amount due Sutherland. If there had been a legal increase of capital stock, Olcott would be liable to Sutherland under the statute because the full capital stock of the corporation was not paid in. Held: Judgment for plaintiff. The increase in the capital stock was proper since it was done according to the charter. However, the attempt later to reduce the capital stock was invalid; the charter gave a right to increase the capital stock only, and no right or power to reduce it. Sutherland v. Olcott, 95 N.Y. 93, 1884.

(B) On the problem of the rights and powers of directors and shareholders, see Commercial National Bank v. Weinhard, 192 U.S. 243, 24 S.Ct. 253, 48 L.Ed. 425, 1903.

SCOVILL v. THAYER.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1881. 105 U.S. 143, 26 L.Ed. 968.

Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts.

On November 25, 1870, the Fort Scott Coal and Mining Company was organized as a corporate body, under the general laws of the State of Kansas, with a capital stock of $100,000.

According to the laws[3] of that State, any corporation might increase its capital stock to any amount not exceeding double its authorized capital.

Under the provision of this law the Corporation, on April 19, 1871, increased its capital stock from $100,000 to $200,000. On October 16, 1872, the Corporation attempted, by taking the steps required by law for the lawful increase of stock, to increase its capital stock to $300,000, and on December 27, 1872, to make a further increase of $100,000. The nominal capital was thus raised to the sum of $400,000.

Nathaniel Thayer, the defendant in error, who was a holder of shares in the company, attended by proxy the meetings of the stockholders at which the third and fourth issues of stock were voted. After this attempted increase of the stock the officers and agents of the Company, by advertisements, bill-heads, and verbally, represented that its capital stock was $400,000.

Thayer was the holder of two hundred and eighty-five shares of the first two issues of stock. On two hundred of these shares he had paid to the Company $20 per share, and on the remaining eighty-five he had paid $40 per share. He was also the holder of five hundred and eighty-five shares of the third and fourth issues, upon which he had paid the Company $50 per share. No other payments were ever made by him on his shares of stock.

---

[3] On the increase or reduction of capital stock, see N.Y.Stock Corporation Law, §§ 36–38, 45.

The other stockholders paid the same amounts on the shares of stock of the several issues held by them respectively. By agreement made at the date of the several issues of stock the amounts paid thereon were credited to the subscribers, and the balance unpaid credited by "discount", and certificates as for full paid shares were delivered to the subscribers, and the stock account between the Company and them balanced by such "discount".

On April 2, 1874 a petition in bankruptcy was filed against said Company in the United States District Court for the District of Kansas; on April 11, the Company was adjudicated a bankrupt; and on April 29, the plaintiffs in error were appointed its assignees. On March 31, 1876, the assignees filed their petition * * * for an order of the court directing them to make an assessment and call upon the unpaid stock of the Company for the purpose of paying its debts. * * * The court made an order that all the stockholders of the bankrupt Company show cause on April 21, 1876, why the assessment and call prayed for in said petition should not be made * * * R. S. Watson, a stockholder, * * * filed exceptions to the rule, on behalf of himself and all other stockholders * * * the court overruled the exceptions and decreed that the assessment and call be made upon the stock of the Company of seventy six per cent upon which should be credited to each stockholder any sums paid by him on his shares. * * *

On July 17, 1876, the assignees made an assessment and call upon the stockholders as authorized * * * but before the assessment could be collected, Watson, the stockholder before mentioned, filed a petition for the reversal of the order and decree of the district court. * * * (The decree of the district court was affirmed with slight modification.)

Thayer, the defendant in error, having failed to pay within the time limited by the court, the assessment made upon him on account of his unpaid stock, although served with notice to do so, the assignees, on April 9, 1877 brought against him in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, an action at law to recover the sum of $27,160, which was the amount of the assessment on his unpaid stock. * * * The court found for the defendant (on the ground of the statute of limitations. Plaintiffs appeal.)

MR. JUSTICE WOODS delivered the opinion of the court. * * * [4]

The defendant insists; first, that the third and fourth issues of stock, which were made after the limit had been reached, within which the amount of capital stock of the company was restricted by the laws of Kansas, were absolutely void, and no assessment could be made on them which he was bound to pay; secondly, that the sums voluntarily paid by him upon his void stock, should be applied to the payment of the balance due on his valid stock, and that when so applied they would fully satisfy the assessment thereon; and, thirdly, that in any event the facts sustained the plea of the Statute of Limitations. We shall consider these contentions in the order stated.

---

[4] That part of the opinion dealing with shareholders' liability to corporate creditors, appears infra, p. 270.

The Constitution of Kansas[5] forbids special charters. Art. 12, sec. 1. All corporations in that State are, therefore, organized under general laws. The Fort Scott Coal and Mining Company was organized under the general law of the State, which, with its articles of incorporation, required by the law to be filed with the Secretary of State, constituted its charter. By the articles of incorporation the original stock of the company was fixed at $100,000. Chapter 23, section 14, of the Statutes of Kansas provides that "Any incorporation may increase its capital stock to any amount not exceeding double the amount of its authorized capital."[6] The second issue increased the stock of the Company to $200,000, which was the limit prescribed by its charter. The question, therefore, is whether the stock of the third and fourth issues, by which the aggregate amount was raised to $400,000 is or is not void.

As a general rule corporations can have and exercise only such powers as are expressly conferred on them by the Act of incorporation, and such implied powers as are necessary to enable them to perform their prescribed duties. Fertilizer Co. v. Hyde Park [97 U.S. 659, 24 L.Ed. 1036]; Salomons v. Laing, 12 Beav. 339; R. Co. v. Hawkes, 5 H.L.Cas. 341.

And it is well settled that a corporation has no implied power to change the amount of its capital as prescribed in its charter, and that all attempts to do so are void. President, etc., of Mechanics' Bank v. New York & N. H. R. R. Co., 13 N.Y. 599; New York & N. H. R. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N.Y. 30; Chicago City R. Co. v. Allerton, 18 Wall. 233, 85 U.S., 21 L.Ed. 902; Stace & Worth's Case, L.R., 4 Ch.App., 682, note.

In this case the attempt to increase the stock of the company beyond the limit fixed by its charter was ultra vires. The stock itself was, therefore, void. It conferred on the holders no rights, and subjected them to no liabilities. If the stock of the first and second issues had been held by one set of holders and the stock of the third and fourth by another, in a contest between them the latter would have been excluded from all participation in the management of the company or in its profits. To decide that the holders of stock issued ultra vires have the same rights as the holders of authorized stock is to ignore and override the limitations and prohibitions of the charter. We think it follows, that if the holder of such spurious stock has none of the rights, he cannot be subjected to the liabilities of a holder of genuine stock. His contract to pay for spurious shares is without consideration, and cannot be enforced.

It is insisted, however, that the defendant in error having attended by proxy the meetings at which the increase of the stock of the company beyond the limit imposed by law was voted for, and having received certificates for the stock thus voted for, and after such increase

---

[5] See N.Y.Const. art. X, § 1: "Corporations may be formed under general laws; but shall not be created by special act, except for municipal purposes, and in cases where, in the judgment of the legislature, the objects of the corporation cannot be attained under general laws. All general laws and special acts pursuant to this section may be altered from time to time or repealed."

[6] Cf. N.Y.Stock Corporation Law, § 36.

the company by its agents having held itself out as possessing a capital of $400,000, and invited and obtained credit on the faith of such representations, he is now estopped from denying the validity of the stock and his obligation to pay for it in full.

We think that he is not estopped to set up the nullity of the unauthorized stock. It is true that it has been held by this court that a stockholder cannot set up informalities in the issue of stock which the corporation had the power to create. Upton v. Tribilcock, 91 U.S. 45, 23 L.Ed. 203; Chubb v. Upton, 95 U.S. 665, 24 L.Ed. 523; Pullman v. Upton, 96 U.S. 328, 24 L.Ed. 818. But those were cases where the increase of the stock was authorized by law. The increase itself was legal and within the power of the corporation, but there were simply informalities in the steps taken to effect the increase. These, it was held, were cured by the acts and acquiescence of the defendant.

But here, the corporation being absolutely without power to increase its stock above a certain limit, no acquiescence of the shareholder can give it validity or bind him or the corporation. "A distinction must be made between shares which the company had no power to issue and shares which the company had power to issue, although not in the manner in which, or upon the terms upon which they have been issued. The holders of shares which the company has no power to issue, in truth had nothing at all and are not contributors." 2 Lindley, Part., 138; and see Lathrop v. Kneeland, 46 Barb., N.Y., 432; Mackley's Case, L.R., 1 Ch.D., 247. * * *

So in Zabriskie v. Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co., 23 How. 381, 64 U.S., 16 L.Ed. 488, this court, after holding the railroad company to be liable on certain bonds which it was alleged had been indorsed by the directors without lawful authority, added: "This principle does not impugn the doctrine that a corporation cannot vary from the object of its creation and that persons dealing with a company must take notice of whatever is contained in the law of its organization."

Upon the principles stated in these authorities, we are of opinion that the defendant in error is not estopped by any acts of his, to assert the invalidity of the stock issued in excess of the limit authorized by the charter, and to deny his liability thereon. * * *[7]

BELLE ISLE CORPORATION v. MacBEAN et al.

Court of Chancery of Delaware, 1946. 49 A.2d 5.

Suit by Belle Isle Corporation, a Delaware corporation, against T. Leonard MacBean, E. Jane MacBean, and Oakdale Contracting

---

[7] See Berle, Corporate Powers as Powers in Trust, 1931, 44 Harv.L.Rev. 1049 (the power to issue stock is limited by the doctrine that such issue must be accomplished so that the interests of existing and prospective shareholders are protected).

See, Note, 1911, 11 Col.L.Rev. 265, on the unauthorized issue of corporate stock. On the liability of stockholders to creditors where there has been an irregular increase of corporate stock, see, Handley v. Stutz, infra, p. 274; Veeder v. Mudgett, 95 N.Y. 295, 1884; 1926, 39 Harv.L.Rev. 269.

Company, Inc., a New York corporation, for a preliminary injunction. Decree advised in accordance with opinion.

SEITZ, VICE-CHANCELLOR. The complainant corporation seeks a preliminary injunction to prevent the various defendants from exercising any of the rights of ownership in connection with certain shares of the complainant corporation's stock, allegedly owned by the defendants, pending the ultimate determination by this court of the complainant's right to have such shares cancelled, or to have certain monetary relief.

The application for the preliminary injunction was heard exclusively on affidavits which were of a magnitude to dismay even the most hearty. It was also apparent that the less than cordial relationship existing between the parties tended to result in more heat being generated than light shed.

The complainant Belle Isle Corporation, a Delaware corporation, filed a bill of complaint naming as defendants T. Leonard MacBean, E. Jane MacBean and Oakdale Contracting Company, Inc. (hereafter referred to as Oakdale). It is not disputed that E. Jane MacBean is the wife of T. Leonard MacBean, nor that Oakdale is dominated and controlled by T. Leonard MacBean. The reading of an earlier opinion of this court in other litigation involving these parties, among others, will aid in painting the background of this picture. See Appon et al. v. Belle Isle Corporation et al., Del.Ch., 46 A.2d 749.

Three separate issuances of the complainant's stock to the defendants are attacked in the bill of complaint, but for purposes of the complainant's application for a preliminary injunction we need only consider two of them. The first transaction involves the issuance of 75,000 shares to the defendant T. Leonard MacBean (actually 55,000 shares were issued to him and 20,000 shares to his wife, E. Jane MacBean) on June 5, 1944, pursuant to a resolution which was allegedly passed (denied by complainant) at a directors' meeting held June 3, 1944. Services rendered to the corporation by the defendant T. Leonard MacBean from 1928 to 1944 allegedly constituted the consideration for the issuance. The complainant corporation vigorously denies that there was in fact any such consideration, but I find it unnecessary at this time to determine this disputed question of fact.

* * *

The complainant corporation seeks to have cancelled the 75,000 shares of its stock issued to the defendant MacBean pursuant to authority allegedly given by resolution of the board of directors passed at a meeting held on June 3, 1944. The complainant asserts numerous reasons why the transaction was invalid and the defendant MacBean not only denies these contentions vehemently, but asserts several grounds in support of the legality of the issuance of the shares in question.

Many of the grounds asserted in support of and in opposition to the legality of the issuance of the 75,000 shares are premised upon facts which are seriously in dispute and which cannot properly be determined at this stage of the proceeding.

Aside from these grounds, however, the complainant corporation contends that no quorum was present at the June 3, 1944 directors' meeting when the issuance of the stock in question was allegedly authorized as partial compensation for MacBean's past services to the corporation. The defendant MacBean on the contrary contends that a quorum was present under conditions hereinafter discussed.

The following by-laws of the corporation were admittedly part of the written corporate by-laws at the date of the meeting held June 3, 1944:

"[Article II] Section 5. NUMBER AND QUORUM:—The number of directors shall be TEN. A majority of the directors shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. Directors need not be stockholders.

* * * * * * * * * *

"[Article V] Section 3. INCREASE OF NUMBER OF DIRECTORS:—The number of directors of the corporation shall be fixed by the By-Laws and shall not be altered except at a stockholders meeting by a vote of the stockholders owning 75% of the shares entitled to vote thereon. In case of any increase in the number of directors the additional directors may be elected by the directors, or by the stockholders at an annual or special meeting by a plurality vote."

Article II, Section 5 had been amended by a resolution of the stockholders adopted June 7, 1939, whereby the number of directors was increased from seven to ten. All parties concede that this increase was made in 1939 in order to provide for representation to the so-called Ware-Wasson group when it performed a certain agreement involving the corporation's stock. The so-called Ware-Wasson agreement expired June 30, 1940 without ever being carried out so that this group never was represented on the board of directors.

No meeting of the stockholders or of the board of directors of complainant corporation was held between June 30, 1940 (when the Ware-Wasson agreement expired) and June 3, 1944, the date on which the directors allegedly authorized the issuance of the 75,000 shares here involved. The importance of this time interval will appear.

It is conceded by the defendants that at the meeting of June 3, 1944 there were present only the following four directors: MacBean, Huppuch, Irish and Corcoran. And it is undisputed that at no time during the period with which we are here concerned was any formal amendment to the by-laws ever adopted changing the number of directors from the ten provided for by Article II, Section 5.

It necessarily follows that if the by-law provision calling for ten directors was operative at the meeting of June 3, 1944, then a quorum of directors under Delaware law as applied to the charter and by-laws of the corporation would be six directors. This is so because it was held in Bruch v. National Guarantee Credit Corporation, 13 Del. Ch. 180, 184, 116 A. 738, 740, that "The rule is that the number necessary to constitute a quorum, under a by-law such as appears in this case, is a majority of the entire board notwithstanding there may be vacancies in the board at the time." The pertinent by-law provision of the corporation involved in the Bruch case was in substance identical with the complainant corporation's by-law governing quorum requirements, and, as a consequence, the quoted principle is operative.

As stated, only four directors were present at the June 3, 1944 meeting and one of these was the defendant MacBean. Passing complainant's contention that defendant MacBean, being interested in the transaction, could not be counted for quorum purposes, it is clear that even including MacBean for quorum purposes there was no quorum present at the June 3 meeting unless, as defendant contends, "by Established Practice to the Contrary Acquiesced in by the Stockholders", the quoted by-law (Article II, Section 5) was amended so as to provide for only seven directors.

The defendant MacBean's case turns then, at this time, exclusively on whether or not the corporation's by-law had been amended by custom so that at the June 3, 1944 meeting it had a board of seven directors rather than ten. Of course, if defendant MacBean is correct then, assuming MacBean could be counted, there was a quorum present at the June 3, 1944 meeting.

It is true, as defendant states, that in the case of In re Ivey & Ellington, Inc., Del.Ch., 42 A.2d 508, this court recognized the principle of amendment of corporate by-laws by a course of conduct inconsistent therewith. Clearly, however, one who contends that a written by-law has been amended by custom inconsistent therewith has the burden of establishing the existence of such a custom. Upon the undisputed facts, the defendant MacBean has failed to meet this burden, and it is not apparent that facts which would vary such a conclusion will be available to the defendant at the final hearing.

Almost dispositive of the defendant's contention as to the amendment by custom is the undisputed fact that there was no meeting either of the stockholders or directors between June 30, 1940 and June 3, 1944. The June 30, 1940 date of course represents the expiration date of the Ware-Wasson agreement, and clearly the by-law provision as to directors would not have been changed prior to that date, because the by-law provision was amended to increase the number of directors from seven to ten in order to effectuate in part the Ware-Wasson agreement. From June 30, 1940 to the directors' meeting date of June 3, 1944—when the issuance of the stock in question was allegedly authorized—no stockholders' meetings or directors' meetings were held. I cannot conceive how total stockholder and director inaction can form the basis for a custom inconsistent with a written by-law provision.

Obviously, if there was no meeting during the period mentioned, then defendant's assertion that directors owning the majority of the stock participated in directors' meetings, and thereby amended the by-law, can have no force, even if we assume that less than total stock representation may be sufficient. This is necessarily so because the directors' meetings where such stock was represented were held after the meeting of June 3, 1944, when the issuance of the stock in question was allegedly authorized. Defendant does not contend that the amendment by custom took place subsequent to the June 3, 1944 meeting. Moreover, the defendant MacBean's own actions at a meeting held March 28, 1945 reveal that he did not then consider that the by-laws had theretofore been amended by custom so as to provide for only seven directors. This is so because MacBean at that meeting "advised the meeting that three Directors should be elected to fill the present vacancies in the Board." Since there were admittedly seven directors in office in March of 1945, it is clear that the defendant MacBean assumed the written by-law providing for ten directors was still in effect.

Much reliance is placed by the defendant on the case of In re Ivey & Ellington, Inc., supra, but beyond recognizing the principle that a by-law may be amended by a custom inconsistent therewith, it gives little solace to the defendant. In the first place, the acts relied upon in the Ivey & Ellington case were necessarily inconsistent with the written by-law, because more directors were elected than were provided for by the by-laws, while here fewer directors were elected than were called for in the written by-law. Moreover, in the Ivey & Ellington case, the inconsistent acts, i. e., attending directors' meetings, were participated in by directors who owned all the corporate stock which possessed the right to amend the by-laws. As stated, such was not the case here. Even when confronted with such inconsistent acts, the Chancellor refused to conclude that the written by-law had been amended by custom to the contrary. While the Ivey & Ellington case recognized that the question of whether or not a by-law has been amended by custom inconsistent therewith is largely one of fact, nevertheless, it is apparent from undisputed facts here that the burden of showing such a custom has not been met.

I conclude, therefore, that at the June 3, 1944 meeting no quorum of the directors was present because a majority of the 10 directors required under the by-laws was not present. As a consequence, the resolution authorizing the issuance of the 75,000 shares of the complainant's stock to the defendant MacBean was in the language of this court in Mecleary v. John S. Mecleary, Inc., et al., 13 Del.Ch. 329, 332, 119 A. 557, 559, "illegal, because there was no quorum of the board present at the meeting authorized to transact business for the corporation."

The defendant MacBean contends that the issuance of the stock in question was ratified in two ways (1) because it was authorized by directors owning more than a majority of the stock and (2) because it was purportedly ratified at a subsequent directors' meeting held March 28, 1945, at which meeting the minutes of the meeting of June 3, 1944 were approved. As to the first contention, I do not believe that the fact that directors owning a majority of the stock vote in favor of certain corporate action can be substituted for the quorum requirements imposed by law. The defendant's second contention is likewise untenable because there was not a quorum of directors present at the March 28, 1945 meeting. Therefore, my ruling as to the June 3, 1944 meeting applies with equal force to the March 28, 1945 meeting. Certainly the quorum requirements for ratification are at least the same as they are for original authorization, other-things being equal. Moreover, this court in the case of In re Chelsea Exchange Corp., 18 Del.Ch. 287, 159 A. 432, adopted the principle that when a board of directors approves an act which is void because the meeting of the board was illegal, the approval of the minutes of such meeting at a subsequent meeting is not an approval of such an unauthorized act. This principle is applicable to defeat any contention of an alleged ratification by approval of the corporate minutes, and this is so without deciding whether the word "void" properly describes the legal effect of the passage of the resolution under the circumstances mentioned. Nor can there be any so-called "informal" approval by the directors of this type of corporate act. See U. S. Fire Apparatus Co. v. G. W. Baker Machine Co., 10 Del.Ch. 421, 95 A. 294.

We are not here concerned with a person who is dealing at arm's length with the corporation because the defendant MacBean during the time in question was a director and officer of the corporation. As a consequence, the situation is comparable to an intra-corporate transaction and must be adjudged accordingly.

I conclude that the 75,000 shares were issued to the defendant MacBean without proper corporate authorization, but at this stage of the proceedings I will do nothing further than advise the issuance of a preliminary injunction which will render such shares available for subsequent disposition and will prevent the defendant from exercising acts of ownership over them. At the final hearing, consideration can be given to the terms, if any, upon which these shares should be cancelled. See, generally Peter v. Union Mfg. Co., 56 Ohio St. 181, 46 N.E. 894. In view of my conclusion, it is unnecessary to consider any of the other grounds advanced by the opposing parties with respect to the legality of the issuance of these shares. * * *

A decree accordingly will be advised.

(b) Subscription and Issue

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW

§ 37. Subscription and authentication of certificate. A certificate filed pursuant to section thirty-six shall be either:

1. Subscribed and acknowledged by every subscriber of the certificate of incorporation and every subscriber to stock, and shall have annexed an affidavit by one of the subscribers of the certificate of incorporation to the effect that no stock has been issued and that the persons who have executed the certificate constitute all of the subscribers of the certificate of incorporation and all of the subscribers to stock; * * *

§ 67. Subscriptions to stock. If all the shares shall not have been subscribed for at the time of filing the certificate of incorporation, the directors may receive subscriptions payable in money until the shares are fully subscribed.

§ 68. Time of payment of subscriptions to stock. Subscriptions to the shares of a corporation shall be paid at such times and in such instalments as the board of directors may by resolution require. If default shall be made in the payment of any instalment as required by such resolution, the board may declare the shares and all previous payments thereon forfeited, after the expiration of sixty days from the service on the defaulting stockholder, personally, or by mail directed to him at his last known post-office address, of a written notice requiring him to make payment within sixty days from the service of the notice at a place specified therein, and stating that, in case of failure to do so, his shares and all previous payments thereon will be forfeited.

Such shares, if forfeited, may be reissued or reoffered for subscription. If a receiver of the corporation has been appointed, all unpaid subscriptions shall be paid at such times and in such instalments as such receiver or the court may direct.

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

Sec. 21. Subscription to Corporate Stock; Directors May Open Books for: How Paid:—At any time after a corporation is authorized to commence business, the directors may, if its whole capital stock has not been subscribed, increase its capital stock up to the amount authorized in its certificate of incorporation, and open books for additional subscriptions thereto.

The capital stock of a corporation shall be paid in such amounts and at such times as the directors may require. The directors may, from time to time, assess upon each share of stock not fully paid up, such sum of money as the necessities of the business may, in the judgment of the Board of Directors, require, not exceeding in the whole the balance remaining unpaid on said stock, up to the par value thereof, or in the case of stock without par value, not exceeding the consideration for which such stock was issued by the corporation, and such sum so assessed shall be paid to the Treasurer at such times and by such installments or calls as the directors shall direct, the said directors having given at least thirty days' notice of the time and place of such payments in a newspaper of the County in this State where such corporation is established, or has its principal place of business, or by written notice mailed at least thirty days before the time for such payment, to each stockholder at his last known postoffice address.

SUBSCRIPTION AND ISSUE

In the early days a "subscription book" was opened and circulated, each person agreeing to take up, say 50 shares and pay for the same at the rate of $100 per share. After a period of time the "subcription book" was closed and no further subscriptions were taken. The numerous changes that have been made in the corporation laws have made it possible to incorporate a company with great speed, a minimum amount of expense and considerable simplicity. This development made it unnecessary to take subscriptions from the public prior to incorporation and accordingly the machinery of the "subscription book" or the "subscription list" is seldom used today. Now, a banker or private group usually subscribes for or agrees to purchase an entire lot of shares then to be issued, and resells these shares in smaller lots to his customers, or a promoter turns over property in return for a block of stock on original issue.

The various states are in conflict as to the effect of an ordinary subscription to shares in a corporation intended but not yet formed. The majority view appears to be that in such situations, a subscription is not a contract between the subscribers, but only a continuing offer to the corporation. Cramer v. Burnham, 107 Conn. 216, 140 A. 477, Collins v. Morgan Grain Co., infra. See Schwenk, Pre-Incorporation Subscriptions: The Offer Theory and—What Is an Offer, 29 Va. L.Rev. 460; Frey, Modern Development in the Law of Pre-Incorporation Subscriptions, 79 U. of Pa.L.Rev. 1005; Lukens, The Withdrawal and Acceptance of Pre-Incorporation Subscriptions to Stock, 76 U. of Pa.L.Rev. 423; Morris, The Legal Effect of Pre-Incorporation Stock Subscriptions, 34 W.Va.L.Q. 219; Simonton, Subscriptions to Stock in a Corporation to be Organized, 34 W.Va.L.Q. 76; Ballantine, Law of Corporations (1946) 442 et seq. Thus, a subscriber may revoke an offer at any time before acceptance. There is disagreement as to what constitutes an acceptance in those states following the "revocable offer" theory. Cramer v. Burnham, 107 Conn. 216, 140 A. 477; Cartwright v. Dickinson, 88 Tenn. 476, 12 S.W. 1030; Feitel v. Dreyfous, 117 La. 756, 42 So. 259; Richelieu Hotel Co. v. International Military Encampment Co., 140 Ill. 248, 29 N.E. 1044; Utah Hotel Co. v. Madsen, 43 Utah 285, 134 P. 577. The courts of other states however hold that a subscription is a contract between the subscribers as well as a continuing offer to the corporation. Coleman Hotel Co. v. Crawford, (Texas Com.App.) 3 S.W.2d 1109; Minneapolis Threshing Mach. Co. v. Davis, 40 Minn. 110, 41 N.W. 1026; O'Dell v. Appalachian Hotel Corp., 153 Va. 283, 149 S.E. 487. These courts, with considerable doctrinal difficulties, conclude that the offer to the corporation is irrevocable and therefore hold a subscriber liable despite revocation before acceptance. They do however have great difficulty in sustaining the right of the corporation to sue if the subscriber revokes or withdraws a subscription before the corporation has accepted his subscription.

As a matter of public policy it seems desirable that the newly formed corporation should have, as resources, enforceable subscriptions. Section 6 of the Uniform Business Corporation Act provides that subscription for shares signed before incorporation are irrevocable for a period of one year unless otherwise provided in writing. 9 Uniform Laws Ann. 85. They are revocable after that period unless prior to revocation the corporation has been brought into existence. Section 5 of the Uniform Act provides that all subscribers prior to the issuance of the certificate of incorporation, or their assigns, automatically become shareholders upon incorporation. 9 Uniform Laws Ann. 83, 84. Both of these provisions have been followed with some modification in several of the more recently enacted corporation acts. Calif.Civ.Code, § 322 (1); Illinois Business Corp.Act § 16; Michigan Gen.Corp.Law, § 5-2; Pa.Bus.Corp.Law, § 207.

The "control" system is the stock book—a book of certificates of stock with a stub not unlike a check book. Upon the issue of shares a certificate is issued for them to the subscriber or purchaser, setting forth his name, the number of shares he holds and his address. The number of shares held by him are entered on the stub. An alphabetical notation or "stock register" or "stock transfer book" is kept upon which appear in alphabetical order the names and addresses of the shareholders, and the number of shares they hold. Appropriate notations are made in blanks provided for the purpose when shares are transferred; that is, a note is made that the shares or part of them have been transferred, and note is made of the name of the transferee, who then takes his place in the stub of the "stock book" and the "stock transfer book." The stock certificate is evidence of the holder's stock ownership; but is not necessary to make him a stockholder.

UNITED STATES RADIATOR CORPORATION v. STATE.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1913.
208 N.Y. 144, 101 N.E. 783, 46 L.R.A.,N.S., 585.

[Appeal from a judgment of the Appellate Division, Third Department, which affirmed the Court of Claims dismissal of plaintiff's claim.

Suit to recover a sum paid by plaintiff under protest and without prejudice to its rights, for stock transfer stamps.

Plaintiff delivered a number of shares of its capital stock to each of four corporations in payment for certain assets of those corporations. The four corporations and a trust company entered into a voting trust agreement, the trust company to hold and vote all the transferred shares for a limited period. A certificate was issued by plaintiff to the trust company, which thus became the record owner for voting purposes. The trust company issued to each shareholder of the four corporations a certificate that he was the owner of a certain number of plaintiff's shares deposited with and held by the trust company, and might transfer the certificate. All dividends were to be paid to the certificate holders who, at the end of the voting trust agreement, were to be entitled to turn in the certificates and receive plaintiff's certificate for shares of stock.

The State Comptroller held that the trust company certificates were taxable under N.Y.Tax Law, § 270.[8] Plaintiff paid for the transfer stamps without prejudice to its rights, and now seeks to recover the sum paid.] [9]

---

8 "There is hereby imposed and there shall immediately accrue and be collected a tax, as herein provided, on all sales, or agreements to sell or memoranda of sales, or deliveries, or transfers of shares or certificates of stock, in any domestic or foreign association, company, or corporation * * * whether made upon or shown by the books of the association, company or corporation, or by any assignment in blank, or by any delivery or by any paper or agreement or memoranda or other evidence of transfer or sale whether entitling the holder in any manner to the benefit of such stock or to secure the future payment of money or the future transfer of any stock, on each share of $100 of face value or fraction thereof, 2¢ * * * "

9 Statutory provisions authorizing and regulating the proceedings: N.Y. Tax Law, § 276, empowers the tax commissioner to ascertain whether any stock trans-

COLLIN, J. * * * A share of corporate stock is the right which the shareholder has to participate according to the number of shares in the surplus profits of the corporation on a division, and in the assets or capital stock remaining after payment of its debts on its dissolution or the termination of its active existence and operation. Plimpton v. Bigelow, 93 N.Y. 592; Jermain v. Lake Shore & Mich. So. Ry. Co., 91 N.Y. 483. It is created by the joint action of the corporation and the shareholder. It imports a contribution to the capital stock made by the shareholder and accepted by the corporation. When a corporation has agreed that a person shall be entitled to a certain number of shares for a consideration permitted by law and executed by the person, those shares come into existence and are owned by him. The statement in the certificate of incorporation or charter of the corporation that the capital stock is a designated amount divided into a certain number of shares, each of a named value, creates neither shares nor capital stock. It expresses the power of the corporation to acquire a capital stock. It creates potential shares which, transferred into actual shares by the acquisition of members and their payments, produce the money or property which, put into a single corporate fund, is the actual capital or capital stock on which the corporate business is undertaken and in which are the shares. It also fixes the sum of the payment necessary to create a share. The certificate of the corporation for the shares, or the stock certificate, is not necessary to the existence of the shares or their ownership. It is merely the written evidence of those facts. It expresses the contract between the shareholder and the corporation and his co-shareholders. But it is the payment, or the obligation to pay for shares of stock, accepted by the corporation, that creates both the shares and their ownership. Burrall v. Bushwick R. R. Co., 75 N.Y. 211; Christensen v. Eno, 106 N.Y. 97, 12 N.E. 648, 60 Am. Rep. 429; Southworth v. Morgan, 205 N.Y. 293, 98 N.E. 490; Buffalo & N. Y. City R. R. Co. v. Dudley, 14 N.Y. 336; Dayton v. Borst, 31 N.Y. 435; Flour City National Bank v. Shire, 88 App.Div. 401, 84 N.Y.S. 810, affirmed 179 N.Y. 587, 72 N.E. 1141. In the last case cited, Judge Hiscock, then Justice Hiscock, writing for the court, said: "The company having thus acquired property under an agreement to give therefor to various people certain interests or shares in its capital stock, we think that such latter persons, immediately upon the acceptance of transfers by the corporation, became entitled to and vested with said interests or shares, and that no further steps were necessary to accomplish this latter result. It may be admitted at once that ordinarily the corporation would issue certificates for these shares of capital stock, but it is too well settled to permit of doubt that said certificates would be merely representative of and not the real interest in the property and assets of the corporation constituting its actual capital stock." 88 App.Div. at page 405, 84 N.Y.S. at page 813. * * *

Judgment affirmed.

---

fer tax imposed is unpaid and, if so, to enforce its recovery and any penalty incurred. Section 280 provides the procedure for refunding a tax erroneously paid. These two sections remain in the same substantial form.

COLLINS v. MORGAN GRAIN COMPANY.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Ninth Circuit, 1926. 16 F.2d 253.

Action at law by the Morgan Grain Company, Inc., against H. W. Collins. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

RUDKIN, CIRCUIT JUDGE. This was an action by a corporation to recover a balance due on a stock subscription. There is little controversy over the facts. In the latter part of 1920, one Morgan, a grain dealer of San Francisco, conceived the idea of forming a corporation to take over the grain business then conducted by certain operators on the Pacific Coast. With this object in view, he consulted Collins, a grain operator in Oregon and the Pacific Northwest, and Sibley and Anderson, American managers for Wills & Sons of London, and proposed that Wills & Sons, Sibley, Anderson, Collins, and himself take stock in the proposed corporation. The proposition was looked upon with favor by Wills & Sons, and they directed their American managers to proceed to New York and meet one of their directors, to discuss the matter with Morgan. A conference was held in New York, attended by Morgan, Sibley, Anderson, and a director of Wills & Sons, and as a result of this conference Morgan wired Collins concerning the matter. The telegram is not in the record, but in response thereto Collins wired Morgan, agreeing to take $25,000 in stock in the proposed corporation, payable in installments.

Upon receipt of this message, Wills & Sons agreed to subscribe for 1,260 shares, Anderson and Sibley for 10 shares each, and Morgan for 625 shares, of the par value of $100 each. Sibley and Morgan then returned to San Francisco, and while at Chicago, on their return, two additional subscriptions were taken, one for 50 shares, the other for 25 shares. After the return of the parties to San Francisco, the Morgan Grain Company was organized under the laws of the state of Delaware, and Morgan became president of the company. Morgan reported to the board of directors that he had secured subscriptions to the capital stock as above detailed. The subscriptions were accepted by the board and a call of 25 per cent. was made. The call was paid, and certificates issued to the several stockholders for the number of shares paid in full. Thereafter a certificate for the remaining shares subscribed by Collins was tendered, but he refused to accept the certificate or to pay the additional subscription. This action followed.

Upon the trial in the court below the defendant offered to prove that, before the organization of the corporation or the acceptance of his offer to subscribe, he met Morgan and Sibley in San Francisco and informed Morgan that he withdrew his subscription, that if Morgan would consent to its cancellation he would subscribe for and take $5,000 of stock in the corporation, and that Morgan agreed to this. The court below ruled that this evidence was incompetent, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff. The judgment on the verdict is now before us for review.

The principal assignment of error is based on the ruling of the court excluding testimony tending to prove a revocation or cancellation of the subscription before the corporation was formed, and before the offer was accepted. Agreements to subscribe for stock of corporations to be formed in the future may assume different forms, with different results. For example, if an individual, acting singly and without co-operation with others, offers to take stock in such a corporation, all the authorities agree that the offer may be rescinded or revoked at any time before the corporation is formed and the offer accepted; this upon the familiar principle that it takes two parties to make a contract, and that, if one is not bound, the other is not, in other words, that a mere unaccepted offer cannot in the nature of things constitute a binding contract.

Again, such an agreement may assume a double aspect, as where a number of persons agree to form a corporation and to subscribe to its capital stock. Such an agreement constitutes a contract as between the subscribers themselves, operative at once, and it likewise constitutes a continuing offer to the proposed corporation, which, upon acceptance, becomes as to each subscriber a contract between him and the corporation. Some of the authorities hold that contracts of the latter class are irrevocable without the consent of all the parties thereto; but there is usually found in such cases some element of estoppel, which does not exist in the case at bar. But, without attempting to distinguish the present case from the cases so holding, we deem it sufficient to say that the cases relied on are not supported by the weight of authority.

"According to the weight of authority, a subscription may be withdrawn at any time before it is accepted by the corporation, whether made before or after the formation of the corporation, for the reason that until such acceptance there is no binding contract, because, until then, there is no agreement and no mutuality of object, and hence no consideration, and, in the case of subscriptions made before the corporation is formed, for the additional reason that, until it is formed, the other contemplated party to the contract is not yet in existence; nor, where this rule obtains, is a subscriber deprived of the right to withdraw under such circumstances because other subscribers have acted upon the strength of his subscription, nor because he has induced others to subscribe." 2 Fletcher, Cyc.Corp. 1225. [Citing cases.] * * *

The reason for the majority rule is well stated in Hudson Real Estate Co. v. Tower, 156 Mass. 82, 30 N.E. 465, 32 Am.St.Rep. 434:

"At the time when the defendant signed the subscription paper declared on, it was not a contract, for want of a contracting party on the other side; but it has now been established that a subscription of this sort becomes a contract with the corporation when the corporation has been organized, and in this way the objection of the want of a proper contracting party is finally avoided, provided everything goes on as contemplated without any interruption. Until the organization of the corporation, the subscription is a mere proposition or offer, which may be withdrawn, like any other unaccepted offer. Unless the signer is bound upon a contract, he is not bound at all. It is open to him to withdraw. It is not on the ground that there was no sufficient consideration. The seal would do away with any doubt on that score. But it is on the ground that for the time being, and until the corporation is organized, the writing does not take effect as a contract, because the contemplated party to the contract, on the other side, is not yet in existence, and for this reason, there being no contract, the whole undertaking is inchoate and incomplete, and since there is no contract the party may withdraw."

Again, in Bryant's Pond Steam-Mill Co. v. Felt, 87 Me. 234, 32 A. 888, * * *, in reference to the minority rule, the court added:

"It is urged by the counsel for the plaintiff corporation that such subscriptions create binding and enforceable contracts between the subscribers themselves, and are therefore irrevocable, except with the consent of all the subscribers, and some of the authorities cited by him seem to sustain that view. But we find on examination that such views, when expressed, are in most cases mere dicta, and that the cases are very few in which such a doctrine has been acted upon. Reason and the weight of authority are opposed to such a view. Of course, subscription papers may be so worded as to create binding contracts between the subscribers themselves. But we are not now speaking of such subscription, or of voluntary and gratuitous subscriptions to public or charitable objects, which, when accepted and acted upon, become binding. We are now speaking only of subscriptions to the capital stock of proposed business corporations. With regard to such subscriptions, we regard it as settled law that they do not become binding upon the subscribers till the corporations have been organized, and the subscriptions accepted, and that till then the subscribers have a right to revoke their subscriptions. And in view of the fact that such subscriptions are often obtained by over persuasion, and upon sudden and hasty impulses, we are not prepared to say that the rule of law which allows such a revocation is not founded in wisdom. We think it is."

We give adherence to the majority rule, not only because it is best supported by authority, but because it is supported by the sounder reasoning as well. It is contended by the defendant in error that the ruling of the court below rejecting the testimony was not excepted to, or that the exception was insufficient, but with that contention we are unable to agree. The court below treated the exception as sufficient and gave full consideration to the case on the merits, on the hearing of the motion for a new trial, and this court will follow the same course. * * *

For the foregoing reasons, we are of opinion that the court below erred in excluding the testimony tending to show a revocation or cancellation of the subscription before the corporation was formed and before the offer was accepted, and for this error the judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

WINSTON et al. v. DORSETT PIPE & PAVING COMPANY.

Supreme Court of Illinois, 1889. 129 Ill. 64, 21 N.E. 514, 4 L.R.A. 507.

MR. JUSTICE MAGRUDER delivered the opinion of the Court:

This is a bill filed by the appellant, F. H. Winston, as a stockholder in the Dorsett Pipe and Paving Company, a corporation organized under the laws of this State, against said company, and its creditors, and the other stockholders, all of whom are parties defendant to this proceeding. The bill seeks the dissolution of the corporation, the appointment of a receiver, the sale of the corporate assets, the assessment of the shareholders, and the payment of the creditors.

The company was organized in 1881 with an authorized capital of $125,000 divided into shares of $100 each. Among the original subscribers to the stock, who participated in the organization, were * * * F. H. Winston, 50 shares, $5,000; * * * I. S. Waterman, 100 shares, $10,000; I. S. Waterman, trustee, 637 shares, $637,-000. Waterman died before the filing of the bill, and his executors were defendants in the court below. * * * The appellees * * * are the executors of Waterman's estate. None of the creditors and none of the stockholders, except (Winston, Stockton, and Chase) complain of the decree of the Circuit Court.

The decree assesses the whole amount of the indebtedness, found to be due, against all the stock, subject to assessment, except that known as the "Waterman trustee stock", amounting originally to 637 shares. It is only this feature of the decree which the appellants complain of. They claim, that the trustee stock should have been made to bear its pro rata share of the indebtedness, and that, by the failure of the court below to assess it, along with the rest of the stock, they are compelled to contribute more than their fair proportion towards the discharge of the debts of the company.

The original subscribers to the stock, besides those already named, were D. H. Dorsett, 250 shares, $25,000.00; I. P. Ellacott, 10 shares, $1000.00; F. S. Winston, Jr., 3 shares, $300.00. After 613 of the 1250 shares had been subscribed for, there was nobody to take the remaining 637 shares. It was deemed advisable to organize the corporation at once, and to proceed with the business as soon as possible. Under the statute a certificate of organization could not be obtained from the Secretary of State, until the capital stock should be fully subscribed. Accordingly it was suggested, at the gathering of the original subscribers above named, and while they were engaged in signing their names to the subscription paper, that Waterman, who was the prime mover and chief promoter of the scheme, should subscribe for the 637 shares, as trustee. In pursuance of this suggestion he signed the list: "I. S. Waterman, trustee, 637 shares, $63,700." The caption of the paper, so signed by him and the others, is as follows: "We, the undersigned, hereby severally subscribe, for the number of shares set opposite our respective names, to the capital stock of the Dorsett Pipe and Paving Company, and we severally agree to pay the said company for each share the sum of one hundred dollars."

There is some uncertainty expressed by some of the witnesses as to the persons, for whom Waterman was acting as trustee when he so signed his name. We deem it unnecessary to consider whether he was technically a trustee for the corporation, or for the stockholders, or for the future distributees of the stock. After a careful examination of all the evidence we are satisfied, that there was a definite understanding between him and the other subscribers, as to the purpose for which he took the stock, and as to the nature of the liability, which he assumed thereby. It was understood, that, after the report should be made to the Secretary of State, and the complete organization of the corporation should be effected, Waterman should go to work to dispose of the stock to third parties, and that the other stockholders should help him to so dispose of it. As between him and his co-stockholders, he was not to be liable upon the stock, and was not to be required to pay assessments upon it. It was explained to him and he was fully aware, that, as between him and creditors of the company, he would be held liable upon his subscription for the 637 shares. * * *

As between the State and Waterman, he must be regarded as a subscriber for the 637 shares. If he and those associated with him reported a fictitious or unreal subscription for the trustee stock, they obtained a charter from the State by fraud. There is no evidence of any such intention or design on the part of the gentlemen, who organized this corporation.

As between the creditors of the company and Waterman, he must be regarded as a subscriber for the 637 shares. The fact that he placed the word "trustee" after his name would make no difference in his liability to the creditors. "Where shares are held by a person as trustee for another, the legal holder of the shares, and not the equitable owner, is primarily liable both to the company and to its creditors." 2 Morawetz on Corp. § 853. Appellees admit that the estate of Waterman is liable to be assessed upon the shares held by him as trustee, if such assessment becomes necessary in order to pay the debts of the corporation. The rights of the creditors in this regard are recognized by the decree of the trial court.

But, in view of the understanding among the stockholders that the trustee stock should not be subject to assessment as between Waterman and the original subscribers, the Circuit Court, by its decree, makes an assessment against the stock, other than the trustee stock, reserving the right to make further assessments if the same shall be needed. The decree provides that "in case money enough cannot be realized from the assessments upon the stock, which is liable to contribute to and be assessed as aforesaid for the payment of the valid debts and obligations of the said corporation, then the said executors of said James S. Waterman, deceased, shall be required to pay also, upon the said stock taken by James S. Waterman as trustee, such sum as may be necessary to pay said deficiency." The executors are assessed upon the $10,000.00 of stock, subscribed for by Waterman individually.

We cannot see why, under the facts disclosed by this record, the decree of the court below is erroneous in holding, that the trustee stock should not be assessed primarily and in the first instance, as between these three appellants and the Waterman estate. The decree does not require the appellants to pay more than they owe. Neither of them ever paid his subscription to the capital stock in full. Unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock of a corporation constitute a trust fund, which may be subjected to the payment of the debts, like any other asset. The assessments made by the present decree against the appellants respectively do not exceed, or equal, the several amounts due from them upon their unpaid subscriptions. There is no hardship in requiring them to carry out the arrangement as to the trustee stock, made with Waterman in their presence and with their consent, and of which they reaped the benefit by a speedy organization of the Pipe and Paving Company.

In most of the cases, where subscriptions to the capital stock of corporations have been condemned, as being conditional, or accompanied by secret or qualifying agreements, the rights of creditors or stockholders have been prejudiced. Creditors are entitled to look to the stock as it appears upon the face of the subscription list. Each stockholder has a vested right in the contract for subscription of every other stockholder. In the case at bar, no creditor is injured, and no creditor is complaining. The appellant stockholders cannot object to the release of stock, which they permitted to be subscribed for with the understanding that, so far as they themselves were concerned, it should be released. We are of the opinion that the Appellate Court committed no error in affirming the decree of the Circuit Court.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is, therefore, affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

BURNINGHAM v. BURKE et al.

Supreme Court of Utah, 1926. 67 Utah 90, 245 P. 977.

Action in equity by H. I. Burningham against J. J. Burke, receiver, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

STRAUP, J. This is an action in equity, brought by the plaintiff, the appellant, to rescind a subscription or purchase of capital stock and to recover back moneys paid by him thereon. [The basis of his suit was fraud. At the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence, the court granted defendant's motion for a nonsuit.] * * *

Upon the question of laches, we think the evidence was not of such character as to preclude the plaintiff from recovery. Indeed, on the record, we think the evidence is not sufficient to even justify a finding that the plaintiff was guilty of laches, much less that he was conclusively guilty thereof. There is evidence to show that some of the alleged material representations were made, that they were false, that the plaintiff relied on them, and that he did not discover their falsity until after the appointment of the receiver, and that in no particular was he connected with or participated in any of the affairs of the company or attended any stockholders' or other meetings of the company, or otherwise took part in any of the proceedings of the company, or had any knowledge of or familiarity with the business, or received any dividends or other benefits whatsoever, or that he was negligent in not earlier discovering the alleged fraud or misrepresentations. Nor on the record can we say as matter of law that the plaintiff, after discovering the fraud, did not act with reasonable diligence and promptness in rescinding or repudiating his contract of purchase. * * * Whether one on the ground of fraud or misrepresentation may rescind or repudiate a stock subscription or purchase after the corporation has become insolvent or after the appointment of a receiver, judicial opinions are in irreconcilable conflict. We, however, believe the weight of American authority to be that a rescission or repudiation on such ground may be made after the corporation has become insolvent or the appointment of a receiver, if the person making it was not guilty of laches, and acted promptly and with reasonable diligence, and otherwise was entitled to rescind or repudiate. The difficult question is: May he do so when a considerable amount of indebtedness has been incurred by the corporation subsequent to the stock subscription or purchase and before the insolvency of the company or the appointment of the receiver? The authorities as to this also are in conflict. * * *

It will be seen that in some of the cases relief was denied on the theory of the "trust fund doctrine," by reason of which it is asserted that the equities of creditors are superior to those of a defrauded shareholder. * * *

As to subsequent creditors, we, upon what we regard to be the weight of authority, deduce this: Where one subscribed for or purchased stock of a solvent corporation, he, on the ground of fraud or misrepresentation, may rescind or repudiate the contract, if otherwise entitled to do so, and is not guilty of laches, even after the corporation has become insolvent or has gone into hands of a receiver, except as to subsequent creditors, who, in ignorance of the fraud and on strength of or reliance on the stock subscription or purchase in good faith and in some considerable amount, became such thereafter and before the insolvency of the company or appointment of the receiver, to show which the burden is on the receiver or such subsequent creditors.

In such view, looking at the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, we find this to be the situation: When the stock was purchased by plaintiff, the company then had current liabilities of about $368,000 and numerous creditors, about 150 of whom were creditors on open and running accounts. Such creditors, after plaintiff's purchase of stock, continued as they had before to carry on an open running account with the company until or shortly before the appointment of the receiver. It is claimed by the respondents that between such time the aggregate amount of corporate debts incurred with such creditors was about $82,000. But in about every instance the company, at the time of plaintiff's purchase of stock, was indebted to such creditors as much as, and, in some instances, more than, when the receiver was appointed. * * *

Independent of other evidence, or other facts or circumstances, it is rare where, from the mere fact of a stock subscription or purchase and the incurring of corporate indebtedness thereafter, a conclusive presumption may be indulged that such debt or debts were incurred on reliance of stock subscription or purchase. To give a subsequent creditor equities over a defrauded stockholder, it is not essential that it be shown by direct evidence that the creditor or creditors relied on the stock subscription or purchase; but, to justify such reliance, there ought to be shown some facts or circumstances in addition to the mere fact that a substantial amount of debt was incurred or credit given subsequent to the stock subscription or purchase. There were no new creditors; but that is not controlling. An old creditor on reliance of stock subscriptions or purchases may, subsequent thereto, extend further or additional credit just as a new creditor may on such reliance extend credit. There may be here some subsequent creditors who have equities superior to those of the plaintiff, but on the record, and because of the nature and character of the subsequent indebtedness and the manner in which it was incurred, no such conclusive presumption as to any of it should be indulged as was done by the trial court as to all of it, and the plaintiff denied all relief. The difficulty here is that all debts incurred subsequent to plaintiff's stock subscription, no matter what amount or nature or how incurred, * * * were grouped and treated as of equal standing and equity, and the conclusive presumption indulged that all were incurred on strength of and reliance on plaintiff's and other stock subscriptions and purchases, and all such creditors treated as having equities superior to those of plaintiff, who was sent out of court and his action dismissed—dismissed not only as to subsequent creditors, but also as to all creditors existing at the time of his purchase—and plaintiff forbidden in any particular from participating with them or at all or on any condition in any of the assets of the company, and thereby all claims of prior as well as subsequent creditors adjudged superior to those of the plaintiff, and thus, stripped of all rights in the premises, the court turned him out naked even as against the corporation itself who, as alleged and as shown by evidence, defrauded him. In other words, by the ruling, the trial court made no distinction whatever as to prior or subsequent creditors, and in such respect even exceeded the terms of the pleaded estoppel which declared an estoppel only as to subsequent creditors. However, the ruling in such regard is now defended on the ground that the aggregate amount of subsequent debts incurred greatly exceeded the amount of plaintiff's purchase. But the aggregate amount of subscriptions and purchases during the stock-selling campaign greatly exceeded the aggregate amount of such indebtedness, even though the whole of the $82,000 indebtedness should be regarded as corporate indebtedness incurred on reliance of such stock subscriptions or purchases, which, on the record, is not justified. * * *

Substantially all the authorities agree that, in an action brought by a defrauded stockholder to rescind his stock subscription or purchase, the equities of subsequent creditors is matter of defense and must be pleaded. It here was pleaded by the receiver. * * *

So our ruling is that the defense of equities of subsequent creditors was properly interposed by the receiver. At the same time we see no reason why such subsequent creditors, if they choose to do so, may not, upon a proper showing, intervene in an action such as here. Though equities of subsequent creditors be, in an action of this kind, determined against him, the plaintiff, nevertheless, on issues as here, was entitled to have adjudicated his demand and damage, and if found in his favor, to have declared the amount thereof entitled to participate in the assets of the company upon a basis of equality with existing creditors at the time of his purchase, except as to secured or otherwise preferred creditors. Because on evidence and the record in a case it may be found and determined that equities of subsequent creditors are superior to those of the plaintiff, still, for such reason, existing creditors who, as against the plaintiff having no equity ought not to be placed in a better condition than occupied by them before the appointment of the receiver had there been no subsequent creditors.

Let the judgment of the court below be reversed, the case remanded, and a new trial granted. Such is the order. Costs to the appellant.

POST INCORPORATION SUBSCRIPTIONS

Subscriptions for shares made after a corporation is formed have the legal effect of making the subscriber an owner of the shares immediately, even though the rights of a shareholder of record may be withheld as security. Neither the issuance of certificates evidencing the shares nor the payment of price are a necessary prerequisite. The subscriber therefore becomes liable as a debtor to pay the subscription price for the shares.

Difficulty and confusion arise from the attempt by many courts to distinguish between contracts for the issue of shares by way of subscription and by way of purchase and sale. In so distinguishing the courts resort to the law of contracts trying to determine the intention of the parties and to interpret the terms of the particular agreement. The usual situation in which this distinction has been applied is where the purchase price is payable over a period of time. Stern v. Mayer, 166 Minn. 346, 207 N.W. 737; Reagan v. Midland Packing Co., 298 F. 500 (D.C.Iowa 1924). Ballantine indicates that the principal consequences of determining that an agreement is not a subscription but an executory contract of purchase are as follows:

"(1) The promise to issue the shares and the promise to pay the price are considered to create dependent and concurrent duties. Tender of a certificate for shares, or the ability and willingness to deliver a certificate on payment, are a condition to the right of a corporation to bring suit for the purchase price. Payment is a condition to the right to a certificate for shares and the status of a shareholder.

"(2) The purchaser is not a debtor and according to some courts the measure of liability of the purchaser if he defaults, is in damages for the difference between the contract price and the market value of the shares.

"(3) The most serious consequence of all is that bankruptcy or insolvency of the corporation will terminate its claim against the purchaser on the theory that it can no longer perform its side of an executory contract by delivery of a valid certificate and that the consideration has failed." (Ballantine Corporations, 1946 Ed., p. 451.)

It would seem better to disregard these refinements of contract law and hold that any agreement for issuance or creation of shares is a subscription and carries with it the unqualified obligation to pay the subscription price. The Minnesota Business Corporation Act, adopted in 1933, by statute provides in section 16-xi that contracts to purchase shares from the corporation shall for all purposes have the same status as accepted subscriptions.

2. STOCK TRANSFER AGENT AND REGISTRAR

STOCK TRANSFER AGENT AND REGISTRAR

When a stockholder transfers his shares of stock, the corporation accepts the properly assigned certificate, cancels it, makes the necessary entry upon its books and issues a new certificate to the assignee. Formerly, the company did no more than permit the stockholder to open the books and record the transfer of interest himself; but today the agent of the corporation, in effect, is appointed the attorney of the transferor for this purpose.

This "very simple business"[10] has acquired amazing complexity; and in recognition of the mechanical and legal skill required for its performance, most corporations with publicly held shares have delegated the tasks of stock issue and transfer to banks and trust companies. These professional agents are customarily designated by a resolution of the board[11] which frequently limits the authority granted according to the form of appointment suggested by the agent.[12] Some firms, among them General Motors and the Texas Company, perform the operation of transfer within a department of their own company.

Trust companies and banks engaging in stock transfer activities are also available for agency appointment as registrar. It is the duty of the registrar to act as a check upon the transfer agent and to prevent the negligent or fraudulent overissue of stock. Obviously, one cannot serve in both capacities for the same principal, nor can any company trading on the national exchanges act as registrar for its own stock.[13]

---

10 "* * * What is a transfer agency? It is a very harmless thing. It amounts to nothing more than the witnessing of the conveyance by one person to another, of personal property, viz. stock of an incorporated company; and in this case also to furnishing the purchaser a certificate of ownership of such stock, on the surrender of a previous certificate of like character held by the seller. This is a very simple business, involving little or no risk or hazard; requiring nothing but ordinary care and fidelity in its performance." Bank of Kentucky v. Schuylkill Bank, 1 Parsons Eq.Cas. (Pa.) 180 (1846).

11 Fletcher, Cyclopedia of the Law of Private Corporations, V. 19, sec. 8932.

12 Christy, The Transfer of Stock (2d ed. by Christy & McLean, 1940) sec. 282. See Chap. XVIII which is devoted to the functions of the transfer agent and registrar and includes a description of the activities of the transfer agent other than the issue and transfer of stock. The transfer agent frequently will make dividend disbursements, and, through a corporate agency department, may act as subscription agent, depositary under readjustment and consolidation plans, redemption agent, etc.

13 e. g., Requirements for Listing on the New York Stock Exchange.

The need for a registrar first appeared in the 1860's when a transfer agent and officer of the New York and New Haven Ry. fraudulently issued certificates of stock in the company endangering its financial soundness.[14] Shortly afterwards the fight for control of the Erie railroad, which was accompanied by excessive stock issues through the circulation of convertible bonds, so concerned the New York Stock Exchange that provision for registration of securities was made a condition of listing.[15] Today the rules of the Stock Exchange require that the registrar must be a bank or trust company, and that neither registrar nor transfer agent can be changed without the approval of the Exchange.[16] The bank which seeks to qualify as transfer agent or registrar must not only show possession of the necessary facilities and undergo investigation, but it must agree with the Registration Division that "it will not * * * register as Registrar any securities dealt in on said Exchange to a greater amount than has been authorized by said Exchange; that it will not register any additional amounts of such securities until so authorized; and that it will promptly notify said Exchange of all such securities issued by it as Transfer Agent other than upon transfer. (Form 87A-7-37, N. Y. Stock Exchange.)"

As registrar the bank is not concerned with the propriety of a transfer of stock except to make certain that for each certificate issued there is either a cancelled certificate or an authorization from the transfer agent for a new issue.[17] It is very much concerned with the 14 N. Y. & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N.Y. 30 (1865).

15 Resolution of the New York Stock Exchange and the Open Board of Stock Brokers, 30 Nov. 1868: "Whereas, Companies, whose stocks are actively dealt in at the New York Stock Exchange and Open Board of Brokers, have made secret issues of stock, without giving to the public information as to the amount or purpose of such issues, thereby endangering the interests of those who purchase or loan upon such stocks. * * * Resolved, * * * neither board will call, or deal in any active speculative stock, of any company, a registry of whose stock is not kept in some responsible Bank, Trust Co., or some other satisfactory agency, and which shall not give public notice at the time of establishing such registry, of the number of shares so entrusted to be registered and shall not give at least thirty days notice through the newspapers, and in writing to the President of each Board, of any intended increase of the number of shares, either direct or through an issue of Convertible Bonds, and shall not, at the same time, give notice of the object for which such issue of stock or Bonds is about to be made. * * *"

The resolution also called for the appointment of a committee authorized to request those companies whose securities were already traded in upon the exchange to appoint such a registrar. In January of the following year the Stock Exchange adopted a law requiring all companies to register their shares with a satisfactory agency. Erie refused to comply and was dropped from the trading list. The National Stock Exchange or "Erie Board" which was then established lasted until September at which time Erie registered its stock and was relisted by the Stock Exchange. See Schultz, The Securities Market and How It Works (1942) p. 11.

The substance of the resolution has appeared in different places in the revisions of the Constitution of the Stock Exchange (Constitution of 1892, Art. XX; Constitution of 1902, Art. XXXIII). It remained a part of the rules of the governing committee until 1923 and is now incorporated in the requirements of the Department of Stock List.

16 Instructions as to Transfer and Registration of Stock, N. Y. Stock Exchange, Department of Stock List, 12 Sept. 1939. For similar requirements on other exchanges see Behrends and Elliott. Responsibilities and Liabilities of the Transfer Agent and Registrar, 4 So.Cal.L.Rev. 203 (1931).

17 See Christy, sec. 280. For example, The Chase National Bank, when acting as registrar, follows the customary procedure of communicating with the transfer agent as soon as it finds that any number in the sequence of certificates submitted for registration has been skipped.

maximum issue authorized, and on the basis of the Certificate of Incorporation, the By-laws and other documents provided by the corporation principal sets up control books so that it may make certain that no stock is issued in excess of this amount.[18] The registrar makes no record of the names of stockholders. It completes its task by signing the new certificates and returning them with the cancelled old certificates to the transfer agent for delivery.[19]

While the responsibility of the bank when acting as registrar is very heavy, its duties are largely mechanical. This description does not apply to the duties of the transfer agent, however. Since title passes as between the transferor and transferee by assignment and delivery of the certificate, it might be supposed that the duty of the transfer agent would be largely ministerial and would extend only to verifying the proper execution of the assignment and duly entering the transfer upon the stockholders' accounts. Unfortunately, this is not the case. The transfer agent must make certain not only that the assignment has been validly executed but, in many cases, that the assignor has the capacity to make the transfer[20] and the assignee the power to hold the stock. This is the duty the professional transfer agent assumes to perform for the corporation.

The obligation of a corporation to consider the propriety of a transfer of its stock stems, according to Christy, from a doctrine established by Taney[21] which marked the course the American law of stock transfer was to follow. Aside from describing the function of the corporation in stock transfer as an exercise of a trust duty, the court placed upon it the duty of taking notice of beneficial as well as legal interests in its stock. Although it is a mere intermediary in a transaction between others, the corporation was made to satisfy the same requirement of investigation that is placed upon those who deal at a profit with a trustee.[22]

Thus, today, the corporation with any knowledge of a limitation upon the power of the legal holder will be liable in conversion or for damages for making a transfer where the assignor has exceeded his authority.[23] This liability is based upon the theory of participation

---

18 Where a corporation has two or more transfer agents and registrars and stock may be issued and registered at more than one location, it is necessary for the co-registrars to inform one another by daily advices of the registration of new issues and so to keep a continuous check for agreement between their separate control books.

19 A description of the procedure followed can be found in Christy, sec. 284. The members of the New York clearing house make use of its facilities for the delivery of certificates between transfer agent and registrar.

20 Behrends and Elliott, note 16, supra, p. 209. See Kentucky Utilities Co. v. Skeggs, 293 Ky. 622, 169 S.W.2d 809 (1943).

21 Lowry v. Commercial & Farmers Bank, Fed.Cas.No.8,581 at p. 1047 (1848).

22 Christy, sec. 2.

23 King v. Richardson, 136 F.2d 849 (C.C.A.4th, 1943) (Corporation liable for permitting a transfer from a testamentary trust); Aronson v. Bank of America N. T. & S. A., 42 Cal.App.2d 710, 109 P.2d 1001 (1941) (Corporation a converter where transferor was known to be an agent and had limited authority); First Nat. Bank v. Pittsburg, F. W. & C. Ry. Co., 31 F.Supp. 381 (D.C.E.D., Pa.1939) (Stock in name of trustee as such transferred by corporation at its peril); Seymour v. Nat. Biscuit Co., 107 F.2d 58, certiorari denied 309 U.S. 665, 60 S.Ct. 590 (1939) (Corporation liable to remainder-man for effecting transfer from life tenant to broker); West v. American Tel. & Tel., 121 F.2d 142 (C.C.A.6th, 1941) conform-in a breach of trust.[24] It follows that the transfer agent must require that an assignment by a trustee be supported by a copy of the trust instrument or court order,[25] and that an assignment to or by an executor or an administrator be accompanied by a copy of the will or probate order.[26] The transfer agent must be familiar with the laws of descent and distribution and those governing the powers of executors and administrators in every jurisdiction.

A Uniform Fiduciaries Act has been adopted in some eighteen states[27] with the purpose of exempting corporations from liability where transfers are made in breach of trust unless actual notice of the breach exists. Its aim is to relieve the company of the necessity for making inquiry. However, the act applies only to securities issued after its passage and, generally, does not cover the situation in which the certificate is actually held in the name of someone other than the fiduciary. It falls far short of the English law which relieves the corporation of the duty of taking notice of the trust itself. Furthermore, whatever its value, its limited adoption, like that of the Uniform Stock Transfer Act, leaves the transfer agent with a considerable problem in the conflict of laws.[28]

It would seem that the corporation might avoid liability by refusing to make a questionable transfer. But in Gillies v. Robert E. Lee Mining Co.[29] the corporation, which refused transfer unless the transferee would submit affidavits other than her own, showing that the transferor was alive (as required by statute), was held responsible for conversion of the stock. And, again, in London P. & A. Bank v. Aaronstein[30] although the court agreed with the company that the plaintiff (an executrix) was not the owner of the stock, it was held that transfer was necessary to the administration of the estate and that the company was a converter in denying a transfer to her. So, ing to mandate, 311 U.S. 223, 61 S.Ct. 179, 85 L.Ed. 139, 132 A.L.R. 956 (1941) (Corporation required to protect remainderman after issuing certificate to life tenant without showing limitation). [See Kentucky Utilities Co. v. Skaggs, 293 Ky. 622, 169 S.W.2d 809 (1943) in which it was held that the corporation properly refused transfer when request gave evidence of mental incompetence.]

---

24 Scott, Participation in a Breach of Trust, 34 Harv.L.Rev. 454 (1939); Corporate Liability for Registration of Unauthorized Fiduciary Transfers of Stock, 48 Yale L.J. 92 (1938); Liability of a Corporation for Registering an Unauthorized Transfer of Shares Standing in the Name of a Fiduciary, 86 U. of Pa.L.Rev. 653; Christy, Chap. XXI. Christy distinguishes such transfers from those in which the assignment is unauthorized by the legal holder. The latter class of transfers is analogous to that in which the indorsement is forged. An altered or forged assignment passes no title to the assignee. (Nat. Surety Co. v. Indemnity Ins. Co. of North America, 237 App.Div. 485, 261 N.Y.S. 605 (1st Dept. 1933), but a corporation which issues a new certificate on cancellation of the old will probably have to recognize or compensate both the original holder and any bona fide purchaser of the new certificate. Christy, secs. 242, 243.

25 Christy, Chap. XI.

26 Christy, Chap. IX; Escat v. Leaman, 181 So. 621 (La.App.1938). Where no probate is required, the transfer agent may demand affidavits and an indemnity bond by the transferee.

27 Christy, Chap. XVII. New York Gen.Bus.Law, secs. 359-j and 359-k.

28 Anno: Conflict of laws as to title and transfer of stock, 131 A.L.R. 192 (1941).

29 78 Mont. 402, 254 P. 422 (1927).

30 54 C.C.A. 663, 117 F. 601 (1902), certiorari denied 187 U.S. 641, 23 S.Ct. 841, 47 L.Ed. 345.

it is apparent that the transfer agent must weigh carefully the conflicting claims to stock, for refusal to transfer may prove as costly an error as a wrongful transfer.[31] Usually, where the owner of a certificate which is indorsed in blank reports it lost or stolen, the transfer agent will require an indemnity bond before it will place a stop against its subsequent transfer.[32] This procedure clearly is proper where the Uniform Stock Transfer Act applies.[33] But the corporation will be liable for cancelling a certificate on which the assignment is forged or unauthorized.[34] And it will not be relieved of this liability by reason of its having relied upon the signature guarantee which it requires on all assignments.[35]

It is apparent that the professional transfer agent is assuming a heavy burden in contracting to perform this operation for the corporation in compliance with the law. Certainly it would be liable for failure to exercise reasonable care in the discharge of this duty.[36] It also will have direct responsibility for seeing that the various stock transfer taxes are paid and that inheritance tax waivers are secured.[37] Whether or not it is responsible to the individual stockholder for negligence in transfer, however, is another matter. Except for susceptibility to proceedings in equity to compel transfer it has been said that the transfer agent cannot be held liable to the stockholder for refusal to transfer—for mere nonfeasance.[38] However, an action may 31 See Dewey, The Transfer Agent's Dilemma: Conflicting Claims to Shares of Stock, 52 Harv.L.Rev. 553 (1939); Christy, Chap. XXII; Anno: Refusal of Corporation to issue, convert or transfer stock as conversion, 54 A.L.R. 1157 (1928); Anno: Right or duty to refuse to transfer stock on books to one presenting properly indorsed certificate, because of knowledge or suspicion of conflicting rights, 139 A.L.R. 273 (1942).

32 In Van Schaick v. National City Bank of N. Y., 245 App.Div. 525, 283 N.Y.S. 372 (1st Dept. 1935), the transfer agent was held not liable for failure to stop transfer of certificate which had been stolen and which was presented to it by a bona fide purchaser after it had received notice of the loss. The customary procedure of The Chase National Bank on receiving notice of loss is to send the loser a form letter which includes the remark, "Unless within a reasonable time after we send such notification (of receipt of the lost certificate for transfer) we are furnished with a bond of indemnity issued by an approved surety company indemnifying us and the Corporation against any loss occasioned by our refusal to make the transfer, or unless we are served with a certified copy of a restraining order of a court of competent jurisdiction, we may be obliged to complete the transfer."

33 See Nicholson v. Morgan, 119 Misc. 309, 196 N.Y.S. 147 (Munic.Ct., New York City, 1922) citing the Uniform Stock Transfer Act, N.Y.Pers.Prop.Law, secs. 162–185.

34 Mohr v. J. C. Penney Co., Inc., 242 App.Div. 385, 275 N.Y.S. 50 (1934). See note 24, supra. Hill v. American Telephone & Telegraph Co., 37 N.Y.S.2d 957 (Sup. Ct. 1942).

35 Donaghue v. DiGiorgio Fruit Corp., 225 App.Div. 81, 232 N.Y.S. 178 (1928).

36 Cf. Behrends & Elliott, note 16, supra, at page 214. It has been suggested that its very profession of special competence would require the transfer agent to meet a very high standard of care. Customarily, professional agents are extremely cautious in the making of transfers. The bank will exhaust its own investigative facilities on each questionable assignment. If then still uncertain of the propriety of the assignment, before risking either wrongful transfer or final refusal, it will submit the question to its principal for decision.

37 Christy, sec. 281. See 1911 Op.Atty.Gen. (N.Y.) 227 and 1910 Op.Atty.Gen. (N.Y.) 489 as cited in notes under McKinney, N.Y.Tax Law, secs. 270, 272. Further, the transfer agent who keeps the stockholders books may be required by state law to keep them open for inspection. N.Y.Stock Corp.Law, sec. 113, provides a penalty of $50.00 for each day the transfer agent neglects or refuses to keep the books available for the required three hours.

38 Christy, sec. 281. Palmer v. O'Bannon Corp. and Merchants Nat. Bank, 253 be brought, apparently, by a member of the public against the transfer agent for the fraud of its employee,[39] and an assignee of a corporation has recovered losses suffered by reason of the transfer agent's wrongful delay in making delivery of certificates which had been held under an escrow agreement for the corporation.[40]

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW.[41]

§ 65. Form of stock certificates. The stock of every stock corporation shall be represented by certificates signed by the president or a vice-president and the secretary or an assistant secretary or the treasurer or an assistant treasurer, and sealed with the seal of the corporation. Such seal may be a facsimile, engraved or printed. Where any such certificate is signed by a transfer agent or transfer clerk and by a registrar, the signatures of any such president, vice-president, secretary, assistant secretary, treasurer or assistant treasurer upon such certificate may be facsimiles, engraved or printed. In case any such officer who has signed or whose facsimile signature has been placed upon such certificate shall have ceased to be such before such certificate is issued, it may be issued by the corporation with the same effect as if such officer had not ceased to be such at the date of its issue. Such stock shall be transferable in the manner prescribed in this chapter and in the by-laws. No share shall be transferable until all previous calls thereon shall have been fully paid in.

Every certificate of stock issued by any corporation organized after September thirtieth, nineteen hundred and twenty-three, which is authorized to issue shares of more than one class shall state upon the face or back thereof all of the designations, preferences, privileges and voting powers of the shares of each class which the corporation is authorized to issue, and the restrictions or qualifications thereof, and, if the corporation is authorized to issue in series any class of stock which is preferred as to dividends or assets, the designations, preferences, privileges and voting powers of the shares of each series of such class then authorized and the restrictions or qualifica-

---

Mass. 8, 149 N.E. 112 (1925) ("* * * if the bank declined to register the stock in the pledgee's name, the mere declination would not be an act of misfeasance as between itself and the pledgee. It would be at most a neglect of duty for which the corporation alone was responsible." p. 17.); Dunham v. City Trust Co. of New York, 115 App.Div. 584, 101 N.Y.S. 87 (2d Dept. 1906) affirmed without opinion 193 N.Y. 642, 86 N.E. 1123 (1908) (Refusal to transfer does not render the transfer agent liable although the corporation would be); Nicholson v. Morgan, note 24, supra (The stock transfer agent owes no affirmative duty to a stockholder. * * * p. 314.)

39 See Citizens & Southern Nat. Bank v. Trust Co. of Georgia and Coca Cola Co., 50 Ga.App. 681, 179 S.E. 278 (1935). Both the transfer agent and the corporation were relieved of liability for this fraud in which the employee forged the signature of the registrar. The certificate bore on its face the usual legend to the effect that it would be valid only when countersigned by the registrar. And see Van Schaick v. Nat. City Bank, note 32, supra: in which the transfer agent was relieved because the purchaser had title and not because the transfer agent owed the stockholder no duty.

40 Bertram v. Exchange Trust Co., 4 F.Supp. 392 (D.C.Mass. 1933).

41 The Uniform Stock Transfer Act is in effect in New York: Personal Property Law, art. 6, §§ 162–185.

tions thereof, and the powers of the board of directors in respect to the issuance of subsequent series of the same class.

Every certificate of stock issued by any corporation organized after September thirtieth, nineteen hundred and twenty-three, shall plainly state upon the face thereof the number, kind and class of shares, including series, if any, which it represents.

Every certificate of stock issued by any corporation organized before September thirtieth, nineteen hundred and twenty-three, whose certificate of incorporation is thereafter amended to authorize the issuance from time to time in series of any class of its stock which is preferred as to dividends or assets, shall plainly state on the face or back thereof the designations, preferences, privileges and voting powers of the shares of each series of such class then authorized, and the restrictions or qualifications thereof, and the powers of the board of directors in respect to the issuance of subsequent series of the same class.

§ 66. Transfer of stock by stockholder indebted to corporation. If a stockholder shall be indebted to the corporation, the directors may refuse to consent to a transfer of his stock until such indebtedness is paid, provided a copy of this section or the substance thereof is written or printed upon the certificate of stock.

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW.

Sec. 15. Certificates of Shares:—Every holder of stock in a corporation shall be entitled to have a certificate, signed by, or in the name of the corporation by, the President or a Vice-President and the Treasurer or an Assistant Treasurer, or the Secretary or an Assistant Secretary of such corporation, certifying the number of shares owned by him in such corporation; provided, however, that, where such certificate is signed (1) by a transfer agent or an assistant transfer agent or (2) by a transfer clerk acting on behalf of such corporation and a registrar, the signature of any such President, Vice-President, Treasurer, Assistant Treasurer, Secretary or Assistant Secretary may be facsimile. In case any officer or officers who shall have signed, or whose facsimile signature or signatures shall have been used on, any such certificate or certificates shall cease to be such officer or officers of such corporation, whether because of death, resignation or otherwise, before such certificate or certificates shall have been delivered by such corporation, such certificate or certificates may nevertheless be adopted by such corporation and be issued and delivered as though the person or persons who signed such certificate or certificates or whose facsimile signature or signatures shall have been used thereon had not ceased to be such officer or officers of such corporation.

Sec. 16. Stock, Personal Property; How Transferred; When Not Taxed:—The shares of stock in every corporation shall be deemed personal property and transferable as hereinafter provided, provided, however, that no stock or bonds issued by any corporation organized under this Chapter shall be taxed by this State when the same shall be owned by non-residents of this State, or by foreign corporations. Whenever any transfer of shares shall be made for collateral security, and not absolutely, it shall be so expressed in the entry of the transfer.

Sec. 16A. How Title to Certificates and Shares May Be Transferred:—Title to a certificate and to the shares represented thereby can be transferred only,

(a) By delivery of the certificate indorsed either in blank or to a specified person by the person appearing by the certificate to be the owner of the shares represented thereby or

(b) By delivery of the certificate and a separate document containing a written assignment of the certificate or a power of attorney to sell, assign, or transfer the same or the shares represented thereby, signed by the person appearing by the certificate to be the owner of the shares represented thereby. Such assignment or power of attorney may be either in blank or to a specific person.

The provisions of this section shall be applicable although the charter or articles of incorporation or code of regulations or by-laws of the corporation issuing the certificate and the certificate itself, provide that the shares represented thereby shall be transferable only on the books of the corporation or shall be registered by a registrar or transferred by a transfer agent.

Sec. 16C. Corporation Not Forbidden to Treat Registered Holder as Owner:—Nothing in Sec. 16A to Sec. 16X, both inclusive, shall be construed as forbidding a corporation,

(a) To recognize the exclusive right of a person registered on its books as the owner of shares to receive dividends, and to vote as such owner, or

(b) To hold liable for calls and assessments a person registered on its books as the owner of shares.

Sec. 16D. Title Derived from Certificate Extinguishes Title Derived from a Separate Document:—The title of a transferee of a certificate under a power of attorney or assignment not written upon the certificate, and the title of any person claiming under such transferee, shall cease and determine if, at any time prior to the surrender of the certificate to the corporation issuing it, another person, for value in good faith, and without notice of the prior transfer, shall purchase and obtain delivery of such certificate with the indorsement of the person appearing by the certificate to be the owner thereof, or shall purchase and obtain delivery of such certificate and the written assignment or power of attorney of such person, though contained in a separate document.

Sec. 16E. Who May Deliver a Certificate:—The delivery of a certificate to transfer title in accordance with the provisions of Sec. 16A is effectual, except as provided in Sec. 16G, though made by one having no right of possession and having no authority from the owner of the certificate or from the person purporting to transfer the title.

Sec. 16T. Definition of Indorsement:—A certificate is indorsed when an assignment or a power of attorney to sell, assign, or transfer the certificate or the shares represented thereby is written on the certificate and signed by the person appearing by the certificate to be the owner of the shares represented thereby, or when the signature of such person is written without more upon the back of the certificate. In any of such cases a certificate is indorsed though it has not been delivered.

Sec. 16U. Definition of Person Appearing to Be the Owner of Certificate:—The person to whom a certificate was originally issued is the person appearing by the certificate to be the owner thereof, and of the shares represented thereby, until and unless he indorses the certificate to another specified person, and thereupon such other specified person is the person appearing by the certificate to be the owner thereof until and unless he also indorses the certificate to another specified person. Subsequent special indorsements may be made with like effect. * * *

KNIGHT v. SHUTZ et al.

Supreme Court of Ohio, 1943. 141 Ohio St. 267, 47 N.E.2d 886.

Action by Paul L. Knight, as executor of the Estate of George F. Knight, deceased, against Margaret C. Shutz and others to enjoin certain corporations from transferring certain shares of stock allegedly obtained by named defendant from the decedent through duress and fraud and from paying dividends to named defendant, and to compel corporations to issue in the name of the executor certificates of stock in lieu of those held by named defendant. From a judgment granting an injunction but finding that court was without authority to compel corporations to transfer stock to plaintiff and pay dividends to him, plaintiff appealed to the Court of Appeals which affirmed trial court's judgment, and the cause is brought to the Supreme Court following allowance of a motion to certify the record.—[Editorial Statement.]

Judgment affirmed.

The Court of Common Pleas of Stark county in cause No. 71087 found that Margaret C. Shutz obtained the assignment and delivery of certain stock certificates by duress and fraud upon one George F. Knight, who had since died. She was ordered to assign and deliver such stock certificates to Paul L. Knight, as executor of the estate of George F. Knight, deceased, and was enjoined from transferring or assigning them or any part thereof to any other person whomsoever.

Upon the failure of Mrs. Shutz to comply with the order of the court she was found guilty of contempt and was imprisoned pending performance. The court also appointed a receiver to take possession of the property and assets and Mrs. Shutz. The receiver was unable to obtain possession of the certificates.

Without surrendering the certificates, Mrs. Shutz was, according to the statements of counsel, released from jail and thereafter sold and delivered one of the certificates in question in the open market.

Mrs. Shutz was again committed to jail and later released without having complied with the order of the court to surrender the certificates.

Thereupon the instant action was brought in the Court of Common Pleas of Stark county by Paul L. Knight as executor of the estate of George F. Knight, deceased, against the several corporations which had issued the certificates which Mrs. Shutz had refused to surrender, to enjoin such corporations and their transfer agents from transferring the shares to any other person and from paying to Margaret C. Shutz any dividends on such stock. It was further sought to compel each of the corporations and their transfer agents to issue in the name of Paul L. Knight, as executor, certificates of stock in lieu of the certificates held by Mrs. Shutz.

After hearing, the trial court entered its decree enjoining the corporations and their transfer agents from assigning and transferring upon their corporate books and records the shares of stock in question and from paying any dividends thereon to Margaret C. Shutz. The court, however, found that it was without authority to issue an order or decree compelling the defendant corporations to transfer upon their books and records such shares of stock to plaintiff or to order such corporations to pay the dividends to plaintiff. The journal entry of the trial court's decree contains the following: "It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that the defendants and each of them are hereby enjoined from transferring upon the books and records of said defendants any of said stock or any part thereof to any other person, firm or corporation, and from paying the dividends accrued thereon or accruing hereafter to any such person, firm or corporation, and the prayer of plaintiff's petition to compel the said defendants to transfer said stocks and shares upon their records, and to pay the plaintiff the dividends accrued thereon and accruing hereafter is hereby denied."

The cause is here following the allowance of a motion to certify the record.

TURNER, JUDGE. The questions presented are whether it was error for the Court of Common Pleas to refuse to order the appellee corporations and their registrars and transfer agents, (1) to transfer the shares of stock in question to appellant, (2) to issue him new certificates therefor, or (3) to pay him the accrued dividends thereon. If the trial court did not so err then the judgment of the Court of Appeals affirming the decree of the trial court should be affirmed.

We shall resist the temptation which this case holds to delve into the extensive bibliography on the subjects of transfer and issuance of corporate shares and stock certificates and the rights to dividends being content to call attention to the fact that some confusion exists by reason of the failure to observe the line of demarcation between those certificates of stock, the transfer of which is governed by the Uniform Stock Transfer Act, and shares of stock, the transfer of which is not subject to the act. As the act is not effective in all states, and not applicable to all certificates in states where effective, text and decided cases must be examined to determine whether the case arose under or independently of the act.

Whether the Uniform Stock Transfer Act is, as claimed by some, a mere codification of the prior law or whether it is a code of new law need not disturb us—certain it is that in Ohio the transfers of certificates of corporate stock subject to the act are governed by the act and such statutory enactments are to be read in the same way and interpreted and construed when necessary in the same manner as other statutory enactments. * * *

Under the Uniform Stock Transfer Act, a stock certificate has become something more than mere evidence of title. The title to the certificate and the shares represented thereby can be transferred only by delivery of the certificate duly endorsed or accompanied by a written assignment or power of attorney to assign. Sections 8673-1 and 8673-10, General Code.

Neither attachment nor levy may now be made unless the outstanding certificate be actually seized, or the transfer enjoined. Section 8673-13 and 8673-14, General Code.

While some authorities admit only "quasi-negotiability", [citing cases] * * * the weight of authority holds that Section 5 of the act, Section 8673-5, General Code, gives full negotiability to the certificates of stock covered by the act. * * *

The record in this case fails to disclose that any of the certificates have been lost or destroyed. On the contrary it is agreed among counsel that the certificates are still in existence. Therefore, recourse may not be had to the provisions of Section 8673-17, General Code, which provides that upon satisfactory proof of loss or destruction and upon giving bond the court may order the issuance of a new certificate. See, also, Section 8623-30a, General Code. Attention is called to the following provision of Section 8673-17, General Code: "The issue of a new certificate under an order of the court as provided in this section, shall not relieve the corporation from liability in damages to a person to whom the original certificate has been or shall be transferred for value without notice of the proceedings or of the issuance of the new certificate." See, also, Sections 8623-30a and 8623-12, General Code.

Section 8673-13, General Code, contains the following provision: "* * * Except where a certificate is lost or destroyed, such corporation shall not be compelled to issue a new certificate for the stock until the old certificate is surrendered to it."

Notwithstanding this clear language of Section 8673-13, General Code, appellant seems to assume that in case of an attachment or levy where the certificate has not been surrendered to the corporation but the transfer by the holder has been enjoined, the corporation must issue a new certificate, which, of course, is contrary to the provision of the statute. The case of Elgart v. Mintz, 123 N.J.Eq. 404, 197 A. 747, cited by appellant, does not so hold. See Luks v. Luks, 106 N.J.Eq. 160, 150 A. 346.

Counsel for appellant make the following statement: "Counsel for the appellant herein wishes to state to the court that at the commencement of this brief that neither counsel for plaintiff nor any of the various counsels for the defendants herein have been able to find a case in the United States directly in point nor any case assuming to decide the question in issue." We might add that our independent search has likewise failed.

As stated in the syllabus in Peckinpaugh v. Noble & Co., supra: "12. The uniform stock transfer act * * * is all inclusive and admits of no exception, even including theft or felonious taking from the owner, in protecting the rights of a good-faith purchaser of stock indorsed in blank by the owner." However, some other courts do not agree as to theft. As to theft, see Section 8623-30a, General Code, and 12 Fletcher, Cyclopedia Corporations, 466.

The test of the correctness of the decree below depends upon whether any relief may be afforded appellant under Section 8673-18, General Code, which provides: "In any case not provided for by this act, the rules of law and equity, including the law merchant, and in particular the rules relating to the law of principal and agent, executors, administrators and trustees, and to the effect of fraud, misrepresentation, duress or coercion, mistake, bankruptcy or other invalidating cause, shall govern."

Our inquiry then must be directed to the various provisions of the act to determine whether relief in the instant case is provided for by the act. Attention has been called to the provision of Section 8673-1, General Code, to the effect that title to a certificate and the shares represented thereby can be transferred only by delivery of the certificate.

Section 8673-7, General Code, provides:

"If the indorsement or delivery of a certificate,

"(a) Was procured by fraud or duress, or

"(b) Was made under such mistake as to make the indorsement or delivery inequitable; or

"If the delivery of a certificate was made

"(c) Without authority from the owner, or

"(d) After the owner's death or legal incapacity, the possession of the certificate may be reclaimed and the transfer thereof rescinded, unless:

"(1) The certificate has been transferred to a purchaser for value in good faith without notice of any facts making the transfer wrongful, or

"(2) The injured person has elected to waive the injury, or has been guilty of laches in endeavoring to enforce his rights.

"Any court of appropriate jurisdiction may enforce specifically such right to reclaim the possession of the certificate or to rescind the transfer thereof and, pending litigation, may enjoin the further transfer of the certificate or impound it."

Unless we are willing, which we are not, to acknowledge the futility of the processes of court, the foregoing section provides full and complete relief to appellant which appellant may secure in case No. 71087 in the Court of Common Pleas of Stark county wherein Margaret C. Shutz was found not only to possess the certificates in question but to have obtained them by fraud and duress. The fact that the trial court in case No. 71087 released Mrs. Shutz from confinement without compliance with the orders of the court is not a sufficient foundation for the instant case. She may still be compelled to surrender the certificates.

In addition to the provisions of the Uniform Stock Transfer Act, the contract relationship between appellee corporations and their stockholders require the surrender of the certificates before transfer is made.

Section 8623-12, General Code, provides that a corporation may adopt a code of regulations. * * *

In Section 8623-31, General Code, is the following provision:

"* * * No restriction of the right to transfer shares and no reservation of lien thereon shall be effective against a transferee of such shares unless stated on the certificate.

"Certificates for shares and the shares represented thereby shall be transferable on the books of the corporation in such manner as the articles or regulations may provide, not inconsistent with the uniform stock transfer act [Section 8673-1 et seq., General Code] or other statutory provisions existing at the time of transfer." (Italics ours.)

Section 8623-32, General Code, authorizes a corporation to appoint transfer agents and registrars whose duties and liabilities are to be fixed by contract. The several transfer agents and registrars were made defendants below and are here as appellees.

Appellee Eaton Manufacturing Company's exhibit (defendant's exhibit No. 2) contains the resolution appointing appellee the Cleveland Trust Company as transfer agent. Such transfer agent is authorized "to make transfers * * * of certificates for * * * shares * * * now or presently to be outstanding as may be surrendered for transfer properly endorsed" and "Seventh" that "the registrars be and they are hereby authorized and directed to register transfers from time to time of certificates for such capital stock, upon the cancellation of certificates for a like amount of shares of the same class. * * *"

Likewise, the regulations of appellee the Republic Stamping & Enameling Company require "surrender of the duly endorsed certificate or certificates" before transfer.

Printed upon each of the certificates is the following: "Transferable only upon the books of the company by the owner in person or by attorney, upon surrender of this certificate properly assigned." This applies also to the certificates of the appellee Harbauer Company.

Appellant is as much bound by the regulations of the several corporations as was his father through whom he claims. Therefore, if it were to be held that the instant case is one not provided for within the purview of Section 8673-18, General Code, under the rules of law as to contract and of equity and law as to estoppel, appellant would be entitled to no relief in the instant case. * * *

Turning briefly to cases where the Uniform Stock Transfer Act was not involved:

There have been cases in which a court of equity, having all parties before it, has entered a decree which operated upon the title of stock and transferred it to a third person while the certificate was outstanding. Yet no such case, insofar as we have been able to find, has been decided where the Uniform Stock Transfer Act was applicable.

Even in cases where the act did not apply and where a court of equity has ordered such transfer, under the weight of authority the corporation still remains liable to an innocent holder of the outstanding certificate. As stated in 6 Thompson on Corporations, 3d Ed., 298, § 4423: "It seems that a transfer made under a decree of court will not conclude or otherwise affect the rights of a subsequent innocent purchaser where the outstanding certificate was not surrendered; and it has been held that he is not affected by the doctrine of lis pendens."

12 Fletcher, Cyclopedia Corporations, 457, § 5540, contains the following headnote: "If a corporation transfers and issues a new certificate without requiring the production of the outstanding certificate, it becomes liable to a holder in good faith of the outstanding certificate."

In the course of the section (5540, ibid) at page 460 it is said: "The fact that the corporation requires an indemnity bond before it will reissue the stock in no way affects the rights of the holder of the original certificate. Nor does it in any way relieve the corporation from the consequences of its fraudulent act, but is rather a confession that it is violating its obligation not to transfer the stock except on surrender of the certificate." See, also, 2 Cook Corporations, 8th Ed., 1327, § 361.

In the case of Joslyn v. St. Paul Distilling Co., 44 Minn. 183, 46 N.W. 337, decided prior to the enactment of the Uniform Stock Transfer Act, appears the following syllabus: "A stock certificate issued by a corporation having power so to issue, in which it is stated that a designated person is the owner of a certain number of shares of stock transferable only on the books of the association, on the indorsement and surrender of the certificate itself, is a continuing affirmation as to the ownership of the stock, and that the corporation will not transfer the stock upon its books unless the certificate is first surrendered. Such a certificate is an assurance to the commercial world that the shares of stock are the property of the person designated, and that he has the power and right to transfer and sell the stock, until this power and right has been lawfully terminated." See, also, 12 Fletcher, Cyclopedia Corporations, 446, § 5537; 61 A.L.R. 436 note; Keller v. Eureka Brick Mach. Mfg. Co., 43 Mo. App. 84, 11 L.R.A. 472.

While Fletcher at the end of Section 5537, ibid, says: "Of course, if the transferee agrees to indemnify the company against the event of the original certificate turning up in the hands of a bona fide purchaser, it may be compelled to make the transfer," the author is not here considering any provision of the Uniform Stock Transfer Act. Besides the only authority cited for the statement is the case of Wilson v. Atlantic & St. L. Rd. Co., 2 F. 459, decided by a district court in 1880, long prior to the enactment by any state of the Uniform Stock Transfer Act. That case involved the demand by a trustee in bankruptcy followed by the tendering of a bond of sufficient indemnity.

An instructive case in this connection, and one in which the court did not find it necessary to come to a conclusion upon the question whether the Uniform Stock Transfer Act did or did not govern the decision, is Parkhurst et al., Ex'rs. v. Almy, 222 Mass. 27, 109 N.E. 733, 734. In that case it was sought to compel a corporation to issue certificates of corporate stock in lieu of the certificates theretofore issued in the name of a debtor prior to the passage of the Uniform Stock Transfer Act. It was suggested that the creditor in that case might procure an equal number of shares and hypothecate them for the protection of the corporation and the possible purchaser of the debtor's certificates. In the course of the opinion it was said:

"A corporation has no right to make an overissue of its capital stock, and a court has no power to give it a right to do so. A decree in the form set forth in the report seems to undertake to proceed upon that basis [that it has such a right] in providing that upon the issue of certificates to a special master in lieu of the certificates now standing in the name of William F. Almy 'such corporations shall be discharged and released from all liability by reason of the outstanding certificates in the name of said William F. Almy,' provided the plaintiffs give to each of the corporations a bond 'conditioned to hold such corporations harmless from all claims of any person or corporation establishing by and through the outstanding certificates in the name of William F. Almy a title legally and equitably paramount to the title obtained by the purchaser of the certificates sold by the special master hereunder.'

"If it were established that Almy was now the owner of the shares which stand on the books of the corporation in his name, and also that no one could become entitled to them hereafter, there would be no objection to the clause in the decree which provides that upon the issue of certificates to the special master in lieu of the certificates now outstanding in the name of William F. Almy, 'such corporations shall be discharged and released from all liability by reason of the outstanding certificates in the name of said William F. Almy.' But neither one of these two propositions is established. If the certificates for these shares have been transferred already to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice the title to the shares is in the transferee of these certificates. Athol Savings Bank v. Bennett, 203 Mass. 480, 89 N.E. 632; Clews v. Friedman, 182 Mass. 555, 66 N.E. 201. Even if the title to these shares is now in Almy it would pass from him if certificates for these shares are hereafter transferred by him to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. Athol Savings Bank v. Bennett and Clews v. Friedman, supra.

"As we construe the decree it (in effect) takes away these shares from the true owners of them (in case the certificates for them already have been or shall be hereafter transferred by Almy to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice) and it substitutes for the shares rights of action against the corporations. But that is something which the court has no power to do. A court has no power to take away from the owner his property in shares in the capital stock of a corporation and substitute for that property a right of action against the corporation. It has no more power to take away shares belonging to a bona fide purchaser of Almy's certificates on substituting therefor a right of action against the corporation (even although the right of action is made good by a bond with sufficient sureties) than it has to take away from the owner of them his property in other shares in the capital stock of a corporation."

As counsel for appellant frankly admit that they have been unable to find any case directly in point, it will be unnecessary to discuss all of the cases cited in their brief. * * *

The case of Columbia Brewing Co. v. Miller, 5 Cir., 281 F. 289, arose under the Trading with the Enemy Act of November 4, 1918, requiring corporations under prescribed conditions to cancel outstanding shares of stock and in lieu thereof to issue certificates to the alien property custodian. However, it was also said in that case that: "* * * but such transfer does not deprive any nonenemy claimant of vested rights, which may be established by proceeding under section 9 of the act, as amended [50 U.S.C.A.Appendix § 9]."

Appellant's quotation from 6 Thompson Corporations, 298, to the effect that: "* * * a court of equity, having all proper parties before it, may enter a decree that will operate upon the title of the stock and transfer it to a third person, while the certificate is outstanding" is preceded in the text by the words "On the other hand, it has been held that." This exception to the general rule stated earlier in the same section is based upon the case of Sprague v. Cocheco Mfg. Co., 22 Fed.Cas. page 960, No. 13,249, 10 Blatch. 173, decided by United States District Court in 1872. It is also cited by appellant. The decision involved a Massachusetts trusteeship of the stock of a Massachusetts corporation. The decision is not only contrary to the Uniform Stock Transfer Act but to the modern Massachusetts cases.

The question as to the right of appellant to dividends has not been argued, though assigned as error. The right to dividends follows the right to have the stock transferred. Sections 8623-33a and 8673-3, General Code.

We find no error in the judgment of the Court of Appeals and therefore such judgment should be and hereby is affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

PRICE OF ISSUE

THE RULE OF EQUITABLE CONTRIBUTION

Throughout the history of business corporation, an evil has steadily appeared, with which growing rules of law have had to cope. This is the attempt to secure shares of stock without making a contribution to the corporate assets, or by making a contribution less than that exacted from other shareholders. The holder of such "cheap" stock in effect gets a free ride at the expense of full paying subscribers.

In respect of stock having par value, the law attempted to prevent this by requiring that such stock, to be validly issued, must be paid for at par value, in money or moneys' worth. The sanction, or penalty, was that the recipient of stock who had not paid par value, might be required to pay the full amount, at the insistence of creditors if the corporation became insolvent, or possibly at the insistence of other shareholders.

But this rule could be evaded by either of two devices: issue of stock having a very low par value, but sold at a price above par. Many corporations are organized with the common stock having a par value of $1.00 per share, though the price to subscribers on original issue is many times the nominal par value. Thus, one group could purchase the stock at $1.00 per share while others paid considerably more. The other device was to issue stock without nominal or par value; and in respect of such stock no minimum or standard contribution is required. Yet in both cases, when stock is issued, the effect of permitting one subscriber to buy at a low price while another pays a high price, in effect enriches the low price buyer at the expense of the high price buyer.

To prevent this inequity, Judges early worked out (without help of the Statutes) a rule giving shareholders the right to buy new shares of stock of the corporation pro rata in proportion to their holdings. This was called "preemptive right" though in fact it was more in the nature of an automatic rule of thumb remedy.

Clearly this does not exhaust the power of a Court of Equity. There appears to be a policy requiring purchasers of stock on original issue to make an equitable contribution to the assets of the corporation, since all are to share in its earnings and assets. Sale of stock by the corporation to favor its purchasers at unduly low prices, working a wrong on other shareholders could, it would appear, be enjoined; or, in case such sale had been completed, the stock if still in the hands of a party to the transaction could be cancelled and the transaction rescinded. The various remedies thus are grouped about a single equitable principle which has been called "The Rule of Equitable Contribution".

(a) Par Value Stock.

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

§ 14. * * * Any corporation may issue the whole or any part of its shares as partly paid and subject to call for the remainder of the consideration to be paid therefor. Upon the face or back of the certificates issued to represent any such partly paid shares the total amount of the consideration to be paid therefor and the amount paid thereon shall be specified. The corporation may declare and pay dividends upon any such shares upon the basis of the percentage of the consideration actually paid thereon. * * *

WELTON v. SAFFERY.

House of Lords. [1897] A.C. 299.

The following statement of the facts is in substance taken from the judgment of Lord Davey.

The Railway Time Tables Publishing Company, Limited, was registered in January, 1886, under the Companies Acts as a company limited by shares. The memorandum of association contained the following clause:

"The capital of the company is £30,000 divided into 6,000 shares of £5 each, with power to increase the capital, and to issue any shares in the original or in any new capital as preferential, or guaranteed, or deferred shares." No articles were registered with the memorandum. The regulations adopted for the conduct of the affairs of the company were, therefore, in the first instance, those contained in Table A in the first schedule to the Companies Act 1862.

All the original shares (except the ten subscribed for in the memorandum) were issued to the vendor as fully paid up under a registered contract, and it was not disputed that they were rightly so issued. They were dealt with, and large numbers of them were in the hands of the general public.

By a special resolution passed and confirmed on May 25 and June 11, 1886, the capital was increased to £40,000 by the creation of 2,000 additional shares of £5 each. Of these shares 600 were issued and paid up in cash, 500 were issued as "bonus shares," and the remaining 900 were issued as "discount shares." By a second resolution passed and confirmed on the same dates, new articles of association were adopted in the place of Table A. The material articles, for the present purpose, are those Numbered 4, 41, 42 and 140.

4. "The shares shall be under the control of the directors, who may allot or otherwise dispose of the same to such persons on such terms and conditions, and at such times, as the directors think fit, and either at a discount, premium or otherwise."

41. "The company may from time to time increase the capital by the creation of new shares of such amount as may be deemed expedient."

42. "The new shares shall be issued upon such terms and conditions and with such rights and privileges annexed thereto as the directors shall determine, and in particular such shares may be issued with a preferential or qualified right to dividends, and in the distribution of the assets of the company, and with a special, or without any, right of voting."

140. "If the company shall be wound up and the surplus assets shall be insufficient to repay the whole of the paid-up capital, such surplus assets shall be distributed so that as nearly as may be the losses shall be borne by the members in proportion to the capital paid up, or which ought to have been paid up, on the shares held by them respectively at the commencement of the winding-up. But this clause is to be without prejudice to the rights of holders of shares issued upon special conditions."

The bonus shares were issued to subscribers for debentures in the company as fully paid up, without any consideration in money or money's worth except the subscription for debentures, two shares of £5 each being issued to each subscriber for a £10 debenture. The discount shares, after being offered to the existing shareholders at the price of £1 per £5 share, were issued to Mr. Henry Hoare, as fully paid up, in consideration of the payment of 10/- per share, or (in other words) at a discount of £4. 10. 0. per share.

The appellant was the holder of 215 bonus shares, which he acquired for a nominal consideration from Hoare. The appellant had been placed on the list of contributories for the whole of these 215 shares as wholly unpaid.

The appellant was also the holder of 4,460 discount shares which he also acquired from Hoare for a nominal consideration. The appellant had been placed on the list of contributories as the holder of 4,460 shares upon which £4. 10s. remained unpaid.

The appellant was also the holder of 1,680 preference shares. The allotment of these shares was part of the consideration for the extinction of a debt of £13,000 odd, due from the company to Hoare. By an order of June 14, 1893, these shares were held to be as to 1,112 fully paid, as to 567 wholly unpaid, and as to one paid to the extent of £2. 10s.

By an extraordinary resolution, dated March 25, 1892, it was resolved that the company be wound up voluntarily. By an order of April 13, 1892, the voluntary winding-up was continued subject to the supervision of the Court. The respondent was the liquidator of the company.

Calls were made in the winding-up for the payment of the debts of the company and the costs of winding up. No question now arose as to these. The respondent having taken out a summons for a final call upon the bonus, discount, and preference shares to enable the liquidator to adjust the rights of the contributories inter se, Kekewich, J. on August 7, 1894, held that the appellant was responsible for the amount remaining unpaid on his shares not only for the payment of the debts and costs of the winding up, but also for the adjustment of the rights of contributories inter se, and ordered accordingly.

This order was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. From these decisions the present appeal was brought. * * *

1897. April 8. LORD HALSBURY L. C. (after stating the facts): My Lords, in respect of the liability to pay up the shares so far as it is necessary to satisfy creditors and the cost of winding-up, I believe no doubt exists in the minds of any of your Lordships. Since the Ooregum Case (1892) A.C. 125, in this House it would be impossible to contend that that question is not covered by authority.

But it is said that, where the only object in making a call is to settle the rights of the shareholders inter se, the law laid down in the Ooregum Case does not conclude the question.

My Lords, I am unable to accede to that view. I think the Legislature, in permitting the existence of a company limited by shares and with limited liability, created a machinery which makes it impossible by any expedient, either by company or shareholder, to act otherwise than in pursuance of the provisions of the statute. Whether for the purpose of settling the rights inter se, or for the purpose of satisfying creditors, it appears to me that the statute enforces upon company and shareholder alike conformity to the rule laid down, that a share for a fixed amount shall make the person agreeing to take that share liable for that amount. I think that is the decision of the Ooregum Case, and though I am aware that a different view has been suggested where the question is not the payment of the debts of the company, but the settlement of the rights of the shareholders inter se, I am unable to see how this artificial creature, limited within its sphere of action by the statute under which it is created, can do anything contrary to the provisions of the statute. It is not a question for what purpose it is done. Dealing with it as I think it must be dealt with, as an artificial creation, it can only act as a company or as shareholder in either of those characters within the fetters created by the Act of Parliament.

It is said, and I think justly said, that people have been invited to take shares under an article of association which expressly provided that shares might be issued at a discount. It is, I think hard for persons who have relied upon that assurance to find out that the article which authorized the issue of the shares at a discount was ultra vires of the company, because it is in conflict with the memorandum of association which by the statute itself must determine the rights in that respect; but not the less on that account must one insist that the statute must be obeyed. If one were to suppose that the whole 6000 original shareholders or persons who became shareholders by purchase in the market were to have agreed that these shares would only be regarded as having 10/ - due upon them, each of them might perhaps against himself establish some contract by which the person agreeing with him in his individual capacity might have rights, but it would not be in his capacity as shareholder—it would be in his capacity as individual. The liquidator can only recognise shareholders, and their relation to the company of which they are shareholders must be regulated by the Act of Parliament.

The right to have a call made where it is necessary to adjust the rights between the different shareholders themselves appears to me not less imperative than if only the creditors were in question. The supposed bar to such a proceeding is the agreement not to ask more than 10/ - per share upon the discount shares; but the whole question goes back to the same point. If the Legislature has prohibited that, there is no such agreement. The directors have no power to make such an article. The company quâ company have no power to agree to such an article, and those who have taken shares and paid for them in pursuance of the Act of Parliament, I think, have a right to have the shares paid up which the Act of Parliament has enacted shall be liable to that payment.

In truth, though in form reserved by the discussion in the Ooregum Case, I think the Ooregum Case does decide the question now in debate, and whether they were bonus shares upon which nothing was paid, or discount shares upon which 10/ - only was paid, the holders of those shares are, in my judgment, liable to make good for any company purpose the amount of the money which, upon the face of the share, they undertake to pay.

My Lords, I confess it seems to me, however hardly it may operate upon individuals, to be a just and right thing that those who have completely discharged their statutory obligation should have a right to call upon the other shareholders to do as they have done and pay what is due upon the shares.

No question as to the preference shares is really in debate.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the order appealed from ought to be affirmed and this appeal dismissed with costs, and I move your Lordships accordingly. * * *

NOTE

"(In the case of) watered stock * * * the corporation not only issues the shares below par, but issues it under an agreement between itself and the subscribers that the stock shall be considered full paid. * * * Where stock is thus watered, two questions arise: First, is the corporation bound by its agreement to consider the stock full paid, or may it later denounce the agreement as void, and proceed to assess? Second, even if the corporation is held to have waived its claims, does such a waiver hold against creditors?" Bonbright, Shareholders' Defenses Against Liability to Creditors On Watered Stock, 1925, 25 Col. L.Rev. 408, 410. See, also, Cook, "Watered Stock"—Commissions—"Blue Sky Laws" —Stock Without Par Value, 1921, 19 Mich.L.Rev. 583.

SCOVILL v. THAYER.[43]

Supreme Court of the United States, 1881. 105 U.S. 143, 26 L.Ed. 968.

MR. JUSTICE WOODS delivered the opinion of the court.

* * * The next question for our consideration is, whether the defendant in error is entitled to offset against his liability to pay the sum due on his valid stock, the money paid on his void stock.

It is a general rule, that a holder of claims against an insolvent corporation cannot set them off against his liability to assessment on his stock in the corporation, in a suit by an assignee in bankruptcy. Sawyer v. Hoag, 17 Wall. 610, 84 U.S., 21 L.Ed. 731; Sanger v. Upton, 91 U.S. 56, 23 L.Ed. 220; Scammon v. Kimball, 92 U.S. 362, 23 L.Ed. 483; Morgan County v. Allen, 103 U.S. 498, 26 L. Ed. 498.

The ground upon which this rule stands, is thus stated by Mr. Justice Miller in Sawyer v. Hoag: "The debt which the appellant owed for his stock was a trust fund devoted to the payment of all the creditors of the company. As soon as the company became insolvent, and this fact became known to the appellant, the right of set-off for an ordinary debt to its full amount ceased. It became a fund belonging in equity to all its creditors, and could not be appropriated by the debtor to the exclusive payment of his own claim."

43 Statement of facts and that part of the opinion dealing with the increase of capital stock appears supra, p. 228.

The defendant seeks to avoid the application of this rule to his case, on the ground that the real capital of the company was only $200,000, and this constituted the trust fund for the security of the debts of the company; that all the money that had been paid in as capital stock had been paid into that fund, and that the party paying any money to that fund, was entitled to credit upon his dues thereto.

We cannot assent to this view. The defendant in error was as much bound to know the limits of the charter of the Company in which he was a stockholder, as the public, or creditors of the Company. He knew, therefore, that all stock issued beyond the limit fixed by the charter was absolutely void. When he paid in his money on the void stock, he knew that he was not paying it on the valid stock, and he is presumed to have known that it was not a good payment on the valid stock. The Company had no right to apply it on the valid stock, without his direction. He never directed such application, and it remained in the possession of the Company until the rights of the assignees in bankruptcy attached. To say that it was a contribution to the trust fund, devoted to the payment of the creditors of the Company, is an entire misapprehension. It could not be such contribution, unless it were a payment on the stock of the Company, and this we have seen was not the case. No call had been made by the Company for payment on the valid stock, to which the amounts paid on the void stock could be said to apply. No call could have been made by the Company under its agreement with the stockholders, unless to pay its creditors, and it does not appear that when the payments were made the Company had any creditors. It was a voluntary payment for the benefit of the Company, and tended to increase the value of the authorized stock. In that way the stockholder got the benefit of it. There is no rule of law or equity which entitled him, in a contest between himself and a creditor of the Company, either to receive a credit for it on his unpaid stock, or to have it repaid to him pro rata out of the assets of the Company. We are of opinion, therefore, that it could not be offset against the money due on the valid stock held by him.

We are next to consider whether, upon the facts as disclosed by the record, the defense of the Statute of Limitations should have been sustained. The precise question with which we have to deal is, when would this action at law, brought by the assignees of the bankrupt Company against a stockholder to recover a part of the balance due on his stock, be barred by the statute?

This will depend on the answer to the question, when did the cause of action accrue to the assignees? In other words, when could they have commenced this action against this defendant to recover the amount due on his stock? Wilcox v. Plummer, 4 Pet. 172, 7 L.Ed. 821; Amy v. Dubuque, 98 U.S. 470, 25 L.Ed. 228.

The stock held by the defendant in error was evidenced by certificates of full paid shares. It is conceded to have been the contract between him and the Company that he should never be called upon to pay any further assessments upon it. The same contract was made with all the other shareholders, and the fact was known to all. As between them and the Company this was a perfectly valid agreement. It was not forbidden by the charter of the Company or by any law or public policy, and as between the Company and its stockholders was just as binding as if it had been expressly authorized by the charter.

If the Company, for the purpose of increasing its business, had called upon the stockholders to pay up that part of their stock which had been satisfied "by discount," according to their contract the stockholders could have successfully resisted such a demand. No suit could have been maintained by the Company to collect the unpaid stock for such a purpose. The shares were issued as full paid, on a fair understanding, and that bound the Company.

In fact, it has been held in recent English cases that not only is the Company, but its creditors also, bound by such a contract. Waterhouse v. Jamieson, L.R., 2 H.L., sec. 29; Currie's case, 3 De F., J. & S., 367; Carling, H. & W. cases, L.R., 1 Ch.Div., 115.

But the doctrine of this court is, that such a contract, though binding on the Company, is a fraud in law on its creditors, which they could set aside; that when their rights intervene, and to satisfy their claims, the stockholders could be required to pay their stock in full. Sawyer v. Hoag, 17 Wall. 610, 84 U.S., 21 L.Ed. 731; New Albany v. Burke, 11 Wall. 96, 78 U.S., 20 L.Ed. 155; Burke v. Smith, 16 Wall. 390, 83 U.S., 21 L.Ed. 361.

The reason is, that the stock subscribed is considered in equity as a trust fund for the payment of creditors.[43] Wood v. Dummer, 3 Mason 308, Fed.Cas.No.17944; Mumma v. Potomac Co., 8 Pet. 286, 8 L.Ed. 945; Ogilvie v. Knox Ins. Co., 22 How. 387, 63 U.S., 16 L. Ed. 351; Sawyer v. Hoag, ubi supra. It is so held out to the public, who have no means of knowing the private contracts made between the corporation and its stockholders. The creditor has, therefore, the right to presume that the stock subscribed has been or will be paid up, and if it is not, a court of equity will at his instance, require it to be paid.

In this case, the managers and agents of the bankrupt Company had in effect represented to the public that all its capital stock had been subscribed for and had been or would be paid in full. Considered, therefore, in the view of a court of equity, the contract between the Company and its stockholders was this, namely, that the stockholders should pay, say, for example, $20 per share on their stock and no more, unless it became necessary to pay more to satisfy the creditors of the Company, and when the necessity arose, and the amount required was ascertained, then to make such additional payment on the stock as the satisfaction of the claims of creditors required. * * *

---

[43] An excellent discussion and severe criticism of the trust fund theory appears in an article by Hunt, The Trust Fund Theory, 1902, 12 Yale L.J. 63. See, also, Barrows, The Equitable Liability of Stockholders: The Grounds Upon Which It Rests, 1903, 13 Yale L.J. 66; Hale, A Field for Corporate Law Revision: Stockholders' Liability to Creditors, 1917, 12 Ill.L.Rev. 6; Wickersham, The Capital of A Corporation, 1909, 22 Harv.L.Rev. 319, 329–336; Notes, 1908, 8 Col.L.Rev. 303, 1924, 24 Col.L.Rev. 772, 1907, 20 Harv.L.Rev. 401, 1912, 25 Harv.L.Rev. 278, 1908, 56 U. of Pa.L.Rev. 57.

But in the present case, as we have seen, as between the Company and its stockholders there was no obligation on the part of the latter to pay the residue of their stock, unless it became necessary to satisfy creditors. We think, therefore, we are safe in saying that the statute did not begin to run in favor of the stockholders until at the very least the necessity for the payment had been ascertained, and an authorized demand of payment made. * * *

For the error in holding that the action was barred, the judgment of the Circuit Court must be reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to award a new trial.

NOTE

"If stockholders are indebted to the corporation for unpaid installments on stock this debt is an asset of the corporation which, in case it becomes insolvent, any creditor may enforce for the purpose of satisfying his claim. * * * But where stock is sold at a discount or is given away as full-paid, it is very clear that the stockholder owes the corporation nothing. As between the corporation and the stockholder the arrangement by which the stock is issued as full-paid stock is entirely valid. Upon what ground is it then held that the arrangement, although valid against the company, will be ineffectual against the creditor? * * * Most courts recognize that there is such a liability upon the original holders of bonus or watered stock or their transferees with notice. * * * This liability has been accounted for on various theories; first, upon the trust fund theory * * * second, the fraud theory, the presumed reliance of the creditor upon the issued capital stock of the company; third, the co-debtor theory, to the effect that the stockholders are in reality co-debtors up to the limit set by the par value; and fourth, the prescribed obligation theory, that an obligation to contribute an amount equal to the par value is imposed by operation of law as an incident of acquiring membership in a corporation. The trust fund theory is the one most commonly advanced. * * * The capital of a corporation may perhaps be regarded as a trust fund in the sense that it cannot be diverted or distributed among the shareholders without provision being first made for the full payment of corporate debts. * * *" Ballantine, Stockholders' Liability in Minnesota, 1923, 7 Minn.L.Rev. 79, 82–93.[44]

---

[44] On shareholders' liability for the par value of bonus and discount shares see, Christensen v. Eno, 106 N.Y. 97, 12 N.E. 648, 60 Am.Rep. 429, 1887; Ballantine, Stockholders' Liability in Minnesota, 1923, 7 Minn.L.Rev. 79, 108–111; Notes, 1924, 24 Col.L.Rev. 772, 1916, 29 Harv.L.Rev. 854, 1925, 38 Harv.L.Rev. 1112, 1926, 39 Harv.L.Rev. 757.

See, also, Go, The Legal Aspects of Bonus Stock in a Corporation, 1937, 17 Phil. L.J. 85.

HANDLEY v. STUTZ.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1891.
139 U.S. 417, 11 S.Ct. 530, 35 L.Ed. 227.

[The Clifton Coal Company was incorporated in 1883 in Kentucky, with a capital stock of $120,000 and power to increase same to $200,000 by a majority vote of its shareholders. In 1886 the company, wishing to expand, issued $50,000 in bonds. Finding that it could not sell the bonds, the company determined to issue capital stock to the amount authorized in the certificate of incorporation and to offer, as a further inducement, $1,000 in stock to each purchaser of a $1,000 bond. The bonds were subscribed for, paid up and delivered with stock certificates reciting on their face that they were "paid-up" and "non-assessable". Shares amounting to $30,000 were not needed as premiums in the bond issue; these were distributed pro rata as dividends to the old shareholders.

In 1887, the company went into receivership. In 1889, this bill was filed by judgment creditors of the corporation against the company and the holders of the bonus shares to compel the latter to pay for the stock and to recover the amounts of the judgments. Plaintiffs alleged that the increase and amount due on the stock was a trust fund for their benefit which they were entitled to have the court administer to satisfy their debts. The lower court held that defendants were liable to those creditors whose debts had originated after the increase of the capital stock. Defendants appeal.]

MR. JUSTICE BROWN delivered the opinion of the court. * * * Somewhat different considerations apply to those who subscribed for the bonds of the company with the understanding that they were to receive an amount of stock equal to the bonds as an additional inducement to their subscription. The facts connected with this transaction are substantially as follows: Some three years after the company was organized it became apparent that the enterprise, as originally contemplated, namely, the mining and selling of coal for steam and domestic purposes, was not likely to be a success, owing to the inferior character of the product; and the only hope of the company lay in the manufacture of the coal into an iron-making coke, that is, a coke containing a percentage of sulphur low enough to admit of the manufacture of merchantable pig-iron. To embark in this, however, money was needed, and, as the stock of the company was not worth more than 50 cents on the dollar, it was evident this could not be effected simply by the issue of new stock. It was proposed at the meeting in March that money should be raised by the issue of $50,000 of bonds, with which to add the requisite structures to the plant. But it was soon evident that the bonds could not be negotiated without the stock, and, acting upon the suggestion of a Nashville banker, it was resolved at the meeting in May that the stock should be increased 800 shares, 500 of which should be turned over to the subscribers to the bonds as a bonus or an additional consideration. The evidence is uncontradicted that the bonds could not have been negotiated without the stock; that they were both sold as a whole; that the transaction was in good faith; and, considering the risk that was taken by the subscribers, the price paid for the stock and bonds was fair and reasonable. The directors appear to have done all in their power to obtain the best possible terms, and there is no imputation of unfair dealing on the part of any one connected with the transaction. At that time the mines and property of the company were in good condition, and the prospects of success were fair.

The case, then, resolves itself into the question whether an active corporation, or, as it is called in some cases, a "going concern," finding its original capital impaired by loss or misfortune, may not, for the purpose of recuperating itself and providing new conditions for the successful prosecution of its business, issue new stock, put it upon the market, and sell it for the best price that can be obtained. The question has never been directly raised before in this court, and we are not, consequently, embarrassed by any previous decisions on the point. In the Upton Cases, arising out of the failure of the Great Western Insurance Company; in Hatch v. Dana, 101 U.S. 205, 25 L. Ed. 885; and in Hawkins v. Glenn, 131 U.S. 319, 9 S.Ct. 739, 33 L. Ed. 184,—the defendants were either original subscribers to the increased stock, at a price far below its par value, or transferees of such subscribers; and the stock was issued, not, as in this case, to purchase property or raise money to add to the plant, and facilitate the operations of the company, but simply to increase its original stock in order to carry on a larger business, and the stock thus issued was treated as if it formed a part of the original capital. In County of Morgan v. Allen, 103 U.S. 498, 26 L.Ed. 498, the same principle was applied to a subscription by a county to the capital stock of a railroad company, for which it had issued its bonds, although such bonds had been surrendered to the county with the consent of certain of its creditors.

To say that a corporation may not, under the circumstances above indicated, put its stock upon the market, and sell it to the highest bidder, is practically to declare that a corporation can never increase its capital by a sale of shares, if the original stock has fallen below par. The wholesome doctrine, so many times enforced by this court, that the capital stock of an insolvent corporation is a trust fund for the payment of its debts, rests upon the idea that the creditors have a right to rely upon the fact that the subscribers to such stock have put into the treasury of the corporation, in some form, the amount represented by it; but it does not follow that every creditor has a right to trace each share of stock issued by such corporation, and inquire whether its holder, or the person of whom he purchased, has paid its par value for it. It frequently happens that corporations, as well as individuals, find it necessary to increase their capital in order to raise money to prosecute their business successfully, and one of the most frequent methods resorted to is that of issuing new shares of stock and putting them upon the market for the best price that can be obtained; and, so long as the transaction is bona fide, and not a mere cover for "watering" the stock, and the consideration obtained represents the actual value of such stock, the courts have shown no disposition to disturb it. Of course no one would take stock so issued at a greater price than the original stock could be purchased for, and hence the ability to negotiate the stock and to raise the money must depend upon the fact whether the purchaser shall or shall not be called upon to respond for its par value. While, as before observed, the precise question has never been raised in this court, there are numerous decisions to the effect that the general rule that holders of stock, in favor of creditors, must respond for its par value, is subject to exceptions where the transaction is not a mere cover for an illegal increase. * * *

The liability of a subscriber for the par value of increased stock taken by him may depend somewhat upon the circumstances under which, and the purposes for which, such increase was made. If it be merely for the purpose of adding to the original capital stock of the corporation, and enabling it to do a larger and more profitable business, such subscriber would stand practically upon the same basis as a subscriber to the original capital. But we think that an active corporation may, for the purpose of paying its debts, and obtaining money for the successful prosecution of its business, issue its stock, and dispose of it for the best price that can be obtained. Stein v. Howard, 65 Cal. 616, 4 P. 662. As the company in this case found it impossible to negotiate its bonds at par without the stock, and as the stock was issued for the purpose of enhancing the value of the bonds, and was taken by the subscribers to the bonds at a price fairly representing the value of both stock and bonds, we think the transaction should be sustained, and that the defendants cannot be called upon to respond for the par value of such stock, as if they had subscribed to the original stock of the company. Our conclusion upon this branch of the case disposes of it as to those who were held liable by virtue of their subscription to the bonds. * * *

It results that the decree of the court below must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

FULLER, C. J. (dissenting). I dissent from the conclusion of the court in respect of the stock received by the subscribers to the bonds. That stock was not paid for in money or money's worth, or issued in payment of debts due from the company, or purchased at sale upon the market. It was a mere bonus, thrown in with the bonds as furnishing the inducement to the bond subscription, of larger control over the corporation, and of possible gain without expenditure. Becoming secured creditors through the bonds, the subscribers increased their power through the stock. In my view, there was no actual payment for the stock, and to treat it as paid up is to sanction an arrangement to relieve those who would reap the benefit derived from the possession of the stock in the event of the success from liability for the consequences in the event of the failure of the enterprise.

When the capital stock of a corporation has become impaired, or the business in which it has engaged has proven so unremunerative as to call for a change, creditors at large may well demand that experiments at rehabilitation should not be conducted at their risk. My Brother LAMAR concurs with me in this dissent.[45]

HARMAN v. HIMES.

United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, 1935.
77 F.2d 375, 64 App.D.C. 252.

Appeal from the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

Action by Robert G. Harman, receiver of the Lincoln Hotel Corporation, against Joseph H. Himes. From an adverse decree, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

GRONER, ASSOCIATE JUSTICE. Lincoln Hotel Corporation was chartered October 27, 1922, under the laws of Delaware. The articles of incorporation gave it wide powers in relation to dealing in real estate, but concededly the purpose of its incorporation was to build and operate a hotel in the city of Washington. Its authorized capital stock was limited to $1,000,000 until on December 27, 1922, it obtained an amendment to its charter, increasing it to $1,500,000, to be represented by 5,000 shares of preferred and 10,000 shares of common stock, all of the par value of $100 per share. Three months after its incorporation, and one month after the amendment of its charter, namely on January 27, 1923, appellee, Joseph H. Himes, entered into a written agreement with the corporation, in which it agreed to sell and deliver to him and he agreed to purchase 700 shares of preferred and 700 shares of common stock of the corporation for the sum of $50,000. The contract provided that the money should be used for the purpose of acquiring title to certain property in Washington city on which the corporation had options and on which it intended to build its hotel, but that $10,000 might be used for the purposes of organization expenses and promotion and the sale of the remaining preferred and common stock. The corporation agreed to acquire promptly title to the lot and thereafter, out of the first proceeds from the sale of preferred stock, to acquire from Himes at par the $70,000 of preferred stock purchased by him or so much thereof as he might desire to sell. There was another provision looking to the creation of a voting trust by deposit of enough of the company's common stock, together with Himes' 700 shares, to provide control, the voting trust to terminate when the repurchase from Himes of the preferred stock was made.

We gather from the record that the corporation did purchase the lot of land, using the money paid in by Himes as the cash payment, and securing the balance by deeds of trust. What happened thereafter is not so clear, but on the 11th of April, 1928, more than five years after the events just narrated, and at the instance of creditors, appellant, Harman, was appointed receiver by a Delaware court, with the customary powers of receivers in such cases. Harman qualified, gave bond, and took possession of the books of the corporation, but apparently nothing else. Thereafter in the same proceeding an order was passed authorizing creditors to prove their claims against the corporation. This was done and claims were proved and allowed to an amount in excess of $95,000. On April 1, 1931, the receiver, in order to pay the debts of the corporation, petitioned the court to levy an assessment on stockholders for the amount of their respective unpaid stock subscriptions. There was a hearing on this petition, and a decree passed on the 20th of January, 1932, finding there were no funds or property of the corporation with which to pay its debts except the money due from those of its stockholders who had not paid in full for their shares. The amount of debts due by the company was determined, and Himes was declared to be in default to the company to the amount of $90,000 (the difference between the par value of the 1,400 shares of preferred and common stock purchased by him and the payment of $50,000 made by him).

---

45 Bonbright, Shareholders' Defenses Against Liability to Creditors, 1925, 25 Col.L.Rev. 408, 429; Wickersham, The Capital of a Corporation, 1909, 22 Harv.L.Rev. 319, 330–322; Note, 1908, 8 Col.L.Rev. 303, 304; 1919, 3 Minn.L.Rev. 281.

The action below was instituted by the receiver against Himes to recover this $90,000, and was tried to a jury, but after all the evidence had been introduced the trial court gave binding instructions in favor of Himes and thereafter entered judgment against the receiver; and this appeal followed.

The question here is whether, under the statutes of Delaware as they were at the time of making the contract, every holder of corporate stock issued to him for less than par is liable, in case of insolvency, to corporate creditors for the difference between the amount paid and the par of stock so held; stated differently, whether a Delaware corporation has power, under the Constitution and laws of that state, to issue and dispose of par value stock at less than par.

We conclude there can be no doubt that in reaching an answer to this question we are controlled by the decisions of the highest court of Delaware construing its Constitution and laws in relation to a business corporation chartered under its laws. Royal Arcanum v. Green, 237 U.S. 531, 544, 35 S.Ct. 724, 59 L.Ed. 1089, L.R.A.1916A, 771. That case involved a Massachusetts corporation. A suit was brought against it in New York to have declared invalid an amendment to the corporation's Constitution and by-laws increasing the assessment on members. The corporation defended on the ground that the validity of the amendment had been duly declared by a decision of the highest court of Massachusetts. The Court of Appeals of New York rejected this defense, and the Supreme Court reversed its decision, saying that it is now the established rule, first, that the law of the state by which a corporation is created governs in enforcing the liability of a stockholder as a member of such corporation to pay the stock subscription which he agreed to make; second, that the state law and proceedings are binding as to the ascertaining of the fact of insolvency and of the amount due the creditors entitled to be paid from the subscription when collected; and, third, that by putting out of view the right of the person against whom a liability for a stockholder's subscription is asserted to show that he is not a stockholder, or is not the holder of as many shares as is alleged, or has a claim against the corporation which at law or equity he is entitled to set off against the corporation, or has any other defense personal to himself, a decree against the corporation in a suit brought against it under the state law for the purpose of ascertaining its insolvency, compelling its liquidation, collecting sums due by stockholders for subscriptions to stock and paying the debts of the corporation, in so far as it determines these general matters, binds the stockholder, although he be not a party in a personal sense.

In the receiver's suit in Delaware, to which we have referred, the question of insolvency, the amount due the creditors, the sums due by stockholders on subscriptions to stock, were all duly determined, and here the defense, on the part of Himes, is based on the claim that he never was a subscriber for the stock of the corporation, but was a purchaser of stock from a going concern at a time when the corporation needed money for the payment of its debts and for the successful prosecution of its business. He, therefore, tells us that, notwithstanding the general rule may be that the holders of shares of stock which have been issued for an inadequate or illegal consideration, or for no consideration whatever, may be compelled to complete payment to the extent of the par value of such shares, the rule in the federal courts is that in the absence of constitutional or statutory provisions expressly forbidding it, a corporation which has previously issued shares of stock, incurred indebtedness, and acquired property which it is about to lose for want of additional capital, and is otherwise in financial difficulties, may issue and sell additional par value shares at less than par, provided the price paid is not less than the fair value of the shares purchased. He further says that when such purchase is made in good faith and without intent to defraud other shareholders or creditors, the purchaser is not liable for any additional payments to creditors or stockholders of the corporation. To sustain this position he relies upon Clark v. Bever, 139 U.S. 96, 11 S.Ct. 468, 35 L.Ed. 88, and Handley v. Stutz, 139 U.S. 417, 11 S.Ct. 530, 35 L.Ed. 227.

In Clark v. Bever an Iowa railroad corporation, which was unable to pay in full for construction work on its road, paid the contractor the balance due in its own stock at 20 per cent. of its par value. Subsequently the contractor was sued for the difference between the amount at which the stock was received and par. The Iowa statute provided:

"Nothing herein contained exempts the stockholders of any corporation from individual liability to the amount of the unpaid installments on the stock owned by them or transferred by them for the purpose of defrauding creditors, and an execution against the company may to that extent be levied upon such private property of any individual." Revision 1860, § 1172.

The Supreme Court held that the statute did not impose an express restriction upon the disposition by a corporation of its stock, except such as is imposed upon individuals, and did not prescribe any rule in respect to the liability of a stockholder to creditors except to the extent of any "unpaid installments" on the stock owned by him. In this view, the Supreme Court said that in every such case the question is, first, whether any indebtedness really exists upon the part of the particular stockholder, and that this question must be determined in each case upon its own circumstances and in accordance with the principles of general law touching the rights and liabilities of creditors and stockholders. * * *

The case of Handley v. Stutz involved a Kentucky statute quite similar to that of Iowa. * * *

The court, however, recognized in this case, as in Clark v. Bever, that the rule of liability depended upon the state statute. Otherwise it is no more than an affirmance of the rule announced in that case, viz., that an "active corporation"—a "going concern"—finding its original capital impaired by loss may, to preserve the business, issue new stock and sell it at the best price that can be obtained.

Seeking to bring himself within this language, Himes says that the facts surrounding the purchase of his stock show that shortly after the granting of the charter to the corporation it issued and sold some of its stock at par (the record does not disclose how much). With the money thus realized it had purchased options to acquire parcels of land on which it intended to build an hotel; that in accomplishing this it had exhausted its treasury and was then in a precarious condition. It had options which it considered valuable, and which would terminate in a few days unless it was able to sell stock and realize sufficient funds to take up the options; and unless it could take up the options it could not proceed with the business for which it was incorporated. It had to sell its stock at what it could get for it to avoid receivership.

It was this situation, as Himes claims, which induced him to purchase the stock. He therefore insists that the case is like Handley v. Stutz in that here, as there, the corporation, finding its original capital impaired, for the purpose of recuperating itself and providing new conditions for the successful prosecution of its business, sold him the stock at the best price then obtainable; and so he says the rule announced there, when applied here, is a complete defense.

If we should grant Himes' premise and the facts on which he seeks to sustain it, we should still have another hurdle to cross for, as we have indicated already, both in Handley v. Stutz and in Clark v. Bever there was no controlling statute in the state of incorporation, and this was the basic factor in the result. But here, on behalf of the receiver it is claimed there is such statute law in Delaware, and it is further claimed its precise provisions make inapplicable the rule in Handley v. Stutz and Clark v. Bever. If this is correct, the judgment below, if for no other reason, is clearly wrong.

Prior to 1915 there was no statutory enactment of Delaware covering stockholders' liability for part paid stock. In 1915 section 14 (General Corporation Law of Delaware [Rev.Code Del.1915, § 1928]) was enacted as follows:

"Subscriptions to, or purchase of, the capital stock of any corporation organized or to be organized under any law of this State may be paid for, wholly or partly, by cash, by labor done, by personal property or by real property or leases thereof. * * * And in the absence of actual fraud in the transaction, the judgment of the Directors, as to the value of such labor, property, real estate or leases [thereof], shall be conclusive."

Section 20 (Rev.Code Del.1915, § 1934) provided:

"When the whole capital stock of a corporation shall not have been paid in, and the assets shall be insufficient to satisfy the claims of its creditors, each stockholder shall be bound to pay on each share held by him the sum necessary to complete the amount of the par value of such share as fixed by the charter of the company or its certificate of incorporation, or such proportion of that sum as shall be required to satisfy the debts of the company," etc.

Section 20 was amended by Act March 20, 1917 (29 Del.Laws, c. 113, § 10), by adding a provision governing the issuance of no par value stock, but otherwise it remained unchanged, and was the law of Delaware at the time the charter of the corporation was granted and also at the time Himes' stock was acquired.

The section was construed and applied by the courts of Delaware in Cooney Company v. Arlington Hotel Co., 11 Del.Ch. 286, 101 A. 879, 887; Id., 11 Del.Ch. 430, 106 A. 39, 7 A.L.R. 955. * * *

As we read them, it is perfectly clear that the statutes of Delaware, as construed in that case, impose an absolute liability on the holders of stock of a corporation of that state—original or subsequent—to pay the full par value of the shares so held. And this is also the rule in New Jersey, from whose incorporation laws section 20 of the Delaware statute was taken. In Donald v. Am. Smelt. & R. Co., 62 N.J. Eq. 729, 48 A. 771, 1116, Easton N. Bk. v. American B. & T. Co., 70 N.J.Eq. 732, 64 A. 917, 8 L.R.A.,N.S., 271, 10 Ann.Cas. 84, and Holcombe v. Trenton W. C. Co., 80 N.J.Eq. 122, 82 A. 618, it was stated flatly that whether the stock be paid for in property or money, the value of the property or the amount of the money in either case must be at least equal to the face value of the stock. In view of these decisions and the established rule that in the interpretation of state statutes we are bound to follow the rulings of the highest court of the state, it is perfectly clear that the rule in Clark v. Bever and Handley v. Stutz cannot be considered as controlling here; and this same view was taken by the Court of Appeals in the Second Circuit in Enright v. Heckscher, 240 F. 863, 879. In that case one of the questions for decision was whether the New Jersey act was so explicit as to foreclose the question whether an indebtedness claimed against stockholders may be determined by other circumstances like those in Handley v. Stutz and Clark v. Bever.

Judge Rogers, who wrote the opinion, reached the conclusion that a fair construction of the New Jersey act would not permit a defense on those or like issues of fact.

But even if we were in doubt as to these questions, we should still be inclined to the view that Himes has not otherwise brought himself within the doctrine or rule of those two cases. In Handley v. Stutz the corporation was an active, going concern. Its original capital stock had been subscribed and used, its business established, and it was only at a later date—some three years in fact—that in order to extend its business and increase its ability to conduct it successfully, it increased its stock and sold it on the best market.

In Clark v. Bever a railroad company charged with a public duty found itself unable to pay its floating debt or the interest on its bonds. To avoid failure, it issued its stock at 20 per cent. of par (all it was then worth) in payment of a debt. These were the circumstances which the Supreme Court held removed the case from the usual rule of stockholders' liability, but the decision in both cases turned upon the fact that the company was a going business and should not be deprived of the opportunity to keep itself alive by selling its stock at less than par if there were no statute in the state of its incorporation forbidding it.

That is not the case here. The corporation we are concerned with was not an active corporation, a going concern, or an established business when Himes acquired his stock. It had been chartered only three months. In that interval it had sold a part of its stock, how large a part is not disclosed. On the one hand, its application for the amendment shows the affirmative vote of all the then authorized stock, but the stock ledger (Exhibit C) shows that prior to Himes' purchase certificates for only 44 shares of preferred and 40 shares of common had been issued, and only $8,400 in cash received. Out of this small amount of money it had acquired options on parcels of land, but it had not got beyond that stage. It had neither hotel nor site on which to build it. It had options, but it could not do business on options alone. Necessarily, it had discharged none of the functions for which it was incorporated. It was a paper corporation, but that was all. It was in that respect wholly unlike either of the corporations in Clark v. Bever and Handley v. Stutz. It had never prosecuted any business, and was wholly in the preliminary stages, and the contract with Himes contemplated that $10,000 of his subscription might be used for the purpose of a campaign to sell the stock. The increase of stock under the amended charter was, in the circumstances we have detailed, as much an original issue of stock as if issued under the original charter provisions for, whether previously subscribed for or not, the record shows that a negligible percentage had then been issued or paid for. In view of this, it would be a stretch of imagination to say that the facts bring the case within the so-called "Supreme Court rule." Nor do we think there is any difference in the fact that Himes purchased rather than subscribed for stock. The "acceptance of the certificates is sufficient evidence of an agreement to pay their par value." Handley v. Stutz, 139 U.S. 417, at page 427, 11 S.Ct. 530, 534, 35 L.Ed. 227. * * *

Reversed.

(b) No par value stock

Under the corporation statutes of most states there are two distinct types of non-par stock. The first type is referred to as stated value non-par stock. The corporation statutes, while calling their creation shares "without nominal or par value," have, in effect, achieved a definite par value stock. The second is referred to as true non-par stock because of the absence of any statement other than the number of non-par shares to be issued. The stock is merely authorized to be brought into existence. Many states, however, do require the incorporators to certify that a minimum paid-in capital fund has been paid in at commencement of corporate life where true non-par stock is created. Berle, Studies in Law of Corporation Finance (1928) pp. 65–67.

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW

§ 12. Shares without par value. Any or all of the shares of any stock corporation, other than a moneyed corporation, may be issued without par value, provided there be included in its certificate of incorporation the following statements:

1. The total number of shares that may be issued by the corporation.
2. The number of shares, if any, which are to have a par value and the par value of each.
3. The number of shares which are to be without par value, and
4. Either one of the following statements:

A. "The capital of the corporation shall be at least equal to the sum of the aggregate par value of all issued shares having par value, plus ...... dollars (the blank space being filled in with some number representing one dollar or more) in respect to every issued share without par value, plus such amounts as, from time to time, by resolution of the board of directors, may be transferred thereto;" or

B. "The capital of the corporation shall be at least equal to the sum of the aggregate par value of all issued shares having par value, plus the aggregate amount of consideration received by the corporation for the issuance of shares without par value, plus such amounts as, from time to time, by resolution of the board of directors, may be transferred thereto."

There may also be included in such certificate an additional statement that the capital shall not be less than ...... dollars (the blank space being filled in with a number).

Such statements in the certificate shall be in lieu of any statements prescribed by the law under which the corporation is formed as to the amount or maximum amount of its capital stock or the number of shares into which the same shall be divided, or of which it shall consist.

Subject to the designations, preferences, privileges and voting powers or restrictions or qualifications granted or imposed in respect to any class of shares, each share with or without par value shall be equal to every other share of the same class.

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

§ 14. * * * As to corporations incorporated prior to April 1, 1929, shares of capital stock without par value, whether common or preferred or special, may be issued by the corporation from time to time for such consideration as may be fixed from time to time by the Board of Directors thereof, pursuant to authority conferred by the Certificate of Incorporation or, if such authority shall not be so conferred on the Board of Directors, then for such consideration as may be fixed by the consent in writing of, or by vote of, the holders of record of two-thirds of the total number of shares of each class of stock then outstanding and entitled to vote in respect thereto, such vote to be given at a meeting called for that purpose in such manner as shall be prescribed by the by-laws. As to corporations incorporated on or after April 1, 1929, shares of capital stock without par value, whether common or preferred or special, may be issued by the corporation from time to time for such consideration as may be fixed from time to time by the Board of Directors thereof, unless in the Certificate of Incorporation the power to fix such consideration shall have been reserved to the stockholders, in which event such power shall be exercised by the stockholders by consent in writing or by vote of the holders of record of two-thirds of the total number of shares of each class of stock then outstanding and entitled to vote in respect thereto, said vote being given at a meeting called for the purpose in such manner as shall be prescribed by the by-laws; provided that, although such power has been reserved to the stockholders, the directors shall nevertheless have power to fix such consideration for the first issue of stock, and such issue shall not exceed ten per centum of the whole amount of such stock authorized by the Certificate of Incorporation. Any and all shares without par value so issued for which the consideration so fixed has been paid or delivered shall be deemed full paid stock and shall not be liable to any further call or assessments thereon, and the holders of such shares shall not be liable for any further payments in respect of such shares under the provisions of this Chapter. * * *

STONE v. YOUNG.

Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Division, Fourth Department, 1924.
210 App.Div. 303, 206 N.Y.S. 95.

Appeal by the plaintiff, Walter R. Stone, as receiver, etc., from a judgment of the Supreme Court in favor of the defendant, entered in the office of the clerk of the county of Onondaga on the 7th day of May, 1924, pursuant to an order, made at the Onondaga Special Term and entered in said clerk's office on the 6th day of May, 1924, dismissing the complaint for failure to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

See 123 Misc. 120, 204 N.Y.S. 690.

SEARS, J. The defendant, during the month of December, 1921, subscribed in writing for 200 shares of the 8 per cent. cumulative, nonassessable, preferred stock of the Syracuse Hotel Corporation, of the par value of $100 each, with which, according to the subscription agreement, he was to receive a bonus at the rate of one share of the common stock without par value with each two shares of preferred. The subscription agreement provided that the payment of the subscription price should be made in installments upon fixed dates, and that the certificates for the shares purchased were not to be delivered to the subscriber, except in proportion to the payments as specified. It also contained the following paragraph:

"Interest at the rate of 6 per cent. on preferred stock to accrue, respectively, from the date of each installment payment until the beginning of the first quarter after date of opening of the hotel, after which date the dividend will be 8 per cent. on such preferred stock."

In an action in the United States District Court the plaintiff has been appointed receiver of the Syracuse Hotel Corporation, and that court has ordered and adjudged, among other things, that it is necessary for the protection of creditors of the Syracuse Hotel Corporation, and for the payment of its debts, obligations, and liabilities, that all moneys due and owing and which should become due and owing upon subscriptions for the stock of such corporation be forthwith paid to the receiver, and the receiver has been further authorized to make a call and demand upon all persons owing moneys because of subscriptions to the stock to pay to him as such receiver forthwith all sums due and owing, respectively, by them because of such subscriptions, and in the case of installments not then due to make a call and demand for payment of such installments when and as they became due and payable, and to take any necessary action and institute such suits as the receiver might be advised for the purpose of enforcing payment of the sums ordered to be paid.

The defendant has paid $13,000 of the agreed subscription price of $20,000, and this suit is brought to recover the balance, with interest.

The foregoing are the main allegations in the complaint. The defendant, by motion for judgment, has challenged the sufficiency of the complaint on the ground that the subscription agreement is invalid. * * *

2. Because the contract provides for a distribution of common stock without the receipt of any value therefor (Stock Corporation Law of 1909, § 55 and section 19, as added by Laws 1912, c. 351, amended by Laws 1917, c. 500, § 1, and Laws 1921, c. 694).

The parties entered into a stipulation for use upon the motion to the effect that the Syracuse Hotel Corporation at the time of the execution and delivery by the defendant of the stock subscription in question had not yet engaged in business and had no assets, property or income other than the cash received from the sale of stock. * * *

The other claim of invalidity includes two propositions: First, that the preferred shares could not be subscribed for in money at less than the full par value of the shares; and, second, that the company could not lawfully distribute gratuitously its common stock, even if it was without par value.

The first of these two propositions rests on the provision of the statute:

"No corporation shall issue either stock or bonds except for money, labor done or property actually received for the use and lawful purposes of such corporation." Section 55, Stock Corporation Law 1909.[46]

It is true that the statute at the time of the execution of the subscription in question did not contain an express prohibition against the issuance of shares of stock with par value for money at less than the par value such as was contained in the statute from 1892 to 1901 (Stock Corporation Law 1892 [Gen.Laws, c. 36; Laws 1892, c. 688] § 42, and chapter 354, Laws 1901), and as is contained in the present Stock Corporation Law (Consol. Laws, c. 59; section 69, c. 787, Laws 1923). But in the statute as a whole, particularly in sections 9, 19, 55, 56, and 60 of the Stock Corporation Law of 1909, the requirement is clearly implied that stock with par value when issued for money shall be issued only for a consideration at least equal to the par value. In Gamble v. Queens County Water Co., 123 N.Y. 91, 25 N.E. 201, 9 L.R.A. 527, such a requirement was held to be implied in a statute very similar to the one under which this corporation was organized. In Trent Import Co. v. Wheelwright, 118 Md. 249, 84 A. 543, the Court of Appeals of Maryland construed the antecedent of the very statute of New York under which the Syracuse Hotel Corporation was organized as forbidding an issue of stock with par value for less than the equivalent of such value. Section 42 of the Stock Corporation Law of 1890 (Gen.Laws, c. 36; Laws 1890, c. 564), as amended by chapter 688, Laws 1892, contained these words: "No such stock shall be issued for less than its par value." When this act was amended in 1901 (chapter 354, Laws 1901), this sentence was omitted. In our opinion, however, the Legislature, by omitting these words, did not intend to change the policy of the state in this respect. At the time of the adoption of the amendment with the words omitted, the following provision was added:

"Any corporation may purchase any property authorized by its certificate of incorporation, or necessary for the use and lawful purposes of such corporation, and may issue stock to the amount of the value thereof in payment therefor, and the stock so issued shall be full paid stock and not liable to any further call, neither shall the holder thereof be liable for any further payment under any of the provisions of this act; and in the absence of fraud in the transaction the judgment of the directors as to the value of the property purchased shall be conclusive."

This sentence liberalized the law with relation to the issuance of stock for property by making the value of the property as determined by the directors in good faith, and not the actual value of the property, the test in respect to full payment. The provision contained in the quoted words is inconsistent with that which was omitted, so far as that provision related to stock issued for property, and probably the omission occurred on that account. The statute was re-enacted in section 55 of the Stock Corporation Law of 1909. Some light is shed upon the legislative purpose by the enactment of 1923 (section 69, c. 787, Laws 1923), where the section was again amended by inserting the words:

[46] Cf. N.Y.Stock Corporation Law, § 69, infra, p. 355.

"No shares of stock having par value shall be issued for money in an amount less than the par value of such shares."

Stock issued for property may in fact, though not intention, be "watered." Stock issued for cash must be full-paid to the par value. It is for this reason that the statute requires in the same section that:

"In all statements and reports of the corporation, by law required to be published or filed, this stock [issued for property] shall not be stated or reported as being issued for cash paid to the corporation, but shall be reported as issued for property purchased."

Unless the Legislature intended that the corporation should receive the par value of all stock having a par value, the purpose of having a par value at all disappears. Knowlton v. Congress & Empire Spring Co., 57 N.Y. 518; 36 Harvard Law Review, 509–547;[47] 14 Corpus Juris, 444, note. Christensen v. Eno, 106 N.Y. 97, 12 N.E. 648, 60 Am.Rep. 429, and Southworth v. Morgan, 205 N.Y. 293, 98 N.E. 490, 51 L.R.A.,N.S., 56, determined that stock of a foreign corporation actually issued, either gratuitously or for a money consideration less than the par value of the shares, will, in an action by a creditor, founded solely on the common law, be treated as fully paid, so that the holder of such shares will not be liable to the creditor for the difference between the par value and the amount the corporation received as consideration. These cases repudiate the "trust fund theory" recognized in some jurisdictions. They relate to executed contracts only, are based on the common law, and bear no relation to the question of the enforceability under our statutes of an executory contract embodying the issuance of intentionally "watered" stock.

If, as we think, the statute forbade the issuance of stock with par value for a money consideration less than par, an agreement in conflict therewith, while executory, is unenforceable. Kraft v. Griffon Co., 82 App.Div. 29, 81 N.Y.S. 438; Zelaya Mining Co. v. Meyer, City Ct., 8 N.Y.S. 487; General Electric Co. v. Wightman, 3 App.Div. 118, 39 N.Y.S. 420; 14 C.J. 448; Village of Ft. Edward v. Fish, 156 N.Y. 363, 50 N.E. 973. The subscription agreement set forth in the complaint is executory, so far as it concerns the balance unpaid. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Oregonian R. Co., 130 U.S. 1, 9 S.Ct. 409, 32 L. Ed. 837. We reach the conclusion then that the sum which the defendant agreed to pay was a consideration solely for the preferred stock and that the common stock was to be distributed literally as a bonus or gratuity. Although this common stock is without par value, the very section of the statute which authorizes the issuance of such stock (section 19, Stock Corporation Law of 1909, added by Laws 1912, c. 351, as amended by chapter 694, Laws 1921),[48] also determines the consideration which must be paid for it upon its issuance by providing that the corporation may issue and sell such shares "for such consideration as may be prescribed in the certificate of incorporation or for such consideration as shall be the fair market value of such shares." Here is no warrant for the gratuitous distribution. In fact, an original distribution without consideration is in direct conflict with section 55 of the Stock Corporation Law of 1909, as it then existed.

---

47 Warren, Safeguarding the Creditors of Corporation, 1923, 36 Harv.L.Rev. 509.

48 N.Y.Laws 1921, c. 694, § 19, deals with the issue of non-par stock. Cf. N.Y. Stock Corporation Law, § 12, supra, p. 283.

In view of the stipulation that the corporation, at the time of the execution of the subscription agreement, had no assets, property, or income other than cash received from the sale of stock, it is evident that the corporation owned no already issued common stock which might possibly be distributed as a bonus. The case differs in this respect from Skillin v. Magnus, D.C., 162 F. 689.

The invalidity which has been pointed out goes to the very essence of the agreement and affects the entire instrument. Foley v. Speir, 100 N.Y. 552, 3 N.E. 477; Trent Import Co. v. Wheelwright, supra. * * *

The judgment should be modified, by granting the plaintiff permission to serve an amended complaint within 20 days, and, as so amended, affirmed, with costs. * * *

JOHNSON v. LOUISVILLE TRUST CO.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Sixth Circuit, 1923.
293 F. 857.

Petition to revise an order of, and appeal from, the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Kentucky.

Proceeding by Claude W. Johnson, trustee in bankruptcy of the Kentucky Iron & Steel Company, bankrupt, against the Louisville Trust Company, trustee, and others. An order of the referee dismissing the petition was affirmed by the District Court, and the trustee seeks review, both by appeal and by petition for revision under Bankruptcy Act, sec. 24, sub. b, 11 U.S.C.A. § 47, sub. b.[49] Affirmed.

KNAPPEN, Circuit Judge. The Louisville Trust Company, as trustee for certain individuals, had purchased at bankruptcy sale the plant and assets of the Louisville Steel & Iron Company, the substantial consideration being the cancellation of a bond issue of $200,000. On April 20, 1920, the trust company, as such trustee, gave respondents Tietjen and J. Walter Bell an option for the purchase of this plant and personal property, to be conveyed to a corporation to be organized by the optionees, and having an authorized issue of $150,000 of preferred stock and 3,000 shares of no par value common stock, of which the trust company, as such trustee, was to receive as payment for such plant and personalty $50,000 preferred and 750 shares of no par value common stock, plus $100,000 of an issue of $150,000 of mortgage bonds to be placed on the property by the new corporaital into the treasury of the new corporation, to be used for necessary repairs, alterations, and operation. This option was accepted on or about May 4, 1920. Pursuant to this arrangement, the present bankrupt, the Kentucky Iron & Steel Company, was organized under the laws of Delaware, with authority to issue preferred and no par value common stock in the agreed amounts above stated; the three incorporators, of whom Tietjen was one, subscribing each for 5 shares of such common stock. On the same day the incorporators, acting by proxy, elected five directors, of whom Tietjen was one, and on the same day, at Wilmington, Del., by the affirmative vote of all present, adopted a resolution reciting the option and its acceptance; also an offer by the optionees to sell and assign the option and all rights thereunder to the new corporation, in consideration of the issue to the optionees of 2,250 shares of no par value common stock, and authorizing the board of directors to purchase the option at the price stated and to issue such stock in payment; also to carry out the option according to its terms, and purchase the plant and assets in question, and give a mortgage thereon to secure the bonds before referred to; and to issue in payment for the plant and assets the preferred stock and no par value common stock and mortgage bonds in amounts provided in the option.

[49] The present provision of the Federal Bankruptcy Act dealing with jurisdiction of appellate courts appears in 52 Stat. 854, 1938, 11 U.S.C.A. § 47.

On June 1, 1920, at its first meeting (at Louisville), the board of directors (Tietjen not voting) adopted a resolution accepting the offer of the optionees to sell the option, approving the terms thereof, and authorizing the president and secretary to accept and carry it out, to make and deliver all necessary agreements for the purchase of the property, and specifically authorizing and directing those officers to issue to the optionees certificates for the no par value common stock, and to the order of the Louisville Trust Company, trustee, certificates for the no par value common stock and the full-paid and nonassessable preferred stock, and the mortgage bonds in the same amounts as were provided by the option and by the stockholders' action, said preferred and common stock (full-paid and nonassessable) and bonds to be in full payment for said property, in accordance with the terms of said option; also authorizing the executive committee of the board to borrow on the company's behalf $50,000 and to pledge as collateral security for the payment thereof the remaining $50,000 of the company's first mortgage bonds. The president and secretary were later authorized by the executive committee to execute and deliver the notes and agreement on consideration of the payment of such $50,000. The trust company received and retained the certificates for both classes of stock. The certificates for the 2,250 shares of no par value common stock were issued to Tietjen, and by him endorsed and delivered to respondent J. Walter Bell, who continued to hold or control them. A considerable sum was expended in altering or rebuilding the plat and putting it into operable condition, and for several months the transaction of business by the new company was attempted; but on January 19, 1921, it was adjudged bankrupt.

Meanwhile, J. Walter Bell had advanced $50,000 to the new company for the purposes stated in the option agreement, and had taken as security therefor the remaining $50,000 of mortgage bonds, which he claims to have sold to his wife, the respondent Phyllis W. Bell, J. Walter Bell also claims to have advanced to the bankrupt a further sum of $65,153.22, the claim wherefor he assigned to the respondent Ira L. McCord. At bankruptcy sale the trust company bid in the entire of the bankrupt's property, paying into court the stipulated value of the free assets, so leaving available for distribution to general or unsecured creditors (amounting to approximately $220,000, including the deficiency mortgage claim of the trust company) not more than $7,000, after payment of wage claims, expenses of administration, and other priorities. Thereupon this proceeding was instituted by the trustee in bankruptcy for the recovery from the trust company, trustee, as for unpaid stock, of $50,000 on account of the preferred and $75,000 on account of the no par value common stock, and from Tietjen and J. Walter Bell, jointly and severally, for common stock liability, $225,000. Payment upon the claims of Ira L. McCord and Mrs. Bell was sought to be stayed pending the hearing of the main issues. After hearing upon the merits, the referee denied and dismissed the petition for assessment of stockholders' liability as to both preferred and no par value stock. Upon review the District Court affirmed the referee's order. The trustee in bankruptcy seeks review of the action of the District Court both by appeal and by revision under section 24b of the Bankruptcy Act [11 U.S.C.A. § 47, sub. b.] * * *

4. The Common Stock.—Section 20 of the Delaware statute [59] [Rev.Code Del.1915, § 1934] already referred to in part, further declares that in the case of stock without par value, this liability (for unpaid portion of part-paid stock) shall be limited to the unpaid balance of the consideration for which the stock was issued by the corporation. As to the 750 shares of no par value common stock issued to the trust company, trustee, the referee thought that no consideration therefor was fixed by the board of directors; that stock was simply "thrown in" with the securities which had an ascertainable value, and therefore the 750 shares issued to the trust company, trustee, were void.

As to the shares issued to Bell and Tietjen, the directors expressly "adjudged and declared that said option is worth 2,250 shares of common stock of this company, without nominal or par value." The referee thought that a consideration was thus found by the board in the value of the option taken over by the bankrupt, saying that, "while the option finally proved to be worthless, so did the common stock." We find it unnecessary to consider whether the referee correctly treated the 750 shares as void, nor whether, as contended by the trustee in bankruptcy, the option failed to furnish a lawful consideration for the issue of stock under the Delaware constitution, as being neither cash, labor, personal property, real property, nor leases thereof.

---

[59] Del.Rev.Code 1915, § 20, infra, p. 357.

In ultimate legal effect, the promoters and incorporators determined that, if this manufacturing experiment succeeded, those organizing it and contributing to its success were entitled to share the net earnings (above dividends on preferred stock), and, in case of corporate dissolution, the net assets remaining after payment of debts, in the proportions represented by the respective amounts of the no par value stock given. If it be thought that the corporate action, considered in its entirety, failed to declare "the consideration for which the stock was issued by the corporation," or that such consideration was extralegal, what is the result? We find no warrant whatever for the contention of the trustee in bankruptcy that he thereby became entitled to recover from those engaged in this unsuccessful experiment such an amount as may be found necessary to meet the payment of creditors' claims and the expenses of bankruptcy administration. State legislation providing for no par value stock was inaugurated more than 10 years ago. Numerous states have since made similar provision. The wisdom of this legislation is not before us, although we are not to be understood as discrediting it. Indeed, very many competent jurists and financiers regard the evils of no par value stock less than those frequently incident to the issue and sale of stock having a par value. In at least three states, Delaware corporations having stock with no par value have been held qualified to do business. North American Petroleum Co. v. State Charter Board, 105 Kan. 161, 181 P. 625; State ex rel. Standard Tank Car Co. v. Sullivan, 282 Mo. 261, 221 S.W. 728; Detroit Mortg. Corporation v. Secretary of State, 211 Mich. 320, 178 N.W. 697, 182 N.W. 526.

We are cited to no authority, nor have we found any, supporting the right to the recovery asserted by the trustee in bankruptcy. On the contrary, the generally, if not universally, accepted theory of the purpose of such statutes is that they are intended to do away with both the "trust fund" and "holding out" doctrines. We refer in the margin to three valuable and interesting articles in the American Bar Association Journal[51] upon the subject of no par value stock. As Mr. Cook says:

"The whole theory of stock without par value is 'let the buyer beware' and 'let the creditor beware.' "

Granting that the courts should compel the payment of the consideration for which the no par value stock was issued by the corporation, it would seem, not only that the consideration contemplated by the corporation and its promoters has been paid, but also that the no par value stock had no tangible value.

We have found it unnecessary to consider all of the interesting suggestions and arguments presented.

The decree of the District Court is affirmed.[52]

---

51 Colton, Par Value versus No Par Value Stock, 1921, 7 A.B.A.J. 671; Cook, Stock Without Par Value, 1921, 7 A.B.A.J. 534; Hollen and Tuttle, Uses of Stock Having No Par Value, 1921, 7 A.B.A.J. 579.

52 Certiorari denied 264 U.S. 585, 44 S.Ct. 334, 68 L.Ed. 862, 1923. On the liability to creditors of holders of non-par stock, see Berle, Problems of Non Par Stock, 1925, 25 Col.L.Rev. 43, 52; Bonbright, Dangers of Shares Without Par Value, 1924, 24 Col.L.Rev. 449; Masterson, Consideration for Non Par Shares and Liability of Subscribers and Stockholders, 1939, 17 Tex.L.Rev. 247.

ATLANTIC REFINING CO. v. HODGMAN et al. SUPERIOR OIL CORPORATION v. SAME.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Third Circuit, 1926.
13 F.2d 781.

Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the District of Delaware.

Suit by Marshall Hodgman and others against the Atlantic Refining Company and the Superior Oil Corporation. From a decree for plaintiff (300 F. 590), defendants separately appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

See, also, 2 F.2d 893, and 8 F.2d 777.

BUFFINGTON, CIRCUIT JUDGE. This bill was brought by individual stockholders of the Superior Oil Corporation, hereafter called Superior, against the Atlantic Refining Company, hereafter called Atlantic, to enforce rights of the former company against the latter. The majority stockholders of Superior and the officers of Superior having declined to seek such relief, the bill was brought by the plaintiff stockholders against Atlantic, and Superior also was made a defendant.

Aligning the parties according to interest, the real plaintiff before us and the party whose rights are to be proven and established is the Superior Oil Corporation and the real right of action here involved is the right, if any, of that company against the Atlantic Company. Viewing the action, then, as that of Superior against Atlantic, what are the rights of Superior against Atlantic, and what are the responsibilities of Atlantic to Superior? If we correctly determine the rights and obligations of these two corporations to each other, we have the foundation on which this case must properly be adjudged.

Superior was a corporation of the state of Delaware, and by virtue of its corporate powers was engaged in the production and sale of petroleum. Atlantic was a corporation of the state of Pennsylvania, and, in addition to producing oil, was engaged in manufacturing illuminating and lubricating oils and other products of petroleum. Contemplating an expansion of its business by buying additional oil properties, Superior, on March 4, 1920, secured from Atlantic, a loan of $2,750,000. This was effected by a contract of that date between Superior, Atlantic, and the former's president, Robert M. Catts, designated trustee, "for the sole purpose of carrying out the terms and conditions of this contract duly authorized by the board of directors" of Superior. * * * the gist of the contract was that Superior was acquiring further oil properties, and was taking them in the name of its president, Catts, as trustee; that Atlantic was advancing the funds to Catts to acquire such properties; that Superior was assuming the debt; that to pay it Superior was setting aside one-third of its production at the prices set by the Seep Agency; that in case of default it was turning over its property and management to Atlantic until its debt was paid; and that, pending the loan, Superior was, for the purpose of Atlantic's protecting its loan, allowing on its board a director nominated by Atlantic, who had no financial interest in Superior.

Meanwhile one-third of Superior's income was by contract allocated to the loan, another one-third to specific work heretofore noted, leaving but one-third free for Superior Control. * * * Superior was, from the start, falling behind in its daily payment of $2,750 required by the contract. * * *

With this contract in force, which left Superior with a limited working capital, without power to increase its capital stock or to finance the acquisition of additional properties, Superior found itself in a condition which it outlined in a letter of May 29, 1920, wherein the facts are stated, viz.: (1) That its "early operations were comparatively limited in scope, and it was deemed wise to increase the area of its producing properties"; (2) in view of its "pipe line capacity, which is now materially in excess of present production"; and (3) that it should have "additional working capital provided through sale or exchange of 1,118,478 shares of new stock". * * * a conditional contract, dated June 24, 1920, covering Superior's production for 10 years, by Atlantic, was entered into. * * * this contract provided that, if Superior paid off its debt to Atlantic, then Atlantic's contract to take Superior's product for 10 years then, and then only, came into effect. * * *

* * * to enable Superior to finance its plan (to issue new stock) and thus acquire the additional oil property needed to pay off its daily loan requirement and obtain new capital, four things were necessary: (1) To induce Atlantic to exchange its indebtedness for stock; (2) to tie up its stock so acquired for two years; (3) to take Superior's entire product for 10 years instead of 5; and (4) to assume the management of Superior's properties. * * * these were the bankers' requirements * * *

* * * when this contract for 10 years' oil production was being considered by Superior at the directors' meeting * * * Director Henry, who * * * was the representative of Atlantic on Superior's board to safeguard its loan, stated that his company, "provided that so to do in any instance would not work to its own disadvantage, would at any time be glad to waive its right so to purchase under the terms of the contract, if the Superior Company deemed it advantageous to sell that oil elsewhere." * * *

* * * no contract between Atlantic and Superior other than the 10-year oil provisional contract based on the bankers' requirement, had resulted therefrom when, on August 5, 1920, the corporate written contract between Atlantic and Superior here involved was made. On that day * * * a letter of Atlantic to Superior was presented at the directors' meeting, as follows: "* * * Gentlemen: The undersigned company, under agreements with your company, to which we refer, has loaned and advanced moneys for the purchase of properties by your corporation and the charges and expenses incident thereto incurred by your corporation and ourselves. We are informed that Messrs. Brown Brothers White, Weld & Co., Graham, Parsons & Co., and Frazier & Co., proposed to loan your corporation the sum of $2,-910,000, and to accept in payment thereof, under certain contingencies, 181,875 shares of stock of the Superior Oil Corporation.

"We hereby offer to accept 325,000 shares of the stock of your corporation, issued full-paid and nonassessable in full payment of the principal sum of all your indebtedness to us, * * * Our acceptance is conditional upon your delivery to the aforementioned firms of 181,875 shares of your stock in payment of their loan to you, and furthermore conditional upon the aforementioned firms' purchase from your corporation 81,500 shares at $16 per share. Subject to the approval of your board of directors, we will accept from R. M. Catts, trustee, 86,666 shares of your capital stock now held by us as part payment of the 325,000 shares we offer to accept, leaving certificates for 283,334 shares of your stock to be delivered to us. * * *

"This offer is made subject to the resolution of your board of directors * * * and without in any way affecting our contract of June 24, 1920, with your corporation for the purchase of crude petroleum for the period of ten years.

"The Atlantic Refining Company,

"By (signed) W. M. Irish, Vice President."

"Thereupon, on motion duly made and seconded, it was unanimously resolved, that the board of directors hereby accept the offer of the Atlantic Refining Company * * * upon the terms thereof: * * *"

In pursuance of this resolution, an account was stated which showed Superior was entitled to credits on its indebtedness of $295,787.78. This sum, deducted from its indebtedness to Atlantic, which Atlantic paid to Superior by check * * * left Superior's indebtedness to Atlantic $2,750,000, which made the cost to Atlantic of the 325,000 shares of stock about $8.54 per share. * * * this contract obtained for Superior from Atlantic additional funds, and enabled it to pay off its debt to Atlantic, and thereby make the conditional 10-year contract an absolute one, * * * * * * very shortly trouble arose in the newly constituted management, which, on November 20, 1920, resulted in Catts, the president of Superior, writing a letter to the executive committee of the latter, objecting to a continuation of what he termed dual management, namely, the executive committee and himself. Thereupon the Atlantic Company, which was advised of such situation, notified Superior of its willingness to rescind the new contract, the 10-year oil contract, surrender its stock, and restore the status of debtor and creditor as they had existed. This offer * * * was not accepted by Superior * * *

The proofs show that oil was then selling between $4.25 and $4.50 per barrel, and the stock of Superior was selling at from $11 to $12 per share. On February 18, 1921, certain stockholders of Superior notified that company that this acquisition of stock of Superior by Atlantic at $8 per share, when the company was realizing $16 from others, was "unlawful and invalid, that a great injustice was done to the Superior Oil Corporation, and that a large loss was suffered by it. It is the imperative duty of the directors and officers of the Superior Company to see that this injustice is righted, that the transaction is rescinded, and that the resultant loss to the Superior Oil Corporation shall be recovered, and toward that end I demand of the officers and directors of the Superior Oil Corporation that proper actions be promptly instituted by them in the courts * * *" The notice also alleged that the 10-year oil contract was unlawful, in that it was procured by Atlantic when a majority of Superior's directors were agents of Atlantic, and when Superior's board of directors was dominated by Atlantic. On Superior's failing to bring suit, the present action was brought by such shareholders in behalf of Superior. * * *

* * * the trial court found that Superior had no legal power to sell the stock in question at $8 per share and that Atlantic, in paying $8 a share for such stock, perpetrated a fraud on Superior. After a full argument of the case and due consideration, we are of the opinion the court, in so doing fell into error, and that it should have dismissed the bill. * * *

We turn next to the alleged wrong done to the stockholders of Superior. The outstanding stock of Superior was over 900,000 shares. What is their attitude towards this alleged fraud? The holders of some 10,000 shares of the stock bring this bill, alleging fraud in this contract, while, leaving entirely out the 325,000 shares owned by Atlantic, which took no part in such action, the holders of 137,161 shares of the stock, in person or by proxy, attended a stockholders' meeting held on March 28, 1922, and voted unanimously in approval of the action of Superior in declining the offer of Atlantic of December 20, 1920, to return the stock purchased by Atlantic, to rescind the 10-year production contract and restore the pre-August, 1920, status.

Deferring, for a later consideration, the alleged misrepresentations, fraudulent concealments, and other acts which are said to have brought about this contract, and confining ourselves to the contract as a contract to sell stock of the same issue to different persons at different prices, we address ourselves to the charge of the bill, viz.: "Your orators are informed and believe, and therefore allege, that the transaction by which the refining company acquired said 325,000 shares of the capital stock of the Superior was in violation of the statutes of Delaware in such case made and provided, and it was therefore illegal and ultra vires." Since the decree was entered below, the case of Bodell v. General Gas & Electric Corporation, 15 Del.Ch. 119, 132 A. 442, in which the Court of Chancery of Delaware considered the action of a Delaware corporation in selling stock of the same issue at different prices to different persons, has been decided. It is therefore due to the court below to say that this court has the benefit of an enlightening and authoritative pronouncement which the lower court did not have. Without quoting at length from the exhaustive opinion there delivered, we confine ourselves to such references as particularly apply to our case. To our mind, the basic principle of that case, which permits such different stock prices to different persons, is summed up by the chancery court in these words:

"The mere showing of the two prices would, without satisfactory explanation, undoubtedly entitle the complainants to relief. But, if these two prices are justified by a showing of fairness in the light of all the circumstances, so that what appears to be an injury turns out to be a benefit to those complaining, there can be no ground for interference. If the directors, in the course they are pursuing, are acting in genuine and beneficial interest of the corporation, and are thereby promoting the interests of all stockholders in a very tangible way, and especially the interests of the class of stockholders who are complaining, why should not the general principles applicable to persons standing in trust relationships come to their supporting aid?"

In that case, as in this, there was the element of the requirement of bankers marketing the stock and also the sale of some stock to certain persons at $25, which factors enabled the bankers to market the residue of the stock at $45. Of this situation, the chancery court says:

"This policy, it is claimed, made the sale of the additional stock an easy matter, for, in addition to the regular dividend of $1.50 a year which the stock was paying, the announced policy held out to purchasers the prospect, just referred to, of making a profit on the stock they might take at $25 for their regular dividends. Thus, to use an old expression, the stock lifted itself by its own boot straps. If the value of $45 per share is thus created by the combined action of the announced policy and the creation of market prices by the sustaining operations of the bankers on the exchange, it is manifest that $45, the price which was concurrently obtained by the corporation when it was announced that class A dividends would be allowed to buy it at $25 per share, does not represent a sales price which the directors can in fairness be held to. It would be highly unreasonable to point to sales at $45 as showing the inadequacy of sales at $25, if the latter was what in fact made the former possible."

It will thus be seen that, while an arbitrary sale of the same issue of stock at different prices to different parties at the same time is prima facie bad, sales will be sustained, if based on business and commercial facts, which, in the exercise of fair business judgment, lead directors to follow such a course.

Under the proofs in this case, we think the situation was one that necessarily gave the directors of Superior a zone of discretion as to this proposed issue of stock. Superior was in debt, and its oil production was not sufficient to make the stipulated payments on its debt to Atlantic, and consequently Atlantic had the right, in case of default, at the dates stipulated in the contract, to take possession of its property and manage it until its debt was paid. Superior felt the need of buying more oil property to increase its production and to increase its working capital. Nor could Superior increase its stock to accomplish these objects, for the contract provided "that, so long as any part of said loan of $2,750,000 and interest remains unpaid, the capital stock of Superior shall not be increased." The only way it could pay off its creditor was to induce Atlantic to convert its debt into stock. On the other hand, the bankers who would underwrite the stock would not do so unless Atlantic did three things: First, undertake the management of Superior; second, agree to take for 10 years, at market prices, Superior's entire present and to be acquired oil production; and third, tie up the bought Superior stock for two years. Under such circumstances, and in view of the fact that the bankers would not underwrite the issue unless these conditions were complied with, it is clear that the sale of stock to Atlantic at $8 secured for Superior the $16 from the bankers, and that the making of such sales at different prices was within the field of business discretion vested in the board of Superior's directors, under the quoted decisions of the Court of Chancery, provided, of course, they acted in good faith. * * *

Taking up seriatim these alleged elements of fraud, we are clear that the issue or sale of this $8 stock by Superior was legal under the Delaware law. The stock was no par stock; it was not a sale or issue under par, for example, not the case of a sale at $8 for a stock of a greater par value; and under Delaware corporate law $8 was a legal basis which justified its issue. Its sale at $8 being justified, the further question arises: Was the $8 stock illegal, because stock of the same issue was, by the same general transaction, sold at the same time to others at $16? As we have seen elsewhere, sales made at different prices are lawful under Delaware law, if made by the company for fair and adequate business and administrative reasons. Such being the fact in this case, the first alleged ground of fraud fails, unless Superior was deceived and misled into the belief that, by its contract of August, Atlantic was paying $16 a share for its stock; in other words, that, instead of being paid by Atlantic $2,750,000 for its stock, it was being paid $5,500,000. * * *

On the part of Atlantic, that company burdened itself by contracting to handle the entire product of Superior for 10 years; by contracting to buy and handle that product when oil was at low figures and a drug on the market, and in point of fact oil which was at a peak price of over $4 per barrel when the August 1920, contract was made had fallen to somewhat over $2 just before this bill was filed; by assuming the whole management of Superior when it only owned one-third of its stock; by changing its position of creditor with assured periodic interest payments for that of stockholder with uncertain dividends; by tying up its stock for 2 years as that stock which others, during the tie-up period sold for $16, and indeed as high as $20.75 had only a value of some $6 when the tie-up expired. On the other hand, by these contracts, Superior got the money to pay off all its indebtedness, enable the bankers to sell its stock, and obtained working capital and funds to buy additional property. * * *

Decree reversed and bill dismissed.[53]

BODELL v. GENERAL GAS & ELECTRIC CORPORATION.

Court of Chancery of Delaware, 1926. 15 Del.Ch. 119, 132 A. 442.

Bill for injunction by Joseph J. Bodell and others against the General Gas & Electric Corporation to restrain the issuance of shares of stock. Rule discharged, and restraining order vacated.

---

53 Certiorari denied 273 U.S. 731, 47 S.Ct. 240, 71 L.Ed. 863, 1926.

The issuance of shares to bankers and promoters for corporate organization and reorganization is dealt with by Berle, Compensation of Bankers and Promoters Through Stock Profits 1929, 42 Harv.L.Rev. 748. See, also pp. 66 to 67, supra.

Injunction bill to restrain the issuance of shares of stock at twenty-five dollars a share to the extent of a quarterly dividend declared by the defendant upon its Class A common stock.

The defendant was organized July 15, 1925, for the purpose of taking over and refinancing two then existing public utility corporations organized under the laws of the State of Maine. The authorized capital stock of the defendant consists of 1,700,000 shares divided into two classes, preferred and common, all without nominal or par value. The authorized preferred is 500,000 shares. It is divided into two classes, each of which is entitled to a fixed cumulative dividend in dollars. The preferred stock is not concerned in this litigation and detailed description of its rights is not therefore called for.

The authorized number of common shares is 1,200,000 divided into 800,000 shares of Class A common stock, and 400,000 shares of Class B common stock. In addition to these stock provisions, the certificate of incorporation creates what is called 380,600 Dividend Participations.

The Complainants in the suit are holders of both class A and Class B common stock. They complain however in their character of Class B common stockholders.

In addition to about 135,000 shares of preferred stock of both classes outstanding, the corporation has issued 303,004.5 shares of its common stock, Class A, 203,888.4 shares of its common stock, Class B, and 379,332.8 Dividend Participations. Its preferred and common shares are traded in on the New York Stock Exchange.

The rights of the common stocks and the Dividend Participations are defined to be as follows: After the preferred dividends are provided for, the Class A Common Stock shall receive a dividend (non-cumulative) at the rate of $1.50 per annum, then the common stock, Class B, is entitled to receive a like dividend of $1.50 per annum, and in the case dividends are further declared from surplus of net profits Class A common, Class B common and the dividend participations are entitled to share equally therein.

Upon liquidation, the preferred stocks are preferred over all other classes to the extent of one hundred dollars per share plus accumulated and unpaid dividends thereon. Subject to such preference, Class A common is preferred over Class B common to the extent of twenty-five dollars per share, then Class B common receives twenty-five dollars per share, and thereafter any remaining assets are distributable between Classes A and B common in equal amounts. Upon liquidation the dividend participations receive nothing.

All quarterly dividends on the preferred stocks have been declared and paid to date.

When the corporation was formed, the Class A common stock was the particular stock from the sale of which its organizers planned to realize its principal financial requirements as occasion should arise from time to time. The business of the corporation being in the public utility field, it was anticipated that the need of additional funds would frequently be felt in the course of the development of its present properties and in the acquisition of new ones. Accordingly, the defendant in its answer avers that it was desired to make the Class A common stock attractive to the investing public. The original sale of this stock was of a block of 120,000 shares to bankers who, the answer avers, and the affidavit show, were informed by the offering corporation that dividends would commence on said stock at the next dividend date fixed therefor at the rate of $1.50 per annum and that the corporation would offer to the holders of said Class A common stock the right to subscribe to stock of the same class at twenty-five dollars per share to the extent of the dividend. This right to subscribe is claimed to have had the effect of making the Class A common stock highly attractive to investors, so much so that the corporation has been able to receive for all of its Class A common stock originally and subsequently issued an average of nearly forty-two dollars per share and the market price of the stock has ranged between fifty dollars and sixty-four dollars per share. On July 16, 1925, the corporation agreed with the bankers that the first dividend on Class A stock might be used to subscribe for Class A stock at twenty-five dollars a share, as before stated. An announcement to this effect was made by publication in leading newspapers once in August, 1925, and four times in September.

The first dividend date was October 1, 1925. The holders of Class A common stock were advised by letter that they might subscribe for stock of the same kind at twenty-five dollars per share to the extent of their dividends, provided subscriptions were received by the transfer agent on or before September 21, 1925. In the absence of subscription, the letter said that the dividend would be paid in cash.

Complainants were holders of Class A common stock and elected to exercise their option to use their dividends in payment for further stock at the price named in the letter. A total of 2,003 shares of Class A common stock was issued to stockholders in exercise of their options under the October 1 dividend declaration.

On September 30, 1925, the officers of the corporation notified the bankers that in their opinion the policy adopted by the directors of allowing owners of common stock Class A to have the privilege of investing their regular dividends in additional Class A common stock at twenty-five dollars per share, was in the interest of the corporation and one that should be continued.

On November 4, 1925, the directors resolved to issue more of the Class A common stock, and to give to stockholders of all classes the right to subscribe therefor at forty-five dollars per share on the basis of one share for each ten shares held at the close of business on November 20, 1925.

On November 11, 1925, an offer was made to all classes of stockholders in accordance with the resolution of November 4. About 48,000 shares were subscribed for in response to this offer and in due course issued. The offering letter contained the two following paragraphs which because of their importance are quoted in full:

"It is also the intention of the corporation to offer to the holders of its common stock, Class A, who shall be entitled to the dividend payable January 2, 1926, the right to subscribe to additional shares of common stock, Class A, to the amount of the dividends to which they are so entitled at the price of twenty-five (25) dollars per share, and arrangements will be made with the transfer agent so that the stock applicable to such dividend will be forwarded to the stockholder in lieu of the cash, unless the transfer agent is notified to the contrary.

"The officers and directors of the corporation believe that this policy of offering the right to subscribe to the extent of the dividends of this stock should be continued unless some change in business or financial conditions requires its modification or abandonment."

The declared intention contained in the foregoing letter was followed by a resolution adopted on December 4, 1925, by which a quarterly dividend of thirty-seven and one-half cents a share was declared on the Class A common stock payable on January 2, 1926, and stockholders were given the right to use their dividends in payment for additional shares of the same stock at twenty-five dollars per share to the extent of their dividends. Class A common stockholders were by letter dated the same day notified of the declaration of this dividend. The letter so notifying them contained the following paragraph:

"Holders of common stock, Class A, are given the right to subscribe to additional shares of common stock, Class A, of this corporation at the price of $25.00 per share to the extent of the dividends payable to them on January 2, 1926. The Equitable Trust Company of New York, transfer agent, will deliver to each of the holders of common stock, Class A, entitled to the dividend payable January 2, 1926, common stock, Class A, or scrip certificates therefor, equivalent in amount, taken at $25.00 per share, to the number of dollars of dividends to which each such stockholder would be entitled, unless advised by such stockholder on or before December 21, 1925, that such stockholder does not exercise the right of subscription to which he is entitled and requests the payment of the dividend in cash."

In response to this offering something like 4,310 shares of common stock, Class A, were subscribed, but their issuance was restrained by order of the Chancellor upon the filing of the bill and pending a hearing on a rule for preliminary injunction.

On December 4, 1925, the book value of Class A common stock is admitted to be over twenty-five dollars per share—how much over twenty-five dollars per share is not stated. Class A common stock has been traded in, first on the New York Curb and since on the New York Stock Exchange. Its price since the incorporation of the defendant in July, 1925, down to January 18, 1926, as shown by market quotations has ranged from a low of about fifty dollars to a high of sixty-four dollars, and on the last mentioned date was about fifty-eight dollars per share. The current quotation is now shown to be about forty-eight dollars per share.

No charge of personal gain or fraud of any kind is made against the directors. They are owners of Class B common stock. None of them is interested in Class A common except to the extent of twenty-five shares owned by one director.

The bill was filed on December 23, 1925. It seeks particularly to enjoin the corporation from carrying out its notified intention of allowing the holders of the Class A common stock to receive additional shares of Class A common at the rate of twenty-five dollars per share to the extent of their dividends; and generally to enjoin the defendant from issuing to the holders of its common stock, Class A, additional shares of such stock at less than the fair value thereof, unless there shall have been paid or set apart for payment, to the holders of common stock, Class B, during any calendar year, dividends at the rate of $1.50 per share per annum, and unless such additional shares are issued to holders of said common stock, Class B, upon the same terms as they are issued to the holders of common stock, Class A.

Upon the filing of the bill a rule to show cause why a preliminary injunction should not issue enjoining the defendant from issuing Class A common stock to holders of that class of stock at twenty-five dollars per share to the extent of their dividends, as it was the declared intention of the corporation to do. A temporary restraining order to like effect was issued.

The rule to show cause now came on to be heard upon bill, answer and affidavits.

THE CHANCELLOR. The complainants state their contention in this case under two heads. They are, (a) the practice complained of constitutes a conscious offer of no par value stock below its fair sales value, and, like all such offers, is illegal; and (b) even if a conscious offer of no par value stock below its fair sales value may be legal if made to certain persons, it is illegal if made to the A stockholders alone in addition to their quarterly cash dividends of thirty-seven and one-half cents per share and before the B stockholders have received $1.50 per share. No attempt will be made in the ensuing opinion to divide the discussion into two parts corresponding to the two headings. The general discussion which follows will, however, disclose my views upon both branches of the argument.

The principal statutory provision with which we are concerned in this case is found in section 4a of the General Corporation Law [34 Del.Laws, c. 112]. That provision is, as follows:

"Such capital stock without nominal or par value * * * may be issued by the corporation from time to time for such consideration as may be fixed from time to time by the board of directors thereof, pursuant to authority conferred in the certificate of incorporation or in any amendment thereof, or if such certificate or amendment thereof shall not so provide, then by the consent of the holders of two-thirds of each class of stock then outstanding," etc.[54]

This language appears in the section authorizing the creation of stock without nominal or par value, which section was first adopted as a part of the Corporation Law by the act approved March 20, 1917 (29 Del.Laws, c. 113). By this act, the plan of no par stock was permitted with respect to common stock only. Now, however, by virtue of an amendment approved April 2, 1925 (34 Del.Laws, c. 112), no par stock is allowed as well with respect to preferred stock. The quoted language, whether the stock be an issue of common or of preferred, is applicable.

---

[54] Cf. Del.Rev.Code 1935, § 14.

Here we are not concerned with any question relating to the two classes of preferred stocks of this corporation. The controversy has solely to do with the right of the directors to issue no par common stock A to present holders of that stock, for the consideration of twenty-five dollars per share to the extent of their dividends while at practically the same time they offer to sell and succeed in selling to all other classes of stockholders, or in the alternative to underwriting bankers, a much larger number of shares of the same kind of stock at forty-five dollars per share.

The certificate of incorporation confers upon the directors authority to issue the stock. The provision in the quoted language concerning the necessity of consent on the part of two-thirds of its stockholders is therefore not involved in the case.

Nor is the general preemptive right of stockholders to subscribe for stock involved in the consideration of the case. The complainants in their reply brief concede this.

Stock without nominal or par value, though not a new feature in corporate structures, has had a distinct revival in recent times. Until a few years ago, capital shares were almost invariably, if not entirely, associated in this country with the conception of a par value expressed in dollars. When the plan of issuing shares without nominal or par value was adopted by this and other states, it was certainly intended by the legislative authority to introduce into the characteristics of such stock qualities which capital stock, in the theretofore existing conception of the term did not possess. Our Superior Court in State ex rel. Radio Corporation of America v. Benson, 2 W.W.Harr. 576, 128 A. 107 observed that "shares of no par stock represent aliquot or proportionate parts of the capital." This same statment might also be made of shares having a par value. What the Superior Court meant to emphasize by the quoted language doubtless was, not that no par shares were in the particular of proportionate ownership distinguishable from shares having a par, but that with respect to this feature the no par shares on their face, unlike par value stock, contained no reference to a dollar value. Thus the holder of no par shares would see from the certificate itself that he was only an aliquot sharer in the assets of the corporation, whereas if the shares were of the par value type the holder might in looking at the dollar value be beguiled into the thought that what he had was shares of actual value equal at least to the par denomination in dollars. Upon the feature now being considered, the difference between stock of a par value and of no par value, upon analysis consists not in a difference with respect to a proportionate or aliquot share in the corporation's assets and business, but in the fact that in the case of the latter this character of proportionate interest is not hidden beneath a false appearance of a given sum in money. It is of course common knowledge that though a stock may have a par value of one hundred dollars, it may, because of its aliquot nature, be worth that, or more, or less, dependent upon the value of the entire assets of the company. The frankness of no par value shares in claiming nothing more for themselves than an aliquot share of the assets without reference to a dollar value, is one of the things that has commended them to the favorable notice of their advocates. But this particular difference between the modern no par stock and its companion, the par value stock, is not of particular moment here.

Another difference between the two, which is more to the point in the instant case and of quite vital interest in considering the question of law with which we are here concerned, has to do with the consideration which is required to be exacted by the corporation for the issuance of its stock. The introduction into our law of stock without par value has not of course resulted in allowing a different kind of consideration to be received for it from that which has heretofore been required for par value stock. In other words, whether the stock have a par value or none, it still remains true that—

"No corporation shall issue stock, except for money paid, labor done or personal property, or real estate or leases thereof actually acquired by such corporation." Article 9, § 3, Constitution of Delaware.

As to the kind or quality of consideration for which stock may be issued, no par stock is in exactly the same situation as is stock having a par value.

But upon the point of amount of consideration, there is a distinct and pronounced difference between the two. With respect to par value stock the law sets up a standard in dollars with which the consideration given must square itself. That standard is of course the par value of the shares issued. It is this feature of par stock which, more than the other one of lack of frankness above referred to, served doubtless to induce those interested in corporate activities to advocate the idea of stock without nominal or par value. The manifest danger of an overvaluation of assets given in exchange for par value stock and the risk of liability consequent thereon in the cases of both new and going concerns, and the rigid strait-jacket into which corporate financing by sales of stock of a going concern was placed if the actual value of its stock had fallen below par, were the prime considerations which prompted corporate organizers and managers to evolve some plan for stock issues which would liberate shares of stock from the thraldom of the par value feature. Whether the reasons advanced were sound ones and well-grounded in a wise public policy is not for me to say. The fact is that they prevailed with the Legislature of our State and now find the object which they were advanced to promote embodied principally in section 4a of our General Corporation Law.

That section does not set up a par value standard to which issues of stock authorized by it must comply. While the section does not attempt the vain thing of disturbing the constitutional requirement as to the kind and quality of consideration which must be given for stock, it does destroy absolutely the quantity of consideration which must underlie the shares of stock authorized to be created. Not more than one hundred shares of stock having a par of one hundred dollars can be issued for ten thousand dollars worth of consideration. But for the same amount of consideration any number of no par value shares may be issued. So far as the amount of consideration any number of no par value shares may be issued. So far as the amount of consideration is concerned it may be run out to an infinitesimal sum under each no par share. This is the literal meaning of the section. All the directors have to do, if they are given the power as they were here, is to fix the consideration. Its amount is of no moment. So far as the literal language of the section is concerned, the directors may from time to time issue no par stock for any consideration they may see fit, even though the price they fix is far below its actual value. For instance, if the outstanding no par stock is actually and demonstrably worth three hundred dollars a share, there is nothing in the statute which would prevent the directors from issuing additional stock to outsiders at ten dollars per share. What I am now pointing out is simply this—that the statute does not impose any restraint upon the apparently unbridled power of the directors. Whether equity will, in accordance with the principles which prompt it to restrain an abuse of powers granted in absolute terms, lay its restraining hand upon the directors in case of an abuse of this absolute power, is another question which will be presently considered and answered in the affirmative.

Just now I am endeavoring to point out that the section which deals with no par stock furnishes no yardstick, as in the case of par value stock, by which the amount of the consideration is to be measured. It does not substitute for the standard of a par value another standard, for instance, a real, or market, or book value. When, therefore, the complainants object that what the directors did in this case "constitutes a conscious offer of no par value stock below its fair sales value, and, like all such offers, is illegal," they cannot point to any language in the statute upon which to hinge their objection. The statute makes no mention of "sales value," or of any other similar thing to which no par stock issues must conform themselves.

But notwithstanding the absolute character of the language in which the power to the directors is expressed, it cannot be that a court of equity is powerless in proper cases to circumscribe it. The section requires the directors to fix the consideration. It certainly would be out of all reason to say that no court could review their action in fixing it. I do not understand the defendants to argue that the action of the directors in this particular is not reviewable. They do insist, however, that inasmuch as the matter of the issuance of the stock was placed by the certificate of incorporation in their control, the general principle which excludes stockholders from matters of management and accords to the acts of the directors a presumption in favor of their propriety and fairness, is to be here applied. This is true.[55]

There is no rule better settled in the law of corporations than that directors in their conduct of the corporation stand in the situation of fiduciaries. While they are not trustees in the strict sense of the term, yet for convenience they have often been described as such.[56] With respect to the unissued stock, they are said to control it as trustees. With respect to par value stock their duty is to authorize its issuance only for property equalling its full par value. But stock of the kind here involved has no par value. What consideration should the directors demand for its sale? In answering this question, it would seem that the answer should turn very largely upon the stage of the corporation's development at the time of the issuance.

---

55 See, Berle, Non Voting Stock and "Bankers Control", 1926, 39 Harv.L.Rev. 673.

56 See, Note, The Director of a Corporation as a Fiduciary, 1935, 20 Iowa L.Rev. 808.

If the corporation has just been formed, I do not see that it can make any difference how much or how little in the way of a consideration is received for its original no par stock, so long as the consideration is lawful in its quality. If the assets received are one thousand dollars in money, it is of no consequence whether five shares or ten shares, or ten thousand shares are given for it. Each share has its one-fifth or one-tenth or one-thousandth aliquot part of the thousand dollars as the case may be, and no one is damaged because everyone knows that under each share is simply its proportionate part of the total assets, unexpressed in terms of money.

But suppose after the corporation has been in business for some time and has built up a surplus above the assets originally received, then it is apparent that the price at which additional stock is issued does have a very material effect on the interests of the existing shareholders. If it is now desired to raise more capital by the sale of new shares, it is manifest that inasmuch as a new divisor for the total assets is to be found, it becomes of vital interest to the existing stockholders to see to it that the value of the fraction representing the present aliquot interest in the assets held by each is not diminished. This interest is so vital that courts have in other connections regarded it as an equity entitled to protection against action which threatens its impairment. It is the consideration, for instance, together with the equity that demands a preservation of the proportionate voting power in a corporation, upon which is founded the doctrine of the stockholder's preemptive right to subscribe for stock.[57] Gray v. President, etc., of Portland Bank, 3 Mass. 364, 3 Am.Dec. 156; Wall v. Utah Copper Co., 70 N.J.Eq. 17, 62 A. 533; Stokes v. Continental Trust Co., 186 N.Y. 285, 78 N.E. 1090, 12 L.R.A.N.S., 969, 9 Ann.Cas. 738. If new shares of a going corporation are to be sold and the price per share is less than the present value of each aliquot interest, and if the new shares go to outsiders or to a selected group of outsiders, those stockholders who are not permitted to subscribe are bound to suffer a diminution of the value of each proportionate interest held by them, unless they are allowed to take their proportionate part of the new shares. The doctrine of preemptive right has therefore been erected by equity for their protection in this regard. Nor does the fact that earnings have not yet accumulated alter the situation with respect to this doctrine, for as said by the courts in the cases just cited a shareholder's interest is confined not alone to present, but as well to anticipated increases in its earnings.

Notwithstanding therefore the absolute terms in which the power of the directors of this corporation to fix the price at which its unissued stock may be sold is expressed, equity will nevertheless by an analogy to that reasoning which underlies the doctrine of preemptive right interfere to protect existing stockholders from an unjustified impairment of the values underlying their present holdings, where it is proposed by the directors to fix the consideration for new shares of the no par value type. The power of the court to interfere, however, must be exercised in accordance with general equitable considerations, for the justification for its interference rests not on statutory provisions, but upon its broad equitable power to protect against wrongs. Take the glaring case put a moment ago, of a proposed sale by directors of stock of ten dollars a share which is demonstrably worth three hundred dollars a share. Surely no court on that bald showing of facts would allow the transaction to proceed. There could be no semblance of right in thus offering to others an equal equitable share in the assets belonging to existing stockholders without paying fairly therefor.

57 See, pp. 332 to 355, infra, on stockholders' preemptive rights.

Nor do I think that if the directors propose to sell stock to some persons at twenty-five dollars a share and at the same time are successfully marketing a much larger block of the same stock at forty-five dollars a share, the transaction on that bare showing can in the absence of satisfactory explanation stand, for common sense would suggest that if a large quantity could be made to produce forty-five dollars a share a smaller quantity ought not to be regarded as productive of only a possible twenty-five dollars a share. As before stated, directors are regarded as trustees in the matter of the disposal of unissued stock. It is not always necessary for them to reap a personal profit or gain a personal advantage in order for their actions in performance of their quasi trust to be successfully questioned. Trustees owe not alone the duty to refrain from profiting themselves at the expense of their beneficiaries. They owe the duty of saving their beneficiaries from loss. Cahall v. Burbage, 14 Del.Ch. 55, 121 A. 646; Allied Chemical & Dye Corporation v. Steel & Tube Co. of America, 14 Del.Ch. 1, 120 A. 486; Id., 14 Del.Ch. 64, 122 A. 142. And so here, if the sale of this stock to the Class A common stockholders at twenty-five dollars per share to the extent of their dividends (it would take about 4,000 shares) works out an injury to the holders of Class B common, the fact that the directors are gaining no advantage thereby is immaterial.

The complainants are necessarily resting their case on an equity which they erect and seek to impose on the statutory power of the directors. The equity is founded on the principles of fairness. If what is proposed to be done, however, is in fact not unfair nor unjust to the complainants, they cannot successfully claim relief. The cases which find an exception to the application of the doctrine of the stockholder's preemptive right to subscribe when no injury is seen, show that when the element of unfairness is absent, the doctrine is inapplicable. This but emphasizes the fact that questions of the type we are here considering are thrown into the broad general field of fair and just dealing, and are to be answered by equity in the light of those conceptions by which the acts of men are appraised as fair and just or otherwise.

The mere showing of the two prices would without satisfactory explanation undoubtedly entitle the complainants to relief. But if these two prices are justified by showing of fairness in the light of all the circumstances so that what appears to be an injury turns out to be a benefit to those complaining, there can be no ground for interference. If the directors, in the course they are pursuing are acting in the genuine and beneficial interest of the corporation and are thereby promoting the interests of all stockholders in a very tangible way and especially the interests of the class of stockholders who are complaining, why should not the general principles applicable to persons standing in trust relationships come to their supporting aid?

The injury which the complainants point out consists in this. They contend first that if a sales price for Class A common stock is established by sales at forty-five dollars, such price is the sum which directors must demand for all stock concurrently offered. Class B common is junior to Class A common both with respect to dividends and on liquidation. If less is realized for Class A than is fairly obtainable it is manifest, say the complainants, that less capital is brought in than would otherwise be possible and so Class B common would suffer in that less earnings would accrue from which Class B might hope for its junior dividend rights to be taken care of, and on liquidation less capital would be on hand for distribution and the amounts distributable to it thereby diminished. This in the main is the line of argument by which the complainants as holders of Class B Common stock seek to establish the injury which is done to their equity in this corporation.

Now on the other hand, the defendants point out that the policy heretofore adopted and proposed to be continued until conditions warrant a change, of allowing Class A common stock dividends to be used in subscribing for further stock at twenty-five dollars per share, has been the very thing which has enabled the corporation to sell its Class A common stock in large blocks at forty-five dollars a share and has caused it to sell on the exchange for from fifty dollars to sixty-four dollars a share. It has had this result they say for the following reasons. Class A common stock is entitled to a dividend of $1.50 a year ahead of Class B. This dividend in not cumulative. Class A common also has a right to further dividends equally with Class B common after the latter is paid $1.50 a year. It of course still had and has a prospective right to further possible dividend declarations. But these lie in the realm of possibilities, which are dependent upon earnings. The problem which the directors had before them was to induce the public to buy the Class A common at as high a figure as they thought could possibly be obtained. They fixed forty-five dollars a share as the price they thought they could obtain. Bankers were called in to make a market for the stock at that figure. They did so, selling 120,000 shares upon the organization of the company. The public was told that the first dividend could be used in buying further stock at twenty-five dollars a share. The stock which was thus sold at forty-five dollars was regarded by the purchasing public as yielding an immediate return of only $1.50 a year. That would be six per cent. on twenty-five dollars and only three and one-third per cent. on forty-five dollars, the price paid. Something, it is argued, must have been offered as an inducement to the public to persuade it to invest money on a three and one-third per cent. basis. The directors and bankers thought that the right to use dividends in further subscriptions at twenty-five dollars per share would supply the additional something to induce the investing public to buy. At at all events by the exercise of those methods which investment bankers are versed in, the stock was sold and at the same time, by those methods which investment bankers again are skilled in employing, the market quotations of the stock showed prices ranging from fifty dollars to sixty-four dollars per share. Thus the right to subscribe dividends for stock at twenty-five dollars per share held out the prospect to the stockholders on the basis of the issuing price of forty-five dollars a share, of making a profit of twenty dollars a share on the stock taken for dividends in case it was desired to sell it. The bankers of course played up this feature in marketing the stock and by their operations on the exchange created a price which subsequently made the prospect of profit even more inviting.

Now when it was desired to sell 48,000 more shares of Class A common, it was announced that the right to use dividends in subscribing for further shares of the same kind at twenty-five dollars would continue as a policy. This policy it is claimed made the sale of the additional stock an easy matter, for in addition to the regular dividend of $1.50 a year which the stock was paying, the announced policy held out to purchasers the prospect, just referred to, of making a profit on the stock they might take at twenty-five dollars for their regular dividends. Thus, to use an old expression, the stock lifted itself by its own bootstraps. If the value of forty-five dollars per share is thus created by the combined action of the announced policy and the creation of market prices by the sustaining operations of the bankers on the exchange, it is manifest that forty-five dollars, the price which was concurrently obtained by the corporation when it was announced that Class A dividends would be allowed to buy it at twenty-five dollars per share, does not represent a sales price which the directors can in fairness be held to. It would be highly unreasonable to point to sales at forty-five dollars as showing the inadequacy of sales at twenty-five dollars if the latter was what in fact made the former possible.

It is difficult of course for any one to measure in exact dollars the extent to which the announced policy has contributed to the price of forty-five dollars as well as to the market prices of this stock. That it had weight I have no doubt. The quotations of prices for certain insurance company stocks at figures far in excess of the usual investment bases, show how rights to take stock may contribute to market values. So, also, doubtless, is the market price of American Telephone & Telegraph Company's stock affected by the practice of that corporation in selling its new issues to stockholders at par. That the directors of the defendant company honestly believed that their policy of allowing Class A common dividends to be used to purchase further stock at twenty-five dollars a share would make a highly favorable price for that stock, the stock to which they looked for additional corporate funds, and more of which the development plans would require to be marketed, is not on the present showing to be doubted. A complete absence of selfish motive and of personal profit on their part forcefully argues that their judgment was formed in absolute honesty and entire good faith. If, as a result of the policy thus grounded, the corporation is able to secure funds from stock sales greatly in excess of the amount they otherwise could hope to realize, it is manifest that an advantage has been secured for the corporation and for all its stockholders. The directors take the view as disclosed by the answer and affidavits that the announced policy has in fact yielded such advantage in an exceedingly large amount. They think that if it were not for the policy in question the block of 48,000 shares recently sold would not have been marketed at much if any above twenty-five dollars per share. It is of course a difficult matter to market a quantity of stock of that volume. It would be fatuous to expect to get the quoted exchange price of fifty dollars or sixty-four dollars a share for it by the simple process of offering it for sale on the stock exchange. Such an offering would have caused the market in the stock to crash beneath its weight and in the end would have resulted in a sacrifice of the offered shares. Now in this situation it does not seem fair to say that the course the directors pursued did not result in securing a price substantially above, possibly twenty dollars a share above, the price which but for such policy could otherwise have been obtained. It being a matter appropriately lying within the field of that discretion which directors are recognized to control, I do not feel disposed in the absence of a showing of improper motive to assume to interfere with it.

What has been the result of this piece of financing? It is this—48,000 shares have been sold at forty-five dollars, and as a contributing cause making that price possible only 4,003 shares have been offered at twenty-five dollars. From the viewpoint of the Class A common stock, Class A shares which have a prior charge of $1.50 a year, or six per cent. on twenty-five dollars, have been placed at forty-five dollars a share. This corporation's money earns eight per cent. so the affidavits show. For each forty-five dollars received, therefore, the corporate treasury will annually earn $3.60 which after deducting the prior $1.50 per year on the Class A common which was sold leaves $2.10 a year available for the $1.50 a year dividend on Class B. To the extent that the absence of the policy referred to would result in reducing the obtainable price for the Class A stock below forty-five dollars, the benefit to Class B would be correspondingly reduced. Furthermore, in case of dissolution the price of forty-five dollars leaves twenty dollars for the Class B stock after paying Class A its liquidation value of twenty-five dollars. Thus again, to the extent that the forty-five dollar price is due to the policy referred to, Class B is benefited. It is to be noted also that the stock taken by the Class A dividends is required to pay a per share price which is equal to its own prior liquidation charge in case of dissolution, and in the meantime will at the eight per cent. rate of earnings yield fifty cents a year more than its own annual dividend requirement of $1.50. I do not pretend to say by what precise amount Class B common stock has been benefited by the policy of allowing Class A common stock to use its dividends in purchases at twenty-five dollars. That it has been considerably benefited, I cannot doubt on the showing made. The benefit may or may not have been to the extent of twenty dollars for every share sold as believed by the defendants. That is a matter of opinion, and there is no good reason shown why this court should upon that matter of opinion reject the judgment of the directors as unsound.

The equity upon which the complainants rely is founded on the conception that an injury is done them. If no injury appears, no equity exists. On the showing made it seems that instead of an injury a benefit has been conferred. While it has nothing to do with the merits of the cause, yet it is interesting to note that the directors themselves own no Class A common stock but do own about two-thirds of the common stock Class B, and if wrong is done to that class of stock the directors who have done it have visited most of its consequences upon themselves.

There remain a few observations to be made with respect to some of the contentions advanced at the argument and not before commented upon. Not only did the complainants point to the concurrent price of forty-five dollars per share received for Class A common stock, but they also pointed to the market range of from fifty dollars to sixty-four dollars on the New York Stock Exchange and the admission in the answer that the book value is above twenty-five dollars a share, as showing the fair value which the directors in exercising their duty of marketing new stock ought to have demanded. I have already tried to show why the forty-five dollar figure is an unsafe guide. So also is the figure indicated by market quotations. This is so for two reasons—first, because you cannot hope to dump large quantities of stock into an open market and expect to receive current prices therefor, and second, because there is no reliability to be placed in market quotations as showing true value. The case of Hodgman v. Atlantic Refining Co., D.C., 300 F. 590; Id., D.C., 2 F.2d 893, is cited in support of the proposition that the market value of stock is a proper criterion to accept as the price at which directors ought to issue similar stock. The case does not so hold. Market value was referred to in that case for the purpose of measuring damages and no more. That is an entirely different proposition from that with which we are here concerned. As market value cannot be accepted as a safe guide for the fixing of the sales value for unissued stock, so also neither can book value in itself be so accepted. A study of the quoted market values of stocks and their book values will disclose strange and striking inconsistencies in their relations to each other when the issues of various corporations are comparatively examined. We may accept the general proposition that managers of corporations ought to be required to market new issues of no par stock at prices that are fair to the corporation and existing stockholders and best calculated to yield the largest possible capital. These prices should be fixed in the light of all legitimate considerations such as appraised and sale value of assets, book values, market values of outstanding shares, present and probable earning power, market conditions, size of the issue, reputation of the corporation, and such exceptional considerations as honest and fair minded men might properly take into account. It would be hazardous to venture an examination of all the possible considerations which directors might take into account in fixing a price which will be fair to the corporation and its existing stockholders and best calculated to yield the largest possible capital. Whether in a given case they have fixed such price is a question which must be determined in the light of the particular conditions surrounding the transaction. Enough appears in this case to take from the transaction the appearance of unwarranted and unfair conduct which the sale of stock at the same time at two different prices would in the absence of explanation fasten upon it.

The complainants argued also that allowing the Class A common stockholders to use dividends in buying other Class A stock at twenty-five dollars a share amounts to a declaration of a dividend to them over and above the preference which the certificate of incorporation of the company allows as against the Class B common. I confess I cannot follow that argument. It seems to turn on the thought that the purchased shares can in turn be sold on the market at a profit above twenty-five dollars a share and thus the Class A common stockholder can realize out of his dividend of $1.50 a year more than that sum. The obvious answer to that is that while to be sure a profit can thus be made and the Class A stockholder obtain more than his dividend of $1.50 a year, the additional sum is not taken out of the earnings of the company. It is derived from the man to whom the stock is sold on the market. The question here is not one of dividends. It is one of capital —whether the directors are securing as much capital from the sale of stock as they ought to secure. That question I have already discussed.

The complainants make the further point that if the directors allowed the desire to create a forty-five dollar market for 48,000 shares to influence them in offering stock to Class A common stockholders at twenty-five dollars a share, then they permitted as an element of the consideration which the company was receiving for the latter something which is neither "money paid, labor done or personal property, or real estate or leases thereof actually acquired by the corporation," and so have admitted into the consideration for the stock something which lacks the quality of lawful consideration. This, however, appears to me to be fallacious. It is incorrect to describe this "something" as a part of the consideration. It was not a thing given by the subscriber for the twenty-five dollar stock. For that stock, twenty-five dollars and no more was the consideration given by the subscriber. This was "money paid," a lawful consideration. The other circumstance, the "something" referred to, was simply the reason and explanation for fixing the twenty-five dollar consideration in that amount.

The statute in section 4a provides that when the directors have the power to issue no par stock it—"may be issued * * * from time to time for such consideration as may be fixed from time to time by the board of directors."

I do not recall that any special emphasis was laid by the complainants at the argument on the phrase "from time to time" as of significance in the instant case. Here of course the two offerings were concurrent. In substance there was no interval of time between them. But this is of no moment. Prices at which no par stock is issued cannot be made to depend for their fairness upon the immaterial circumstance of the length of time intervening between the moments of their issuance. The phrase "from time to time" gives to the section this meaning—that no par stock may be issued at any time for such consideration as may be fixed by the directors at the time the issue is authorized.

An order will be entered discharging the present rule and vacating the outstanding restraining order. The conclusion herein reached is of course based on the present showing. What sort of case changed or added circumstances might present in the future would have to be answered in the light of the showing then presented in case challenge should be made of the propriety of the directors' action.[58]

NOTE

"Some possible objections to no-par stock which need more careful attention than the present laws give, are: First, the ease of inflation and the danger of manipulation by issuing large amounts of stock for property of little value; Second, the possibility of frauds on investors by diluting the stock already issued by subsequent issues at lower prices; theoretically the subscription price of the stock should be uniform and equal; at least in the beginning the subscriber should have some assurance that others will not pay less than he is required to pay; Third, the absence of any convenient basis of taxation for organization and franchise taxes[59]; Fourth, the lack of sufficient protection to creditors, only a small amount of capital usually being required to be paid in as a basis of financial responsibility at the start, with no provision for increase later." Ballantine, Stockholders' Lia-

---

58 Aff'd, 15 Del.Ch. 420, 140 A. 264, 1927; Masterson, Consideration for Non Par Shares and Liability of Subscribers and Stockholders, 1939, 17 Tex.L.Rev. 247, 282; 1926, 26 Col.L.Rev. 893.

The three preceding principal cases are considered by Wickersham, Stock without Par Value, 1927, 83–92.

For a discussion of the rights of holders of non-par stock to subscribe to a new issue of shares, see Berle, Problems of Non Par Stock, 1925, 25 Col.L.Rev. 43, 56.

59 54 Stat. 522, 26 U.S.C.A. Int.Rev.Code, § 1802: "Capital stock (and similar interests) (a) Original issue. On each original issue, * * * of shares or certificates of stock * * * by any corporation * * * where such shares or certificates are issued without par or face value, the tax shall be 10 cents until July 1, 1945, and 5 cents thereafter, per share * * * unless the actual value is in excess of $100 per share; in which case the tax shall be 10 cents until July 1, 1945 and 5 cents thereafter, on each $100 of actual value or fraction thereof * * * or unless the actual value is less than $100 per share, in which case the tax shall be 2 cents until July 1, 1945, and 1 cent thereafter, on each $20 of actual value, or fraction thereof, of such certificates * * *

(b) Sales and transfers. On all sales, or agreements to sell, * * * when such shares or certificates are without par or face value, the tax shall be 4 cents until July 1, 1945, and 2 cents thereafter, on the transfer or sale or agreement to sell on each share * * * Provided, That in case the selling price, if any, is $20 or more per share the above rate shall be 5 cents instead of 4 cents until July 1, 1945 * * *"

N.Y.Tax Law, § 180: "Organization Tax; Taxes on Changes of Capital. 1. Every stock corporation incorporated under any law of this state shall pay a tax * * * of five cents on each share without a par value which it is authorized to issue, and a like tax upon any shares subsequently authorized, except as hereinafter provided * * * in no case shall a tax under this section be less than ten dollars. Such tax shall be due and payable upon the incorporation and upon any subsequent authorization * * * or change of shares."

On taxation of non-par stock, see, Wickersham, Stock without Par Value, 1927, c. VI; Pierson, Stock Having No Par Value, 1922, 17 Ill.L.Rev. 173, 184; Rogers, Stamp Tax on Shares of No Par Value, 1922, 95 Cent.L.J. 448; Wickersham, The Progress of the Law on No Par Value Stock, 1924, 37 Harv.L.Rev. 464, 471; Wickersham, Taxation of No Par Value Stock, 1926, 39 Harv.L.Rev. 289; Note, 1929, 43 Harv.L.Rev. 194; 1922, 22 Col.L.Rev. 676; 1929, 29 Col.L.Rev. 1013.

bility in Minnesota, 1923, 7 Minn.L.Rev. 79, 95. See, also, Cook, The Principles of Corporation Law, 1925, 153–155; Ballantine, Nonpar Stock—Its Use and Abuse, 1923, 57 Am.L.Rev. 233; Bonbright, The Dangers of Shares Without Par Value, 1924, 24 Col.L.Rev. 449; Clay, Shares Without Par Value, 1925, 13 Ky.L.J. 274; Cook, Stock Without Par Value, 1921, 7 A.B.A.J. 534; Cook, "Watered Stock"—Commissions—"Blue Sky Laws"—Stock Without Par Value, 1921, 19 Mich.L.Rev. 583, 591–595.[60]

PAR AND NON-PAR STOCK

The invention of non-par stock and its adoption by New York in 1912 was supposed to have worked a revolutionary change in corporate procedure. But, in the light of the further developments in handling par stock, it is fairly questionable whether there is now as wide a difference between the two types of stock as was supposed.

When the par value of stock was set a generation ago, the par value was substantial. Conventionally, it was $100 per share though certain states authorized lower par values. On this par value were predicated various legal results, the most important being

(a) the doctrine that authorized but unissued par value stock could not be sold for less than par,—except under the rule of Handley v. Stutz (which, of course, left the burden of proof on the corporation to justify the necessity of the transaction);

(b) the doctrine that purchasers of par value stock of an original issue might be held liable to creditors or to the corporation in case the consideration they gave for the stock was later valued at less than the par value of the stock issued in return.

Stock without par value, it was thought, freed the transaction of issue from either danger. Since there was no fixed par, creditors could not claim an implied or other obligation to pay par value; and by its terms no-par stock could be issued for any consideration fixed by the corporation—subject only to whatever equitable restraint might be imposed by the common law rule of equitable contribution.

But the next development in par value stock supplied a practical answer. This was the amendment of incorporation laws so that the par value of shares might be virtually any amount chosen by the incorporators, instead of the old conventional figure of $100 or other substantial sum per share. Thus, in Delaware the par value may be as low as 1¢ per share; in New York, it may be as low as $1.00 per share. Yet the shares in fact were sold for prices far above this nominal par. The nominal par ceased to have any relation to the issue price of stock, which was actually determined by the corporation and its financial advisors on the basis of book value, past earnings, prospects, and so forth. Naturally, the lawyers guiding the incorporation set the par value so low that such stock rarely is issued at a price as low as par. The balance of the consideration over the par value of the shares thus issued became paid in or capital surplus.

This gave virtually complete flexibility in determining the issue price of such stock. The lowest limit on price issue was par; the upper limit was whatever the subscriber wished to pay. Since a corporation is under no obligation (other than as applied in the rule of equitable contribution) to demand any particular price from the original subscriber, and, conversely, the subscriber is under no obligation, implied or otherwise, to contribute more than the par value of the stock for the benefit of creditors, the double objective—flexible price and non-liability to creditors—could be achieved through the device of nominal value par, as well as through non-par stock. The statutory "capital" of a corporation thus organized is, of course, likely to be extremely low; its capital and surplus high; and the result gives substance to the comment of Sir W. S. Gilbert in his famous Bab ballad.

[60] For arguments in favor of non-par stock, see Dewing, The Financial Policy of Corporations, 4th Ed., 1941, Vol. I, 70–76; Allen, Non-Par Stock, 1920, 90 Cent. L.J. 170; Colton, Par Value versus No Par Value Stock, 1921, 7 A.B.A.J. 671; Hollen and Tuttle, Uses of Stock having No Par Value, 1921, 7 A.B.A.J. 579; Morawetz, Shares Without Nominal or Par Value, 1913, 26 Harv.L.Rev. 729; Pierson, Stock Having No Par Value, 1922, 17 Ill.L.Rev. 173; Rice and Harno, Non-Par Value Stock, 1922, 56 Am.L.Rev. 321; Shaffer, Organization of Companies Under the Non-Par Value Stock Act, 1921, 55 Am.L.Rev. 438.

In result, it may fairly be asked whether, now that nominal par value of stock is with us, there is a great difference between the two types. The possibilities of use (and abuse) of nominal value par stock appear to be about the same as those of true non-par stock (see list attached).

There are still certain advantages in having substantial par value for preferred stock in some jurisdictions, but these largely relate to the power of a corporation "to write off" its capital account, the "capital" "represented by" such preferred shares on their redemption or retirement. But even such advantages can usually be secured in other ways—for instance, by transfer of part of the capital surplus to capital account, and assigning it to the particular class of shares sought to be retired.

CORPORATIONS HAVING NOMINAL PAR VALUE STOCK

Eastern Airlines Incorporated (Delaware)

December 31, 1942	Outstanding 575,608 shares of $1.00 par value stock. Carried in Balance Sheet at $2,878,040. Notation made to the effect that $1.00 par shares are carried at stated value of $5.00 a share.

Dayton Rubber Manufacturing Company (Ohio)

October 31, 1942	Outstanding 176,839 shares of $1.00 par value stock. Carried in Balance Sheet at $438,622.

Fanny Farmer Candy Shops Inc. (New York)

December 31, 1942	Outstanding 354,819 shares of $1.00 par value stock. Carried in Balance Sheet at $763,822.

International Industries Inc. (Michigan)

July 31, 1942	Outstanding 403,600 shares of $1.00 par value stock. Carried in Balance Sheet at $421,126.

Roberts Public Markets Inc. (California)

June 30, 1942	Outstanding 54,645 shares of $1.00 par value stock. Carried in Balance Sheet at $239,398.

(c) Stockholder's Liability

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW.

§ 70. Liabilities of stockholders. Every holder of shares of stock not fully paid shall be personally liable to the creditors of the corporation, to an amount equal to the amount unpaid on the shares held by him for debts of the corporation contracted while such shares were held by him. The liability imposed by this section shall be in lieu of the liability imposed upon stockholders of any corporation existing prior to April sixteenth, nineteen hundred and one, under any general or special law, except laws relating to moneyed corporations; but nothing in this section shall create or increase any liability of stockholders of any such corporation under any special law.

§ 73. Limitation of stockholder's liability. No action shall be brought against a stockholder for any debt of the corporation until judgment therefor has been recovered against the corporation, and an execution thereon has been returned unsatisfied in whole or in part, and the amount due on such execution shall be the amount recoverable, with costs against the stockholder. No stockholder shall be personally liable for any debt of the corporation not payable within two years from the time it is contracted, nor unless an action for its collection shall be brought against the corporation within two years after the debt becomes due; and no action shall be brought against a stockholder after he shall have ceased to be a stockholder, for any debt of the corporation, unless brought within two years from the time he shall have ceased to be a stockholder.

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW.

Sec. 20. Stockholders Liability:—When the whole of the consideration payable for shares of a corporation shall not have been paid in, and the assets shall be insufficient to satisfy the claims of its creditors, each holder of such shares shall be bound to pay on each share held by him the sum necessary to complete the amount of the par value of such share as fixed by the charter of the company or its Certificate of Incorporation, or such proportion of that sum as shall be required to satisfy the debts of the corporation, or, in the case of stock without par value, this liability shall be limited to the unpaid balance of the consideration for which such shares were issued by the corporation. The amounts which shall be payable as hereinbefore in this Section provided may be recovered as provided for in Section 49 of this Chapter, after a writ of execution against the corporation has been returned unsatisfied, as provided for in Section 51 of this Chapter. Anything in this Chapter to the contrary notwithstanding, a holder of shares who has acquired such shares in good faith without knowledge that they were not paid in full or to the extent stated in the certificate for such shares shall not be liable either to the corporation or to its creditors for any amount beyond that shown by such certificate to be unpaid on the shares represented thereby; and any holder who derives his title through such a holder and who is not himself a party to any fraud affecting the issuance of such shares shall have all the rights of such former holder.

HOSPES et al. v. NORTHWESTERN MANUFACTURING & CAR COMPANY (MINNESOTA THRESHER MANUFACTURING COMPANY, INTERVENER.)

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1892. 48 Minn. 174, 50 N.W. 1117.

Sequestration proceedings by E. L. Hospes & Co. against the Northwestern Manufacturing & Car Company. The Minnesota Thresher Manufacturing Company intervened, and filed a complaint against George R. Finch and others, stockholders in the Northwestern Manufacturing & Car Company. From an order overruling demurrer to the intervener's supplemental complaint George R. Finch, the St. Paul Trust Company, executor, and others, appeal. Reversed.

MITCHELL, J. This appeal is from an order overruling a demurrer to the so-called "supplemental complaint" of the Minnesota Thresher Manufacturing Company. The Northwestern Manufacturing & Car Company was a manufacturing corporation organized in May, 1882. Upon the complaint of a judgment creditor, (Hospes & Co.,) after return of execution unsatisfied, judgment was rendered in May, 1884, sequestrating all its property, things in action, and effects, and appointing a receiver of the same. This receivership still continues, the affairs of the corporation being not yet fully administered; but it appears that it is hopelessly insolvent, and that all the assets that have come into the hands of the receiver will not be sufficient to pay any considerable part of the debts. The Minnesota Thresher Manufacturing Company, a corporation organized in November, 1884, as creditor, became a party to the sequestration proceeding, and proved its claims against the insolvent corporation. In October, 1889, in behalf of itself and all other creditors who have exhibited their claims, it filed this complaint against certain stockholders (these appellants) of the car company in pursuance of an order of court allowing it to do so, and requiring those thus impleaded to appear and answer the complaint. The object is to recover from these stockholders the amount of certain stock held by them, but alleged never to have been paid for. What was said in Meagher Case, 50 N.W.R. 1114, (just decided,) is equally applicable here as to the right to enforce such a liability in the sequestration proceeding upon the petition or complaint of creditors who have become parties to it. There is nothing in this practice inconsistent with what was decided in Thresher Co. v. Langdon, 44 Minn. 37, 46 N.W.R. 310. The complaint is not the commencement of an independent action by creditors in their own behalf antagonistic to the rights of the receiver, but is filed in the sequestration proceeding itself, and in aid of it.

The principal question in the case is whether the complaint states facts showing that the thresher company, as creditor, is entitled to the relief prayed for; or, in other words, states a cause of action. Briefly stated, the allegations of the complaint are that on May 10, 1882, Seymour, Sabin & Co. owned property of the value of several million dollars, and a business then supposed to be profitable. That, in order to continue and enlarge this business, the parties interested in Seymour, Sabin & Co., with others, organized the car company, to which was sold the greater part of the assets of Seymour, Sabin & Co. at a valuation of $2,267,000, in payment of which there were issued to Seymour, Sabin & Co. shares of the preferred stock of the car company of the par value of $2,267,000, it being then and there agreed by both parties that this stock was in full payment of the property thus purchased. It is further alleged that the stockholders of Seymour, Sabin & Co., and the other persons who had agreed to become stockholders in the car company, were then desirous of issuing to themselves, and obtaining for their own benefit, a large amount of common stock of the car company, "without paying therefor, and without incurring any liability thereon or to pay therefor;" and for that purpose, and "in order to evade and set at naught the laws of this state," they caused Seymour, Sabin & Co. to subscribe for and agree to take common stock of the car company of the par value of $1,500,000. That Seymour, Sabin & Co. thereupon subscribed for that amount of the common stock, but never paid therefor any consideration whatever, either in money or property. That thereafter these persons caused this stock to be issued to D. M. Sabin as trustee, to be by him distributed among them. That it was so distributed without receipt by him or the car company from any one of any consideration whatever, but was given by the car company and received by these parties entirely "gratuitously." The car company was, at this time, free from debt, but afterwards became indebted to various persons for about $3,000,000. The thresher company, incorporated after the insolvency and receivership of the car company, for the purpose of securing possession of its assets, property, and business, and therewith engaging in and continuing the same kind of manufacturing, prior to October 27, 1887, purchased and became the owner of unsecured claims against the car company, "bona fide, and for a valuable consideration," to the aggregate amount of $1,703,000. As creditor, standing on the purchase of these debts, which were contracted after the issue of this "bonus" stock, the thresher company files this complaint to recover the par value of the stock as never having been paid for. The complaint does not allege what the consideration of these debts was, nor to whom originally owing, nor what the intervener paid for them, nor whether any of the original creditors trusted the car company on the faith of the bonus stock having been paid for. Neither does it allege that either the thresher company or its assignors were ignorant of the bonus issue of stock, nor that they or any of them were deceived or damaged in fact by such issue, nor that the bonus stock was of any value. Neither is there any traversable allegation of any actual fraud or intent to deceive or injure creditors. A desire to get something without paying for it, and actually getting it, is not fraudulent or unlawful if the donor consents, and no one else is injured by it; and the general allegation that it was done "in order to evade and set at naught the laws of the state" of itself amounts to nothing but a mere conclusion of law. As a creditors' bill, in the ordinary sense, the complaint is manifestly insufficient. The thresher company, however, plants itself upon the so-called "trust-fund" doctrine that the capital stock of a corporation is a trust fund for the payment of its debts; its contention being that such a "bonus" issue of stock creates, in case of the subsequent insolvency of the corporation, a liability on part of the stockholder in favor of creditors to pay for it, notwithstanding his contract with the corporation to the contrary.

This "trust fund" doctrine, commonly called the "American doctrine," has given rise to much confusion of ideas as to its real meaning, and much conflict of decision in its application. To such an extent has this been the case that many have questioned the accuracy of the phrase, as well as doubted the necessity or expediency of inventing any such doctrine. While a convenient phrase to express a certain general idea, it is not sufficiently precise or accurate to constitute a safe foundation upon which to build a system of legal rules. The doctrine was invented by Justice Story in Wood v. Dummer, 3 Mason, 308, which called for no such invention, the fact in that case being that a bank divided up two-thirds of its capital among its stockholders without providing funds sufficient to pay its outstanding bill-holders. Upon old and familiar principles this was a fraud on creditors. Evidently all that the eminent jurist meant by the doctrine was that corporate property must be first appropriated to the payment of the debts of the company before there can be any distribution of it among stockholders,—a proposition that is sound upon the plainest principles of common honesty. In Fogg v. Blair, 133 U.S. 541, 10 S.Ct. 338, it is said that this is all the doctrine means. The expression used in Wood v. Dummer has, however, been taken up as a new discovery, which furnished a solution of every question on the subject. The phrase that "the capital of a corporation constitutes a trust fund for the benefit of creditors" is misleading. Corporate property is not held in trust, in any proper sense of the term. A trust implies two estates or interests,—one equitable and one legal; one person, as trustee, holding the legal title, while another, as the cestui que trust, has the beneficial interest. Absolute control and power of disposition are inconsistent with the idea of a trust. The capital of a corporation is its property. It has the whole beneficial interest in it, as well as the legal title. It may use the income and profits of it, and sell and dispose of it, the same as a natural person. It is a trustee for its creditors in the same sense and to the same extent as a natural person, but no further. This is well illustrated and clearly announced in the case of Graham v. Railway Co., 102 U.S. 148. That was a creditors' suit to reach a piece of real estate on the ground that it had been conveyed by the corporation fraudulently for a wholly inadequate consideration. The trust-fund doctrine was invoked by a subsequent creditor, and it was claimed that, as the trust had been violated, the deed should be set aside. If the premise was correct that the corporation held it in trust for creditors, the conclusion was inevitable; but the court denied the premise, saying that a corporation is in law as distinct a being as an individual is, and is entitled to hold property (if not contrary to its charter) as absolutely as an individual can hold it. Its estate is the same, its interest is the same, its possession is the same; and that there is no reason why the disposal by a corporation of any of its property should be questioned by subsequent creditors any more than a like disposal by an individual; that the same principles of law apply to each. That the phrase that "the capital of a corporation is a trust fund for the payment of its creditors" is misleading, if not inaccurate, is illustrated by the character of the actions that are frequently mistakenly instituted on the strength of it. For example, in the case of Railroad Co. v. Ham, 114 U.S. 587, 5 S.Ct. 1081, two roads had been consolidated, the new company acquiring the property of the old ones. A creditor of one of the old companies, on the strength of the "trust-fund" doctrine, claimed a lien on its property in the hands of the new corporation. If this property was impressed with a trust in favor of creditors in the hands of the old company, it would logically follow that it would continue so in the hands of the new one. But the court denied the relief, and, in giving its construction of the "trust-fund" doctrine, said: "The property of a corporation is doubtless a trust fund for the payment of its debts in the sense that when the corporation is lawfully dissolved, and all its business wound up, or when it is insolvent, all its creditors are entitled in equity to have their debts paid out of the corporate property before any distribution thereof among stockholders. It is also true, in the case of a corporation as in the case of a natural person, that any conveyance of the property of the debtor without authority of law and in fraud of existing creditors is void." This is probably what is meant when it is said in some cases, as in Clark v. Bever, 139 U.S. 110, 11 S.Ct. 468, that the capital of a corporation is a trust fund sub modo. If so, no one will dispute it. But it means very little, for the same thing could be truthfully said of the property of an individual or a partnership. And obviously it would make no difference whether the disposition of the corporate property is to a stranger or to a stockholder, except that, of course, the latter could not be an innocent purchaser.

There is also much confusion in regard to what the "trust-fund" doctrine applies. Some cases seem to hold that unpaid subscribed capital is a trust fund, while other assets are not,—that is, so long as the subscription is unpaid, it is held in trust by the corporation, but, when once paid in, it ceases to be a trust fund; while other cases hold that, paid or unpaid, it is all a trust fund. The first seems to be the rule laid down in Sawyer v. Hoag, 17 Wall. 610, in which the "trust-fund" doctrine was first squarely announced by that court with all the vigor and force characteristic of the great jurist who wrote the opinion. In that case a stockholder in an insurance company had given his note, as the court found the fact to be, for 85 per cent. of his subscription to the stock of the company. After the company had become bankrupt, and the stockholder knew the fact, he brought up a claim against the company for one-third its face, and in a suit by the assignee in bankruptcy on his note set up this claim as an offset. That this would have been a fraud on the bankrupt act, and at least a moral fraud on policy-holders, is quite apparent without invoking the "trust-fund" doctrine; and, if the note for unpaid stock was a trust fund, there could have been no offset, whether the company was solvent or insolvent. In the opinion it is said that, "if the subscription had been paid by the note or otherwise, the note ceased thereby to be a trust fund to which creditors can look, and became ordinary assets, with which directors may deal as they choose." But in Upton v. Tribilcock, 91 U.S. 45, it is stated: "The capital paid in and promised to be paid in is a fund which the trustees cannot squander or give away." While in Sanger v. Upton, Id. 56, it is said: "When debts are incurred a contract arises with the creditors that it [the capital] shall not be withdrawn or applied otherwise than upon their demands until such demands are satisfied." And in the same connection it is distinctly stated that there is no difference between assets paid in and subscriptions; that "unpaid stock is as much a part of this pledge and as much a part of the assets of the company as the cash which has been paid in upon it; that creditors have the same right to look to it as to anything else, and the same right to insist upon its payment as upon the payment of any other debt due the company; that, as regards creditors, there is no distinction between such a demand and any other asset which may form a part of the property and effects of the corporation." This language is quoted and approved in County of Morgan v. Allen, 103 U.S. 508. It would seem clear that this is the correct statement of the law. The capital (not the mere share certificates) means all the assets, however invested. If a subscriber gives his note for his stock, that note is no more and no less a trust fund than the money would have been if he had paid cash down. Capital cannot change from a trust to not a trust by a mere change of form. It is either all a trust or all not a trust, and the "trust-fund" rule, whatever that be, must apply to all alike, and in the same way. If the assets of a corporation are given back to stockholders, the result is the same as if the shares had been issued wholly or partly as a bonus. The latter is merely a short cut to the same result. So with dividends paid out of the capital, voluntary conveyances, stock paid in overvalued property; all are forms of one and the same thing, all reaching the same result, (a disposition of corporate assets,) which may or may not be a fraud on creditors, depending on circumstances. This much being once settled, the solution of the question when a subsequent creditor can insist on payment of stock issued as paid up, but not in fact paid for, or not paid for at par, becomes as we shall presently see, comparatively simple.

Another proposition which we think must be sound is that creditors cannot recover on the ground of contract when the corporation could not. Their right to recover in such cases must rest on the ground that the acts of the stockholders with reference to the corporate capital constitute a fraud on their rights. We have here a case where the contract between the corporation and the takers of the shares was specific that the shares should not be paid for. Therefore, unlike many of the cases cited, there is no ground for implying a promise to pay for them. The parties have explicitly agreed that there shall be no such implication by agreeing that the stock shall not be paid for. In such a case the creditors undoubtedly may have rights superior to the corporation, but these rights cannot rest on the implication that the shareholder agreed to do something directly contrary to his real agreement, but must be based on tort or fraud, actual or presumed.

In England, since the act of 1867, there is an implied contract created by statute that "every share in any company shall be deemed and be taken to have been issued and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash." This statutory contract makes every contrary contract void. Such a statute would be entirely just to all, for every one would be advised of its provisions, and could conduct himself accordingly. And in view of the fact that "watered" and "bonus" stock is one of the greatest abuses connected with the management of modern corporations, such a law might, on grounds of public policy, be very desirable. But this is a matter for the legislature, and not for the courts. We have no such statute; and, even if the law of 1873, under which the car company was organized, impliedly forbids the issue of stock not paid for, the result might be that such issue would be void as ultra vires, and might be canceled, but such a prohibition would not of itself be sufficient to create an implied contract, contrary to the actual one, that the holder should pay for his stock.

It is well settled that an equity in favor of a creditor does not arise absolutely and in every case to have the holder of "bonus" stock pay for it contrary to his actual contract with the corporation. Thus no such equity exists in favor of one whose debt was contracted prior to the issue, since he could not have trusted the company upon the faith of such stock. First Nat. Bank v. Gustin M. C. Min. Co. 42 Minn. 327, 44 N.W. 198; Coit v. Amalgamating Co., 119 U.S. 347, 7 S.Ct. 231; Handley v. Stutz, 139 U.S. 435, 11 S.Ct. 530. It does not exist in favor of a subsequent creditor who has dealt with the corporation with full knowledge of the arrangement by which the "bonus" stock was issued, for a man cannot be defrauded by that which he knows when he acts. First Nat. Bank v. Gustin M. C. Min. Co., supra. It has also been held not to exist where stock has been issued and turned out at its full market value to pay corporate debts. Clark v. Bever, supra. The same has been held to be the case where an active corporation, whose original capital has been impaired, for the purpose of recuperating itself issues new stock, and sells it on the market for the best price obtainable, but for less than par, (Handley v. Stutz, supra;) although it is difficult to perceive, in the absence of a statute authorizing such a thing, (of which every one dealing with the corporations is bound to take notice,) any difference between the original stock of a new corporation and additional stock issued by a "going concern." It is difficult, if not impossible, to explain or reconcile these cases upon the "trust-fund" doctrine, or, in the light of them, to predicate the liability of the stockholder upon that doctrine. But by putting it upon the ground of fraud, and applying the old and familiar rules of law on that subject to the peculiar nature of a corporation and the relation which its stockholders bear to it and to the public, we have at once rational and logical ground on which to stand. The capital of a corporation is the basis of its credit. It is a substitute for the individual liability of those who own its stock. People deal with it and give it credit on the faith of it. They have a right to assume that it has paid in capital to the amount which it represents itself as having; and if they give it credit on the faith of that representation, and if the representation is false, it is a fraud upon them; and, in case the corporation becomes insolvent, the law, upon the plainest principles of common justice, says to the delinquent stockholder, "Make that representation good by paying for your stock." It certainly cannot require the invention of any new doctrine in order to enforce so familiar a rule of equity. It is the misrepresentation of fact in stating the amount of capital to be greater than it really is that is the true basis of the liability of the stockholder in such cases; and it follows that it is only those creditors who have relied, or who can fairly be presumed to have relied, upon the professed amount of capital, in whose favor the law will recognize and enforce an equity against the holders of "bonus" stock. This furnishes a rational and uniform rule, to which familiar principles are easily applied, and which frees the subject from many of the difficulties and apparent inconsistencies into which the "trust-fund" doctrine has involved it; and we think that, even when the trust-fund doctrine has been invoked, the decision in almost every well-considered case is readily referable to such a rule.

It is urged, however, that, if fraud be the basis of the stockholders' liability in such cases, the creditor should affirmatively allege that he believed that the bonus stock had been paid for, and represented so much actual capital, and that he gave credit to the incorporation on the faith of it; and it is also argued that, while there may be a presumption to that effect in the case of a subsequent creditor, this is a mere presumption of fact, and that in pleadings no presumptions of fact are indulged in. This position is very plausible, and at first sight would seem to have much force; but we think it is unsound. Certainly any such rule of pleading or proof would work very inequitably in practice. Inasmuch as the capital of a corporation is the basis of its credit, its financial standing and reputation in the community has its source in, and is founded upon, the amount of its professed and supposed capital, and every one who deals with it does so upon the faith of that standing and reputation, although, as a matter of fact, he may have no personal knowledge of the amount of its professed capital, and in a majority of cases knows nothing about the shares of stock held by any particular stockholder, or, if so, what was paid for them. Hence, in a suit by such creditor against the holders of "bonus" stock, he could not truthfully allege, and could not affirmatively prove, that he believed that the defendants' stock had been paid for, and that he gave the corporation credit on the faith of it, although, as a matter of fact, he actually gave the credit on the faith of the financial standing of the corporation, which was based upon its apparent and professed amount of capital. The misrepresentation as to the amount of capital would operate as a fraud on such a creditor as fully and effectually as if he had personal knowledge of the existence of the defendants' stock, and believed it to have been paid for when he gave the credit. For this reason, among others, we think that all that it is necessary to allege or prove in that regard is that the plaintiff is a subsequent creditor; and that, if the fact was that he dealt with the corporation with knowledge of the arrangement by which the "bonus" stock was issued, this is a matter of defense. Gogebic Inv. Co. v. Iron Chief Min. Co., 78 Wis. 427, 47

N.W. 726. Counsel cites Fogg v. Blair, supra, to the proposition that the complaint should have stated that this stock had some value; but that case is not in point, for the plaintiff there was a prior creditor; and, as his debt could not have been contracted on the faith of stock not then issued, he could only maintain his action, if at all, by alleging that the corporation parted with something of value.

In one respect, however, we think the complaint is clearly insufficient. The thresher company is here asking the interposition of the court to aid in enforcing an equity in favor of creditors against the stockholders by declaring them liable to pay for this stock contrary to their actual contract with the corporation. While the proceeding is not, strictly speaking, an equitable action, yet the relief asked is equitable in its nature. Under such circumstances, it was incumbent upon the thresher company to show its own equities, and that it was in a position to demand such relief. It was not the original creditor of the car company, but the assignee of the original creditors. By that purchase it, of course, succeeded to whatever strictly legal rights its assignors had; but it is not rights of that kind which it is here seeking to enforce. Under such circumstances, we think it was incumbent upon it to state what it paid for the claims, or at least to show that it paid a substantial, and not a mere nominal consideration. The only allegation is that it paid "a valuable consideration." This might have been only one dollar. It appears that it bought the claims after the car company had become insolvent, and its affairs were in the hands of a receiver; also that the indebtedness of that company amounted to about $3,000,000, and that there were not corporate assets enough to pay any considerable part of it. The mere chance of collecting something out of the stockholders does not ordinarily much enhance the selling price of claims against an insolvent corporation. If any person or company had gone to work and bought up for a mere song this large indebtedness of the car company for the purpose of speculating on the liability of the stockholders, no court would grant them the relief here prayed for. It would say to them, "We will not create and enforce an equity for the benefit of any such speculation." Counsel for respondent suggests that the thresher company is but an organization of the original creditors, who formed it, and pooled their claims, so as to save something out of the wreck of the car company; but nothing of the kind is alleged. On this ground the demurrer should have been sustained.

In view of further proceedings it may be proper to say that in our opinion there is nothing in the position that the right of recovery against the stockholders was barred by the statute of limitation. The argument in support of the proposition all rests upon the false premise that the cause of action accrued in May, 1882, when the bonus stock was issued. The corporation never had any cause of action against these defendants. As between them and the company, the agreement for the issue of the stock was valid. The creditors are not here seeking to enforce a right of action acquired through or from the corporation, but one that accrued directly to themselves, or for their benefit, and that did not accrue at least until the corporation became insolvent, in May, 1884.

Counsel for the St. Paul Trust Company stated that, if the court should reverse the order appealed from on any of the grounds urged by the other appellants, it would not be necessary for us to consider any of the assignments of error peculiar to his appeal; but, as we reverse upon a ground that may be remedied by amendment, we deem it proper to say that, in our opinion, the claim against the Kittson estate is a "contingent" claim, within the meaning of Gen.St. 1878, c. 53.

Order reversed.

G. LOEWUS & COMPANY, INCORPORATED v. HIGHLAND QUEEN PACKING COMPANY.

Court of Chancery of New Jersey, 1939. 125 N.J.Eq. 534, 6 A.2d 545.

Suit by G. Loewus & Company, Inc., against the Highland Queen Packing Company, an insolvent corporation, wherein a receiver was appointed for the Highland Queen Packing Company. The receiver seeks to have three stockholders in the Highland Queen Packing Company assessed a sum sufficient to pay creditors and administration expenses, on the theory that their stock is not fully paid for.

Decree for the stockholders.

BIGELOW, VICE CHANCELLOR. The receiver of the defendant Highland Queen Packing Company, an insolvent New Jersey corporation, prays that its three stockholders be assessed a sum sufficient to pay creditors and administration expenses, on the theory that their stock is not fully paid.

The stock is without par value, issued pursuant to R.S. 14:8–6, N.J.S.A. 14:8–6, "Every corporation organized under this title may issue and may sell its authorized shares without nominal or par value, from time to time, for such consideration as may be prescribed in the certificate of incorporation, or, if so provided in the certificate of incorporation, as from time to time may be fixed by the board of directors. * * *

"Any and all shares without nominal or par value issued as permitted by this article shall be deemed fully paid and nonassessable, and the holder of such shares shall not be liable to the corporation or its creditors in respect thereof."

Defendant's certificate of incorporation, pursuant to the statute, authorizes the board of directors to fix the price of the stock. The directors, at their organization meeting, received and accepted an offer from two of the respondents, Jesse B. Triplett and Boice E. Triplett, to sell to the corporation the business then being conducted by them in consideration of the assumption of debts, and especially a note to the third respondent, Edgar H. Lackey, for $950 and for the further consideration of 300 shares of capital stock to be divided among the three respondents: "It is understood that the said shares of stock shall be issued at the price of $20 per share and representing a total value of $6,000."

The sale was consummated, and the stock issued. As part of the transaction, Lackey paid the company $1,050 which he had promised the Tripletts to put in the business. The corporation books show a debt to Lackey of $2,000, namely, the amount of the promissory note, plus his additional payment, but Lackey denies that the company is so indebted to him. "I was not in charge of the books of the defendant corporation nor did I have an opportunity to examine them before the receiver was appointed in this case. In truth, I gave the said sum of $2,000 in payment for the said stock."

The assets and good will of the business turned over by the Tripletts to the corporation were worth only $1,500, so it is alleged. The receiver takes the position that the consideration for the stock fixed by the directors was $20 per share, or a total of $6,000, of which only $1,500, or $1,500 plus $1,050, has been paid, and that there is owing by the stockholders the difference or so much thereof as may be necessary to satisfy creditors.

The duty of holders of par value stock—as distinguished from non-par stock—to contribute toward the payment of creditors finds three supports: One is the contract of the subscriber to pay a certain amount for his shares. Milliken v. Caruso, 205 N.Y. 559, 98 N.E. 493. Upon the insolvency of the company and the abandonment of its business, he is relieved of his obligation except so far as may be necessary to satisfy creditors. But his contractual debt to that extent remains enforceable at the suit of creditors or receiver. Wetherbee v. Baker, 35 N.J.Eq. 501; Cumberland Lumber Co. v. Clinton Hill Lumber Mfg. Co., 57 N.J.Eq. 627, 42 A. 585; Hood v. McNaughton, 54 N.J.L. 425, 24 A. 497. Second comes the trust fund or fraud theory which rests liability upon the representation or holding out to persons extending credit to the company, that its capital, in a certain sum, has been paid in full. The third basis for liability is statutory. "It depends upon the stockholder's voluntary acceptance, for considerations touching his own interest, of a statutory scheme to which watered stock, under whatever device issued, is absolutely alien, and which requires stock subscriptions to be made good for the benefit of creditors of insolvent companies." Easton National Bank v. American Brick Co., 70 N.J.Eq. 732, 738, 64 A. 917, 920, 8 L.R.A.,N.S., 271, 10 Ann.Cas. 84.

The statutory plan on which stockholders' liability depends is found principally in three sections of our corporation act, R.S. 14:8–13, N.J. S.A. 14:8–13 (formerly Rev., p. 178, sec. 5; C.S. p. 1610, sec. 21), provides that where the capital shall not have been paid in full, and the capital paid shall be insufficient to satisfy debts, each stockholder shall be bound to pay the sum necessary to complete the amount of each share held by him or such proportion thereof as shall be required to satisfy the creditors. The other two sections are R.S. 14:8–9, N.J.S.A. 14:8–9 (formerly Rev. p. 186, sec. 54; C.S. p. 1630, sec. 48) and R.S. 14:3–9, N.J.S.A. 14:3–9 (formerly Rev. p. 187, sec. 55; C.S. p. 1630, sec. 49). In the event less than the full amount of the stock is paid and the company becomes insolvent, the stockholders are liable to pay in the balance regardless of any contract or understanding which they had with the corporation, for any agreement by the company to accept less than par is void as to creditors. Liability does not depend on a "holding out" to creditors.

Par value stock has a definite value, fixed by the certificate of incorporation, stated in terms of dollars, but it may be issued for money or property or services. Stock without par value is issued for a "consideration" prescribed by the certificate of incorporation or by directors or stockholders. The consideration fixed may be money or property, or anything that constitutes a good and valuable consideration. Allenhurst Park Estates v. Smith, 101 N.J.Eq. 581, 610, 138 A. 709.

In Smith v. General Motors Corp., 6 Cir., 289 F. 205, a suit by a solvent corporation on a subscription to its stock, the circuit court of appeals said that a subscription for stock of a definite par value and one for no par value stock at a fixed and definite price, seemed to depend upon the same principles and affirmed a judgment for the amount due on the subscription to non-par stock.

Likewise, in the case of insolvency, pretty much the same principles determine the obligations of subscribers and holders of either class of stock. If the consideration for non-par stock is duly fixed at $20 a share, and only $10 a share is paid in, then R.S. 14:8–13, N.J.S.A. 14:8–13, becomes effective and the stockholders may be assessed. Or if the consideration be certain property and the stock is issued though only a part of the property is transferred to the corporation, the stockholders must answer to the call of creditors.

Counsel for respondents direct attention to the provision in R.S. 14:8–6, N.J.S.A. 14:8–6, that "shares without nominal or par value issued as permitted by this article shall be deemed fully paid and non-assessable, and the holder of such shares shall not be liable to the corporation or its creditors in respect thereof." A similar provision relating to par value stock issued for property is found in R.S. 14:3–9, N.J.S.A. 14:3–9, and has been part of our statute law many years. "The stock so issued shall be fully paid stock and not liable to any further call." Prior to 1917, the statute also declared, "neither shall the holder thereof be liable for any further payment under any of the provisions of this act." Despite these provisions, a holder, with notice, of par value stock issued for property at an inflated valuation is liable to creditors. Easton National Bank v. American, etc., Co., 70 N.J.Eq. 732, 64 A. 1095; See v. Heppenheimer, 69 N.J.Eq. 36, 61 A. 843; Holcombe v. Trenton White City Co., 80 N.J.Eq. 122, 82 A. 618; Id., 82 N.J.Eq. 364, 91 A. 1069; Bryson v. Conlen, 104 N.J.Eq. 180, 144 A. 723. So when stock without par value is issued for less than the prescribed consideration, it is outside the plan of the statute, and the holder thereof, with notice, is liable for the balance of the consideration, or so much thereof as may satisfy creditors.

Another clause of R.S. 14:8–6, N.J.S.A. 14:8–6, gives the board of directors, within 30 days after issuance of such stock, power to allocate part of the consideration to surplus. Dividends may be made out of the surplus thus created, but not out of the capital. R.S. 14:8–19, N.J.S.A. 14:8–19. Since the directors of the defendant corporation did not exercise this power, I need not consider the possible effect on creditors' rights, of an assignment to surplus of part of the consideration for which the stock was issued.

The question remains whether there was delivered to the corporation in exchange for the stock the full consideration as fixed by the directors. Careful examination of the minutes satisfies me that the only consideration which the Tripletts offered to give and the directors agreed to accept, was the transfer of the business conducted by the Tripletts. The directors, by accepting the offer, fixed the consideration for the stock within the intent of R.S. 14:8–13, N.J.S.A. 14:8–13. The meaning of the statement in the minutes that the stock should be issued at the price of $20 per share, or a total value of $6,000, is not clear. Certainly the parties did not intend that $6,000 should be paid in, additional to the transfer of the business, or even that the difference between $6,000 and the value of the business should be paid in. Probably the sentence has some relation to the deal with Lackey, who was paying $2,000 for a third interest in the enterprise.

The duly fixed consideration for the stock was fully satisfied and the stockholders are not assessable.

The receiver also asks that the Tripletts be ordered to deliver to the receiver certain formulas which, he claims, they sold to the corporation. The proofs disclose, however, that they sold only the right to use the formulas so long as the corporation should exist as a going concern. Order denied.

LIVINGSTON v. ADAMS et al.

St. Louis Court of Appeals of Missouri, 1931. 226 Mo.App. 824, 43 S.W.2d 836.

Action by Orville Livingston, as trustee, against Roscoe G. Adams and others. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant Herman Dreste appeals.

Affirmed

BECKER, J. Plaintiff brought this action against three defendants in which he seeks to recover for unpaid subscriptions of capital stock of a Missouri corporation, the stock of which is without nominal or par value. A trial before the court resulted in plaintiff obtaining a judgment against the defendants. The judgment against defendant Herman Dreste was for $1,172.50, from which judgment said defendant prosecutes this appeal. * * *

That on November 14, 1928, plaintiff, as trustee, as aforesaid, filed with the Honorable Walter D. Coles, referee, a petition * * * alleging the liability of defendants on account of their subscriptions to the capital stock of said bankrupt, and requested to be authorized to institute suit against all of the delinquent subscribers to the capital stock of said corporation to enforce liability of said subscribers, including defendants herein, and that in said petition filed before the referee, the plaintiff, as trustee, further alleged that there remained due and owing on the capital stock of said company the sum of at least $4,660, and that defendants herein and each of them are liable as subscribers to the capital stock of said bankrupt. Thereupon plaintiff was authorized, empowered, and directed by said referee in bankruptcy to bring suit against any and all persons who then were, or at any time may have been, holders of the capital stock of said corporation or subscribers to the capital stock thereof, especially these defendants, to enforce any liability against them arising out of the subscriptions for said stock.

Plaintiff's petition in the instant case further alleges that this appellant is one of the original incorporators of said corporation which was incorporated on April 10, 1927, and that said shares of stock were of nominal or no par value, and that it began business with $5,000, which consisted of $2,000 cash, $3,000 in property, but alleges that no money was put up as part of the capital and that the property transferred by the incorporators to said corporation in payment of said capital stock amounted to not more than $335; that as incorporators the defendant Dreste subscribed for 134 shares, Roscoe G. Adams and George L. Ford, 133 shares each, and that the defendants, by reason of said subscriptions, became liable to the creditors in the amount of $4,665, and each defendant became liable as follows: Dreste, $1,575; Adams, $1,562.50; and Ford, $1,527.50. That the unpaid part of the capital stock is a liability against defendants.

Defendant Dreste filed a general and special demurrer to said petition, which was overruled.

Defendant Dreste's answer is a general denial and set-off for $821.38. * * *

The original articles of association of the Dreste-Adams-Ford Music Corporation, which were introduced in evidence, contain the statement that the total number of shares authorized is 500, which shares are without nominal or par value; and further shows that 400 of the shares had been subscribed for, of which amount the defendant Herman Dreste had subscribed for 134 shares; and contains the further statement:

"(b) The amount of capital with which the corporation will begin business is five thousand dollars ($5,000.00), two thousand dollars ($2,000.00) of which is paid up in lawful money of the United States and is in the custody of the persons named as the first board of directors or managers, and three thousand dollars ($3,000.00) of which is actually paid up in property now in the custody of the persons named as the first board of directors or managers, an itemized description of which with the cash value of each item and location thereof, is as follows:

"10 Radios of cash value of $1500.00

"12 Phonographs of cash value of $1500.00

"Said property being now located at the R. U. Leonori Auction & Storage Company, Grand and Laclede Avenues, in the City of St. Louis, Missouri."

Appended to these articles of incorporation is the usual acknowledgment of the several subscribers to the stock and the further affidavit on the part of each of such subscribers, including the defendant Herman Dreste, that the statements and matters set forth are true and that they know the property described in article 3 of said articles of agreement and taken in payment of capital stock, and that the value placed on the same is the actual cash value of such property.

It is conceded that the liability of the stockholders of the Dreste-Adams-Ford Music Corporation for alleged unpaid subscriptions depends upon the laws of this state. The following sections of our statutes bear upon the question. They appear under article 16, chapter 32, Revised Statutes of Missouri 1929, as follows:

"Sec. 5100. Stock corporations, other than building and loan associations, trust companies, etc.—shares, par value—capital.—Upon the formation * * * of any stock corporation * * * provision may be made for the issue of shares of preferred stock of any or all classes, or common stock of any class, or both preferred and common stock, without any nominal or par value, by stating in the articles of association or certificate of incorporation: * * *

"(a) The number of shares with nominal or par value, and the number of shares without nominal or par value, that may be issued by the corporation, and the classes, if any, into which such shares are divided;

"(b) the nominal or par value of shares of stock other than shares which it is stated are to have no nominal or par value;

"(c) the amount of capital with which the corporation will begin business.

"Sec. 5101. Amount of capital stock shall be fully paid in.—No corporation authorized to issue shares of stock without nominal or par value in pursuance of the provisions of this article shall begin to carry on business, or shall incur any indebtedness, until the amount of the capital with which it will begin business stated in pursuance of section 5100 of this article, shall have been fully paid in cash or in property."

"Sec. 5104. Authorized shares may be issued, when.—Such corporation may issue and may dispose of its authorized shares having no nominal or par value, from time to time, for such consideration as may be prescribed or authorized in the articles of association or certificate of incorporation. * * *

"Sec. 5105. Shares shall be deemed fully paid and nonassessable.—Any and all shares without nominal or par value, issued for the consideration as prescribed or fixed in accordance with the provisions of section 5104 of this article, shall be deemed fully paid and be nonassessable, and the holder of such shares shall not be liable thereon to the corporation or to its creditors."

Prior to the act of 1921 there was no authority for corporations to issue shares of stock without nominal or par value. And as to corporations organized with nominal or par value stock, it has uniformly been held that the amount of money or property represented as the original capital is a trust fund for the benefit of its creditors, and that creditors have a right to rely upon the assumption that the original stock so subscribed for has been full paid [citing cases.] * * * and that the property accepted in payment of capital stock of the corporation has been taken at fair valuation, and that the issuance of capital stock for property not equal to its par value is a fraud in law upon its creditors. [Citing cases] * * *

It is well-settled law in this state that in so far as creditors are concerned, unpaid stock subscriptions, in corporations organized with nominal or par value stock, are in equity considered assets of the corporation and that they may be subjected to the payment of the debts of the corporation where the creditor gave it credit relying upon the belief that the stock had been fully paid. * * *

The above principles were definitely established when the act of 1921 was passed, under which corporations could be formed with common stock without any nominal or par value. To what extent are these settled principles modified, if at all, by the act of 1921, which permits the incorporation of companies without any nominal or par value stock?

Section 5100, Rev.Stat. Mo.1929, provides for the formation of such corporations "by stating in the articles of association or certificate of incorporation * * * in lieu of statements which may be prescribed by law as to the amount of capital stock and the number and par value of shares into which it is divided:

"(a) * * * the number of shares without nominal or par value, that may be issued by the corporation. * * *

"(b) * * *

"(c) the amount of capital with which the corporation will begin business. * * *"

Section 5101 provides that no corporation authorized to issue shares of stock without nominal or par value shall begin to carry on business or shall incur any indebtedness until the amount of the capital with which it will begin business, stated in pursuance of section 5100, shall be fully paid in cash or property.

Section 5105 provides that any and all shares without nominal or par value issued for the consideration fixed in accordance with the provisions of section 5104, shall be deemed fully paid and be nonassessable, and the holders of such shares shall not be liable thereon to the corporation or to its creditors.

Section 5110 provides that shares of stock without nominal or par value shall be deemed to be an aliquot part of the aggregate capital of the corporation issuing the same, and equal to every other share of stock of the same class.

The statutes of New York, Illinois, Idaho, New Jersey, and other states permitting the issuance of no par value stock, provide, as does our own act, for a statement in the certificate of incorporation of the amount of capital that the corporation begins business with, and this stated capital is the so-called "trust fund" for the benefit of its creditors. See State ex rel. Standard Tank Co. v. Sullivan, Secretary of State, 282 Mo. 261, 221 S.W. 728, loc. cit. 737.

Under the sections of our statutes cited supra, the Legislature did not intend to abolish the trust fund theory as respects nonpar value stock corporations. This is evidenced from the very language of the sections themselves, for it is provided by them that no such corporation shall begin business until the amount of the capital it will begin business with, as stated in its articles of association, shall have been fully paid in cash or property, and such stated capital shall be the capital with which the corporation shall begin business (section 5102), and all shares issued for such consideration shall be deemed fully paid and be nonassessable, and that the holders of such shares shall not be liable thereon to the corporation or to its creditors, clearly showing that the general rules regarding liability for unpaid stock subscriptions for par value corporation stock would otherwise apply, namely, a liability therefor of the corporation to its creditors. In our opinion these sections intend that the payment of the consideration that may be prescribed or authorized in the articles of association or certificate of incorporation for which the nonpar value stock is issued by the corporation, must in fact be paid, and that the amount which each subscriber for shares may be liable for is to be determined according to the provisions of section 5110, which provides that shares of stock of no par value shall be deemed to be an aliquot part of the aggregate capital of the corporation issuing the same and equal to every other share of stock of the same class.

Our Supreme Court has specifically held that there can be no question but that the state, in granting corporations the privilege of issuing shares without par value, may impose such conditions as it chooses; if the conditions are regarded as too onerous, the privilege must be foregone. * * *

Reading the act of 1921 as a whole, "it is manifest that it was the purpose of the Legislature in permitting corporations to issue shares of stock without any nominal or par value to impose upon them, so far as was consistent with the general purpose of the act, the same burdens, restrictions, and regulations which were then imposed by existing law upon other stock corporations, and which, as stated, were based in some respect on the amount of capital stock." State v. Pierce Petroleum Corp., 318 Mo. 1020, loc. cit. 1025, 2 S.W.2d 790, 793; State ex rel. v. Becker, supra.

In the instant case, having elected in the articles of association to state that the amount of capital with which the corporation will begin business is $5,000, $2,000 of which was stated as being cash and the balance paid up in property of the cash value of $3,000, when in point of fact only a fractional part of such capital, either in cash or property, was ever paid up by the original subscribers, upon the bankruptcy of the corporation, and under the facts alleged in the petition herein, we rule that a subscriber to the original stock, such as appellant, must be held to have agreed to contribute a definite amount to the capital stock, and having failed to do so must respond in a proper action for the difference between what he actually agreed to pay for his stock and the actual consideration which he may have paid the company therefor. It follows that the demurrer ore tenus was well ruled.

It is further urged that since the record discloses that the defendant Dreste had advanced or loaned the company the sum of $466.42, he should have been permitted to set off same against any alleged balance for any unpaid stock that might be found due from him to the corporation.

Debts to be subject to set-off must be mutual; must be in the same right. The case before us, however, is not of that character. The debt which appellant owed for his stock was a trust fund devoted to the payment of all the creditors of the company. As soon as the company became insolvent, the right of set-off for an ordinary debt to its full amount ceased. It became a fund belonging equally in equity to all the creditors and could not be appropriated by the debtor to the exclusive payment of his own claim. Sawyer v. Hoag, 84 U.S. (17 Wall.) 610, loc. cit. 623, 21 L.Ed. 731.

The judgment is for the right party, and finding no error prejudicial to the rights of the appellant, the judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

3. PREEMPTIVE RIGHTS

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW

§ 39. Preemptive rights. 1. As used in this section, (a) the term "unlimited dividend rights" shall mean the right without limitation as to amount either to all or to a share of the balance of current or liquidating dividends after the payment of dividends on any shares entitled to preference;

(b) the term "equity shares" shall mean shares of any class, whether or not preferred as to dividends or assets, which have unlimited dividend rights;

(c) the term "voting rights" shall mean the right, not dependent on the happening of an event specified in the certificate of incorporation or in any other certificate filed pursuant to law which would change the voting rights of any class of stock, to vote for the election of one or more directors; and

(d) the term "voting shares" shall mean shares of any class which have voting rights.

(e) the term "preemptive rights" shall mean the rights to purchase shares or securities to be offered as such rights are hereinafter defined.

2. Except as otherwise provided in the certificate of incorporation or in any other certificate filed pursuant to law, and except as hereinafter provided, the holders of equity shares of any class, in case of the proposed issuance by the corporation of, or the granting by the corporation of options to purchase, its equity shares of any class or any shares, notes, debentures, bonds, or other securities convertible into or carrying options or warrants to purchase its equity shares of any class, shall if the issuance of the securities proposed to be issued, or the granting of options with respect thereto, would adversely affect the unlimited dividend rights of such holders, have the right during a reasonable time and on reasonable conditions, both to be fixed by the board of directors, and at a not less favorable price (without deduction of such reasonable compensation for the sale, underwriting or purchase of such shares by underwriters or dealers as may lawfully be paid by the corporation) than such shares or securities are to be offered for sale to others, to purchase such shares or securities in the proportion determined as hereinafter provided.

3. Except as otherwise provided in the certificate of incorporation or in any other certificate filed pursuant to law, and except as hereinafter provided, the holders of voting shares of any class, in case of a proposed issuance by the corporation of, or the granting by the corporation of options to purchase, its voting shares of any class or any shares, notes, debentures, bonds or other securities convertible into or carrying options or warrants to purchase its voting shares of any class, shall, if such proposed issuance would adversely affect the voting rights of such holders, have the right during a reasonable time and on reasonable conditions, both to be fixed by the board of directors, and at a not less favorable price (without deduction of such reasonable compensation for the sale, underwriting or purchase of such shares by underwriters or dealers as may lawfully be paid by the corporation) than such shares or securities are to be offered for sale to others, to purchase such shares or securities in the proportion determined as hereinafter provided.

4. Unless otherwise provided in the certificate of incorporation or in any other certificate filed pursuant to law, shares or other securities offered for sale shall not be subject to preemptive rights if they

(a) are issued or optioned by the board of directors to effect a merger or consolidation or for a consideration other than cash;

(b) are issued to satisfy conversion or option rights theretofore granted by the corporation;

(c) are shares or other securities theretofore reacquired by the corporation after having been duly issued;

(d) are part of the shares or other securities of the corporation originally authorized in its certificate of incorporation and are issued, sold or optioned within two years from the date of filing such certificate; or

(e) are issued pursuant to a plan of reorganization approved under and in accordance with the provisions of the act of congress of July first, eighteen hundred ninety-eight, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," and acts amendatory thereof.

5. Holders of record of shares entitled to preemptive rights at the record time fixed by the board of directors pursuant to section sixty-two or if no such record time is fixed, then at the close of business on the fifth business day preceding the mailing of the notice provided for in subdivision six hereof and no others shall be entitled to the rights defined in this section. The preemptive right of each such holder to purchase the shares or securities to be offered shall be to purchase such shares or securities as nearly as practicable in such number as would, if such preemptive right were exercised, preserve the relative unlimited dividend rights and voting rights of such holder. In case each share entitled to preemptive rights does not have the same voting rights or the same unlimited dividend rights, the board of directors shall apportion the shares or securities to be offered among the stockholders having preemptive rights to purchase them in such proportion as in the opinion of the board of directors shall preserve as far as practicable the relative unlimited dividend rights and voting rights of the holder at the time of such offering. The apportionment made by the board of directors shall, in the absence of fraud or bad faith, be binding upon all stockholders.

6. The board of directors shall cause to be mailed to each stockholder of record entitled to purchase shares or securities in accordance with this section, a notice directed to him in the manner provided in section forty-five, setting forth the time within which and the terms and conditions under which the stockholder may purchase such shares or securities and also the apportionment made of the right to purchase among the stockholders entitled to preemptive rights. Such notice shall be mailed at least fifteen days prior to the expiration of the period during which the stockholder shall have the right to purchase. All stockholders entitled to preemptive rights to whom notice shall have been mailed as aforesaid, shall be deemed conclusively to have had a reasonable time in which to exercise their preemptive rights.

7. Shares or securities which have been offered to stockholders having preemptive rights to purchase and which have not been purchased by them within the time fixed by the board of directors may thereafter, for a period of not exceeding one year following the expiration of the time during which stockholders might have exercised such preemptive rights, be issued, sold or optioned to any other person or persons at a price, (without deduction of such reasonable compensation for the sale, underwriting or purchase of such shares by underwriters or dealers as may lawfully be paid by the corporation) not less than that at which they were offered to such stockholders. Any such shares or securities not so issued, sold or optioned to others during such one year period shall thereafter again be subject to the preemptive rights of stockholders.

8. Except as provided in this section, or in the certificate of incorporation, or other certificate filed pursuant to law, no holder of any shares of stock of any class shall as such holder have any preemptive right to purchase any shares or securities of any class which at any time may be sold or offered for sale by the corporation. Nothing herein contained, however, shall be deemed to modify or affect the provisions of section fourteen.

9. The provisions of this section shall apply to all stock corporations now existing, as well as to those hereafter incorporated. If any provisions of this section or the application of any such provisions to any person or circumstance shall be held invalid, the remainder of this section and the application of such provision to persons or circumstances other than those as to which it is held invalid shall not be affected thereby.

See, supra, Delaware General Corporation Law, § 5(10).

NOTE

STOCKHOLDERS' PRE-EMPTIVE RIGHTS

An economic analysis of a share of stock shows that it is a bundle of rights. Among these are:

(1) The right to a share of the corporate assets on dissolution;

(2) The right to a share of the corporate earnings, if and when distributed by the board of directors;

(3) The right to vote; and

(4) The right to invest capital in the enterprise, if and when the directors shall so decide.

Any and all of these rights may be modified by the contract and constitutive documents.

Economically the preemptive right is the legal recognition of the last named, viz., the right to invest capital. This right becomes valuable when the enterprise has demonstrated that it will earn a higher rate of return on the capital than the stockholder could get on that capital were he to reinvest it in the open market. Thus, if the ruling rate of return on capital is 6 per cent, and he can invest it in a business which will yield 12 per cent., the right to invest capital in the enterprise precisely doubles the useful value of his capital.

Corporations which can continually use additional capital and have demonstrated their ability to earn a high rate of return on it are likely to be constantly seeking additional capital for investment. A notable instance is the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. which calls for roughly two hundred millions of additional capital every two years, and is able to earn approximately 12 per cent. thereon. A share of stock in that company, representing a contribution of $100 capital will often sell at once for $200 and better depending on market conditions. The right to subscribe for such a share is thus extremely valuable and is one of the recognized profitable features of that stock.

The same factor appears in successful investment trusts.

Only recently the value of this right to invest new capital has been recognized as the greatest reason for the preemptive right. Originally it was thought (see Gray v. Portland Bank, infra) that the right was intended to preserve the shareholders' aliquot voting position, and his ratable participation in the assets of the corporation. This was probably true at the time when the doctrine was propounded; for in 1803 public markets, as known today, were only in their infancy, and the value of the right to invest capital at a high rate of return was not instantly discounted by the stock market as it is, for instance, in the case of the American Telephone & Telegraph stock.

It should be noted also that one of the ways by which a corporate management secures additional power for itself is by inserting in the constitutive corporate documents clauses "waiving" or contracting away the preemptive right. Stock bought under such charters is apt to be worth less and to increase in value less swiftly, than stock issued under charters giving to the holder his full preemptive right. If the management is able to give to its associates or to outsiders the right to invest new capital at a demonstrated high rate of return, they have in their power an instrument of very considerable value.

GRAY v. PRESIDENT, DIRECTORS & COMPANY OF PORTLAND BANK.

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1807. 3 Mass. 364, 3 Am.Dec. 156.

[In 1799, certain men associated to incorporate a bank. All the shares to be issued were subscribed for when Gray, the plaintiff, was invited to become a subscriber. Seventy shares were allotted to Gray. The bank was then incorporated by legislative act, with an authorized capital of not less than $100,000 nor more than $300,000 of $100 par shares. 1,000 shares were issued, and Gray received certificates for seventy shares.

To meet the expense of purchasing a bank building, the stockholders voted to increase the capital stock to $300,000. Subscriptions to the new issue were to be offered to the "original subscribers to the bank and their associates, viz., those who associated with said original subscribers previous to the act of incorporation" at the rate of two shares for one.

Plaintiff tendered payment for his subscription to 140 shares of the new issue, but the corporation refused to issue the stock. He then brought an action on the case against the corporation for damages sustained by him due to the failure of the bank to issue the stock. The issue was whether plaintiff was an original subscriber or an associate. A verdict was rendered for plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court on the facts reported by the trial judge.] * * *

SEDGWICK, J. [After reciting the history of the cause.] Upon these facts the counsel for the plaintiff contend—

1. That the plaintiff, as a stockholder of the old stock, at the time of the vote to augment the capital of the bank, had a right in the new stock, in proportion to the amount of his interest in the old stock, of which he could not rightfully be deprived by his partners, the other stockholders.

2. That, admitting it was competent to the stockholders, by the manner in which they prescribed the augmentation of their capital, to prevent him from becoming a subscriber to, and interested in, the new stock, they have not done it; but, on the contrary, have expressly, by their vote, authorized him to subscribe to the new, in proportion as he was interested in the old stock.

3. That the plaintiff, having offered to subscribe to the new stock, and to pay, as it became due, the amount of his subscription, and having been prevented from subscribing, and his payments having been refused by the agents and officers of the bank, he has sustained an injury.

4. That for this misconduct of its servants, the bank is responsible to the plaintiff.

5. That the plaintiff, having done everything incumbent on him to become a proprietor in the new stock, is interested in it, and consequently is entitled to his proportion of the dividends upon that stock.

All these propositions are denied by the counsel for the defendants. To determine on them will decide the merits of the case.

1. Then had the plaintiff, as a stockholder of the old stock, at the time of the vote to augment the capital of the bank, a right in the new stock, in proportion to his interest in the old stock, of which he might not rightfully be deprived by his partners, the other stockholders? I think that he had.

At the time of the vote to augment the capital of the bank, all the stockholders were partners. The augmentation was supposed to be, and intended for the profit of the joint concern; the capacity to augment was in virtue of their joint interest; and it could only be done by the will of the majority, and that in pursuance of their original association. The law, by which the partnership existed, and by which the united interest was regulated, was that alone by which the augmentation could be made. Whenever a partnership adopts a project, within the principles of their agreement, for the purpose of profit, it must be for the benefit of all the partners, in proportion to their respective interests in the concern. Natural justice requires that the majority should not have authority to exclude the minority. What is there in this case which should make it an exception from that general principle? There is nothing, that I can perceive, in the reason and nature of the thing. Suppose it to have been morally certain, that the augmentation would have been double in value, to the amount of the money necessary to make it; could a combination of a majority have deprived the minority of their proportion? The whole number of shares was one thousand; could the proprietors of five hundred and one have engrossed the whole, and deprived their partners of their share? It is impossible.

At the time of the vote to augment the capital, a banking-house had been purchased, and become the property of the institution. In this Mr. Gray was personally interested, in proportion as his interest in the bank was to the amount of the whole stock. After the capital is increased, the banking-house is, as it was before, the joint property of the stockholders; and the consequence of excluding him from the new stock without any compensation, is depriving him, without any consideration, of two thirds part of his property in this house. This shows, in a very glaring light, how unfounded is the principle for which the defendants contend.

2. By the terms of the vote designating those who should be authorized to subscribe to the new stock, the case of Mr. Gray is expressly included. He was an associate with the original subscribers, or an assignee of them, previous to the act of incorporation. This is evident from the application by those concerned to his agents; from his being furnished with the shares in the manner detailed in the evidence; from the notice which was issued to him, to pay his proportion of the capital; and from the certificates of ownership which were afterwards issued to him as a proprietor. So that if it was competent to the stockholders, as they say, to decide who should be interested in the new stock, and be authorized to subscribe to it, the plaintiff had undoubtedly the right which he claimed, and which he says has been violated. How this could have been misunderstood by the committee and officers of the bank, is, from the evidence given at the trial, to my mind, perfectly unaccountable. I do not, however, mean to accede to the practical exposition, which the corporation claimed by their vote, of excluding any of the stockholders from subscribing, if they pleased, to the new stock; but, from what has been said, I think it evident that, from any view that can be taken of the subject, Mr. Gray had a right to subscribe to the new stock. From hence it follows—

3. That the plaintiff, having offered to subscribe to the new stock, and to pay, as it became due, the amount of his subscription; and having been prevented from subscribing, and his payments having been refused by the agents and officers of the bank, he has thereby sustained an injury.

4. The plaintiff says that the bank is responsible to him for that misconduct of its agents and officers, of which he complains; and I think the position a correct one. That principals and masters should be responsible, civiliter, for the misconduct, negligence, and defaults of their agents and servants, while acting under the authority delegated to them, is indispensable to the security of the rights and property of all, who may be affected by such misconduct, negligence or default. This principle, the justness of which all must readily perceive, has been so frequently recognized in courts of justice, that a reference to authorities is deemed superfluous. I will, however, repeat what is said by Mr. Christian, in his notes on Blackstone's commentaries, as the reason on which this principle of law rests. "The law," he says, "which obliges masters to answer for the negligence and misconduct of their servants, though oftentimes severe upon an innocent person, is founded upon principles of public policy, in order to induce masters to be careful in the choice of their servants, upon which both their own security and that of others so greatly depends." In no case is this principle of so much importance as in the relation of corporations to their servants; because, in innumerable instances, they cannot act but by their agents, and there would be no security for those who might be affected by the acts of the agents, if they should abscond or be insolvent. This shows how improper it would be, as contended for by the counsel for the defendants, to oblige one, injured in this way, to resort for his remedy to the agent. * * * [61]

---

[61] Berle, Corporate Powers as Powers in Trust, 1931, 44 Harv.L.Rev. 1049, 1056; Drinker, The Preemptive Right of Shareholders to Subscribe to New Shares, 1930, 43 Harv.L.Rev. 586, 590; Dwight, Rights of Stockholders to New Stock, 1908, 18 Yale L.J. 101, 102.

STOKES v. CONTINENTAL TRUST CO. OF CITY OF NEW YORK.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1906. 186 N.Y. 285, 78 N.E. 1090.

Appeal from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in the first Judicial Department, entered January 4, 1905, reversing a judgment in favor of plaintiff entered upon a decision of the court on trial at Special Term and granting a new trial.

This action was brought by stockholder to compel his corporation to issue to him at par such a proportion of an increase made in its capital stock as the number of shares held by him before such increase bore to the number of all the shares originally issued, and in case such additional shares could not be delivered to him for his damages in the premises.

The defendant is a domestic banking corporation in the city of New York, organized in 1890, with a capital stock of $500,000, consisting of 5,000 shares of the par value of $100 each. The plaintiff was one of the original stockholders, and still owns all the stock issued to him at the date of organization, together with enough more acquired since to make 221 shares in all. On the 29th of January, 1902, the defendant had a surplus of $1,048,450.94, which made the book value of the stock at that time $309.69 per share. On the 2d of January, 1902, Blair & Co., a strong and influential firm of private bankers in the city of New York, made the following proposition to the defendant: "If your stockholders at the special meeting to be called for January 29th, 1902, vote to increase your capital stock from $500,000 to $1,000,000 you may deliver the additional stock to us as soon as issued at $450 per share ($100 par value) for ourselves and our associates, it being understood that we may nominate ten of the 21 trustees to be elected at the adjourned annual meeting of stockholders." * * * A resolution to increase the stock was adopted by the vote of 4,197 shares, all that were cast. Thereupon the plaintiff demanded from the defendant the right to subscribe for 221 shares of the new stock at par, and offered to pay immediately for the same, which demand was refused. A resolution directing a sale to Blair & Co. at $450 a share was then adopted by a vote of 3,596 shares to 241. The plaintiff voted for the first resolution, but against the last, and before the adoption of the latter he protested against the proposed sale of his proportionate share of the stock, and again demanded the right to subscribe and pay for the same, but the demand was refused.

On the 30th of January, 1902, the stock was increased, and on the same day was sold to Blair & Co. at the price named, although the plaintiff formally renewed his demand for 221 shares of the new stock at par, and tendered payment therefor, but it was refused upon the ground that the stock had already been issued to Blair & Co. Owing in part to the offer of Blair & Co. which had become known to the public, the market price of the stock had increased from $450 a share in September, 1901, to $550 in January, 1902, and at the time of the trial, in April, 1904, it was worth $700 per share. * * *

After finding these facts in substance, the trial court found, as conclusion of law, that the plaintiff had the right to subscribe for such proportion of the increase, as his holdings bore to all the stock before the increase was made; that the stockholders, directors, and officers of the defendant had no power to deprive him of that right, and that he was entitled to recover the difference between the market value of 221 shares on the 30th of January, 1902, and the par value thereof, or the sum of $99,450, together with interest from said date. The judgment entered accordingly was reversed by the Appellate Division, and the plaintiff appealed to this court, giving the usual stipulation for judgment absolute in case the order of reversal should be affirmed.

VANN, J. (after stating the facts). * * * Thus the question presented for decision is whether according to the facts found the plaintiff had the legal right to subscribe for and take the same number of shares of the new stock that he had held of the old?

The subject is not regulated by statute, and the question presented has never been directly passed upon by this court, and only to a limited extent has it been considered by courts in this state. * * *

If the right claimed by the plaintiff was a right of property belonging to him as a stockholder, he could not be deprived of it by the joint action of the other stockholders, and of all the directors and officers of the corporation.

In the case before us the new stock came into existence through the exercise of a right belonging wholly to the stockholders. As the right to increase the stock belonged to them, the stock when increased belonged to them also, as it was issued for money and not for property or for some purpose other than the sale thereof for money. By the increase of stock the voting power of the plaintiff was reduced one-half, and while he consented to the increase he did not consent to the disposition of the new stock by a sale thereof to Blair & Co. at less than its market value, nor by sale to any person in any way except by an allotment to the stockholders. The increase and sale involved the transfer of rights belonging to the stockholders as part of their investment. The issue of new stock and the sale thereof to Blair & Co. was not only a transfer to them of one-half the voting power of the old stockholders, but also of an equitable right to one-half the surplus which belonged to them. In other words, it was a partial division of the property of the old stockholders. The right to increase stock is not an asset of the corporation any more than the original stock when it was issued pursuant to subscription. The ownership of stock is in the nature of an inherent but indirect power to control the corporation. The stock when issued ready for delivery does not belong to the corporation in the way that it holds its real and personal property, with power to sell the same, but is held by it with no power of alienation in trust for the stockholders, who are the beneficial owners, and become the legal owners upon paying therefor. The corporation has no rights hostile to those of the stockholders, but is the trustee for all including the minority. The new stock issued by the defendant under the permission of the statute did not belong to it, but was held by it the same as the original stock when first issued was held in trust for the stockholders.

It has the same voting power as the old, share for share. The stockholders decided to enlarge their holdings, not by increasing the amount of each share, but by increasing the number of shares. The new stock belonged to the stockholders as an inherent right by virtue of their being stockholders, to be shared in proportion upon paying its par value or the value per share fixed by vote of a majority of the stockholders, or ascertained by a sale at public auction. While the corporation could not compel the plaintiff to take new shares at any price, since they were issued for money and not for property, it could not lawfully dispose of those shares without giving him a chance to get his proportion at the same price that outsiders got theirs. He had an inchoate right to one share of the new stock for each share owned by him of the old stock, provided he was ready to pay the price fixed by the stockholders. If so situated that he could not take it himself, he was entitled to sell the right to one who could, as is frequently done. Even this gives an advantage to capital, but capital necessarily has some advantage. Of course, there is a distinction when the new stock is issued in payment for property, but that is not this case. The stock in question was issued to be sold for money and was sold for money only. A majority of the stockholders, as part of their power to increase the stock, may attach reasonable conditions to the disposition thereof, such as the requirement that every old stockholder electing to take new stock shall pay a fixed price therefor, not less than par, however, owing to the limitation of the statute. They may also provide for a sale in parcels or bulk at public auction, when every stockholder can bid the same as strangers. They cannot, however, dispose of it to strangers against the protest of any stockholder who insists that he has a right to his proportion. Otherwise the majority could deprive the minority of their proportionate power in the election of directors and their proportionate right to share in the surplus, each of which is an inherent, pre-emptive, and vested right of property. It is inviolable, and can neither be taken away nor lessened without consent, or a waiver implying consent. The plaintiff had power, before the increase of stock, to vote on 221 shares of stock, out of a total of 5,000, at any meeting held by the stockholders for any purpose. By the action of the majority, taken against his will and protest, he now has only one-half the voting power that he had before, because the number of shares has been doubled while he still owns but 221. This touches him as a stockholder in such a way as to deprive him of a right of property. Blair & Co. acquired virtual control, while he and the other stockholders lost it. We are not discussing equities, but legal rights, for this is an action at law, and the plaintiff was deprived of a strictly legal right. If the result gives him an advantage over other stockholders, it is because he stood upon his legal rights, while they did not. The question is what were his legal rights, not what his profit may be under the sale to Blair & Co., but what it might have been if the new stock had been issued to him in proportion to his holding of the old. The other stockholders could give their property to Blair & Co., but they could not give his.

A share of stock is a share in the power to increase the stock, and belongs to the stockholders the same as the stock itself. When that power is exercised, the new stock belongs to the old stockholders in proportion to their holding of old stock, subject to compliance with the lawful terms upon which it is issued. When the new stock is issued in payment for property purchased by the corporation, the stockholders' right is merged in the purchase, and they have an advantage in the increase of the property of the corporation in proportion to the increase of stock. When the new stock is issued for money, while the stockholders may provide that it be sold at auction or fix the price at which it is to be sold, each stockholder is entitled to his proportion of the proceeds of the sale at auction, after he has had a right to bid at the sale, or to his proportion of the new stock at the price fixed by the stockholders.

We are thus led to lay down the rule that a stockholder has an inherent right to a proportionate share of new stock issued for money only and not to purchase property for the purposes of the corporation or to effect a consolidation, and while he can waive that right, he cannot be deprived of it without his consent except when the stock is issued at a fixed price not less than par, and he is given the right to take at that price in proportion to his holding, or in some other equitable way that will enable him to protect his interest by acting on his own judgment and using his own resources. This rule is just to all and tends to prevent the tyranny of majorities which needs restraint, as well as virtual attempts to blackmail by small minorities which should be prevented.

The remaining question is whether the plaintiff waived his rights by failing to do what he ought to have done, or by doing something he ought not to have done. * * * By selling to strangers without thus offering to sell to him, the defendant wrongfully deprived him of his property, and is liable for such damages as he actually sustained.

The learned trial court, however, did not measure the damages according to law. The plaintiff was not entitled to the difference between the par value of the new stock and the market value thereof, for the stockholders had the right to fix the price at which the stock should be sold. They fixed the price at $450 a share, and for the failure of the defendant to offer the plaintiff his share at that price we hold it liable in damages. His actual loss, therefore, is $100 per share, or the difference between $450, the price that he would have been obliged to pay had he been permitted to purchase, and the market value on the day of sale, which was $550. This conclusion requires a reversal of the judgment rendered by the Appellate Division and a modification of that rendered by the trial court.

The order appealed from should be reversed and the judgment of the trial court modified by reducing the damages from the sum of $99,450, with interest from January 30, 1902, to the sum of $22,100, with interest from that date, and by striking out the extra allowance of costs, and as thus modified the judgment of the trial court is affirmed, without costs in this court or in the Appellate Division to either party. * * * [62]

[62] Drinker, The Preemptive Right of Shareholders to Subscribe to New Shares, 1930, 43 Harv.L.Rev. 586, 593; Dwight, Rights of Stockholders to New Stock,

WALL v. UTAH COPPER COMPANY

Court of Chancery of New Jersey, 1905. 70 N.J.Eq. 17, 62 A. 533.

[Defendant, Utah Copper Company, a New Jersey corporation, had an authorized, issued capital stock of $4,500,000. Complainant Wall, one of seven directors and the largest individual stockholder, held 90,000 ($900,000 par value) shares in the company. Defendants MacNeill and Penrose, directors, were the next largest stockholders.

In 1905, to exploit defendant's property, MacNeill and Penrose contracted with Guggenheim Exploration Company, also a New Jersey corporation. The agreement provided: (1) Utah Copper Co. was to issue $3,000,000 of $1,000 par value bonds, payable in 10 years at 6% interest, secured by a mortgage to the Morton Trust Co.; the bonds to be convertible at the holders' option at any time within five years, into 50 shares of $10 par value stock of Utah Copper Co.; (2) $1,500,000 of new stock was to be issued to provide for the possible conversion of the bonds; (3) Guggenheim Exploration Co. was to be given the right to take the entire bond issue at ninety-eight cents on the dollar; (4) Guggenheim Exploration Co. was given an option to buy 156,000 shares of $10 par stock at $20 per share from MacNeill and Penrose; (5) MacNeill and Penrose were given the right and option to take one-half the entire bond issue on their own account on condition that if they converted the bonds into stock, they would sell part of such stock to Guggenheim Exploration Co. at $20 per share.

Guggenheim Exploration Co. might thus become the owner of $3,600,000 of the capital stock of Utah Copper Co., giving it a majority of the entire stock issue of $6,000,000.

A directors' meeting was called to consider a proposed contract between Utah Copper Co. and Guggenheim Exploration Co. which made no reference to the private arrangements between MacNeill, Penrose and Guggenheim Exploration Co., but incorporated provisions relating to the bond issue and the increase of stock for conversion purposes. The directors adopted this contract subject to ratification by the stockholders. Plaintiff was unable to attend this meeting, but objected in writing to the proposed agreement.

A stockholders' meeting was called for September 5, 1905. Wall, on receiving the notice of meeting, protested to MacNeill, and was then told that he would lose his preemptive right to subscribe to the new stock issue unless he agreed to give a purchase option of 51% of his stock holdings at $19.60 per share to American Smelters Security Co.

1908, 18 Yale L.J. 101, 104; Notes, 1907, 20 Harv.L.Rev. 398, 1907, 16 Yale L.J. 194.

On stockholders' pre-emptive rights to new issues of stock, see Berle and Means, The Modern Corporation and Private Property, 1932, 144–146, 255–260; Briggs, Some Legal Aspects of Stock Rights, 1932, 6 Temp.L.Q. 221; Drinker, The Preemptive Right of Shareholders to Subscribe to New Shares, 1930, 43 Harv.L.Rev. 586; Dwight, Rights of Stockholders to New Stock, 1908, 18 Yale L.J. 101; Frey, Shareholders' Preemptive Rights, 1929, 38 Yale L.J. 563; Morawetz, The Preemptive Right of Shareholders, 1928, 42 Harv.L.Rev. 186; Notes, 1928, 52 A.L.R. 220, 1913, 33 Col.L.Rev. 146, 1933, 11 N.Y.U.L.Q.Rev. 78, 1941, 15 Temp.L.Q. 287.

Wall sent an attorney to the stockholders' meeting and submitted a written protest to the ratification of the contract providing for the bond issue and increase of stock. Apparently the contract was approved in spite of his objections.

On September 11, Wall brought a bill to restrain the bond issue. On order to show cause why the injunction should not issue, argument was had and the following opinion rendered:]

PITNEY, V. C. (after stating the facts). * * * The last and most serious objection urged by complainant is that the proposed action will deprive him of a clear and indisputable right which he has by the law of the land to participate in any issue of new stock to an extent measured by the comparative amount of his present holdings of stock, and upon the same terms that other parties shall participate therein. In other words, that he is entitled to an opportunity to take and pay for one-fifth of the proposed new issue, and that the contract to dispose of all that issue to the exploration company infringes on that right.

This right, as I understand it, is based on two grounds.

First. That the complainant became the owner of one-fifth of the property of this corporation with the full understanding that he would thereby have a voice and influence in its management due, among other things, to that share, and that an increase of the stock issued to other people will diminish his voice and influence just so much.

Second. That at present he is entitled by law to one-fifth of the whole property of the corporation, whatever may be its value, and he is entitled to one-fifth of any increase of that value, whether such increase be due to the accumulation of actual earnings or to anticipated increase as the effect of the knowledge, by physical development, of its present value, and any issue of capital stock is of necessity a diminution of his share in that increase, and that in order to protect him against an undervaluation of the new stock to be issued, however that undervaluation may arise, he is entitled to the privilege of taking a proportionate share of the new stock, and especially is he so entitled in the present case, where there is no present sale of the new stock at an appraised value, but where an option is given to purchase at any time within five years, at a price now fixed, and which, when the option comes to be exercised, may prove to be entirely inadequate. Thus the holder of the option will have the whole of five years, during which the mining property is being developed, to ascertain and determine whether it is worth while for it to exercise its option. If the property does not improve in value and the stock is not worth $20 per share, it will not exercise its option, but will enforce the payment of the bond. If, on the other hand, the property does, either by its development or by the addition of undivided earnings, increase in value so as to be worth, as it may, many times the price fixed, it will exercise its option, and in such case it will gain at the expense and loss of the complainant.

The complainant's contention is, in my judgment, thoroughly based upon justice and law. * * *

For the reasons above set forth, I am of the opinion that the last objections taken by the complainant to these proceedings is fatal, and, without expressing any opinion upon the other objections made, that an injunction must go until the time of the hearing.[63]

MEREDITH et al. v. NEW JERSEY ZINC & IRON COMPANY.

Court of Chancery of New Jersey, 1897.
55 N.J.Eq. 211, 37 A. 539, affirmed 56 N.J.Eq. 454, 41 A. 1116.

PITNEY, V. C. The complainants are, severally, the owners of certain shares of stock in the New Jersey Zinc and Iron Company, and seek by their bill to enjoin the performance of a contract entered into by that company with the other defendants. * * *

[The New Jersey Zinc Company was organized in New Jersey in 1880 to carry on the mining, manufacturing and sale of ores in New Jersey and New York City. It had a capital stock of $3,040,000 of $100 par shares. Complainants held 291 shares. The contract whose performance is sought to be enjoined was approved by eight-tenths of the stockholders at a meeting called for the purpose.]

The defendant the New Jersey Zinc and Iron Company and the defendant the Hardyston Mining Company, very recently successor in title to the defendant the Lehigh Zinc and Iron Company, are severally the owners of certain mineral rights situate at a place called Mine Hill, in the Wallkill valley, in the county of Sussex. The mineral which they own is called franklinite and contains zinc, and its value consists in the presence of that mineral in it. It was discovered some fifty or sixty years ago, and when first discovered, and before the lodes or veins in which it was found were developed, it was supposed that there were two distinct minerals so situate that they could be separately owned and mined, namely, zinc and franklinite, the latter a peculiar mixture of mineral substances which takes its name from the village of Franklin, near which the veins are situate. Based upon this supposition, the titles to the two different minerals found in the same lodes or veins, at the place here in question, were separated. The right to mine the zinc ore was sold by itself, and the right to mine the franklinite ore was sold by itself.

But when an attempt was made to define and separate, in practice, the two ores in the earth, it was found that it was practically impossible and a serious dispute at once arose whether the various veins or portions of veins which were uncovered were franklinite or zinc.

This state of things has led to a series of litigations in the state and federal courts, with varying results, which, I may here say, were not at all referred to in the bill, but in argument counsel for de-

---

63 1906, 6 Col.L.Rev. 359; 1906, 4 Mich.L.Rev. 554.

See Note, 1906, 6 Col.L.Rev. 184, on whether a dissenting stockholder may restrain the issue of convertible bonds below par.

For a discussion of preemptive rights to convertible securities, and convertible securities in general, see Hills, Convertible Securities—Legal Aspects and Draftsmanship, 1930, 19 Calif.L.Rev. 1, esp. 1-12.

fendants relied, and I think properly, upon the common knowledge of the bench and bar of this state, derived from the official reports of the various suits, for a history of this controversy.

Before adverting to those reports it is proper to say that the defendant the New Jersey Zinc and Iron Company is the successor in title to the New Jersey Zinc Company, organized under a special charter about the middle of the century, and which became entitled to the "zinc" ore in the tract called Mine hill.

The title to the "franklinite" in a district known as the south half of Mine hill became vested in one party, and that of the franklinite in the north half became vested in another party.

The first suit was between the old New Jersey Zinc Company and the owner of the franklinite on the south half, and that resulted, first, in a victory for the franklinite company, as reported in New Jersey Zinc Co. v. New Jersey Franklinite Co., 13 N.J.Eq. 322. That decision was reversed, on appeal, in New Jersey Zinc Co. v. Boston Franklinite Co., 15 N.J.Eq. 418, and the title to both ores in effect apparently vested in the zinc company. That was in 1862.

Under that decision the old zinc company prosecuted its business upon the south half of Mine hill until some time in the next decade, when a party holding an unsatisfied mortgage on the franklinite in the south half, who was not a party to the previous litigation, foreclosed his mortgage, obtained the title and commenced a suit in the federal court against the New Jersey Zinc Company, which resulted adversely to that company. The result of that litigation was that the present New Jersey Zinc and Iron Company was organized, and the two warring titles to the franklinite and the zinc ores were conveyed to the new company, whereby it became the undisputed owner of all the ores in the south half of Mine hill and of the zinc ores on the north half.

In the meantime the franklinite on the north half became vested in the Lehigh Zinc and Iron Company, and about nine years ago the New Jersey Zinc and Iron Company commenced suit against the Lehigh Zinc and Iron Company to establish its title to the north half, which suit, with varying fortunes in the courts, was finally decided against the New Jersey Zinc and Iron Company in November, 1896.

This decision, however, covered only a part of the north half of the hill. Another undeveloped vein of the ore still remained unaffected by the decision.

In this state of things negotiations were entered into between the parties for the purpose of settling the litigation by the purchase by one party or the other of the opposite interests. * * *

The sworn statement of the president of the New Jersey Zinc and Iron Company is to the effect that the situation of affairs was such that it was found impracticable to effect a settlement of the controversy arising out of the difficulties in the title without buying up all of these works. With that view the contract in question was entered into, which was preliminary in its nature and depended upon the results of an investigation of the titles of all the properties and of the value in particular of the mines in Sussex county. Eminent experts, entirely indifferent between the parties, were chosen to appraise their value, and fixed them at a very high figure.

The price to be paid by the New Jersey Zinc and Iron Company for all these properties was (roughly) $1,250,000 in cash and the issue of thirty-two thousand nine hundred and thirty-four shares of stock, of $3,293,400 par value, to be distributed among the different owners.

The Lehigh Zinc and Iron Company and its appendages, including the Hardyston company, are owned almost entirely by four indivi-uals—Messrs. Richard and August Heckscher and S. P. and J. P. Wetherill. The Wetherills also own certain interests in some patent rights which pass with the sale.

In order to legitimatize the future operations of the company at points outside of the state and to make the necessary increase of capital stock, the same meeting of stockholders, which by a vote of about eight-tenths of the whole approved the contract, approved a change in the certificate of organization, by which the company was enabled to mine and manufacture outside the state and to buy and hold stocks &c. and to increase its capital stock.

This exposition of the circumstances and real objects of the contract is made so that the objections urged by the complainants may be the better understood. They are as follows: * * *

Third. The manner of increasing and distributing the increased capital stock is objected to, the particular ground of this last objecting being that any increase of capital stock must be divided among the present holders of stock in proportion to their holdings. * * *

The only point made in that connection was that when a block of increased stock is issued, each of the old holders is entitled to such a proportion of it as his holdings bore to the whole amount of stock before the increase, and that complainants' rights in that behalf are about to be invaded.

At the argument, counsel for defendants offered to the complainants to insure to them the right to purchase at par such proportion of the new stock as they would be entitled to under the rule relied upon.

By casting out of view that offer, two answers are made to the objection by the defendants—first, that the fifty-fifth section[64] authorizes the issuing of stock for the purchase of property, and that that section, which must also be read into the contract between the stockholders, overrides the general rule invoked; and second, that the general rule (if there be such) requiring an equal distribution of new stock was adopted by the courts for the purpose of preventing any particular stockholders or clique of stockholders from appropriating to themselves the right to subscribe to new stock at par when such privilege is worth a premium.[65] 2 Beach Priv.Corp. § 473;

---

[64] N.J.Corporation Act 1875, § 55, deals with the issue of stock for property. N.J.Rev.Laws 1877 (Corporation Act 1877) p. 187, § 55, provides that directors may issue stock in payment for property.

Cf. N.J.S.A. § 14:8–9, infra, p. 370, f. n. 80.

[65] The following remarks by Pitney, V. C., in Wall v. Utah Copper Co., supra, Gray v. President, etc., of Portland Bank, 3 Mass. 364, 3 Am.Dec. 156. In the case in hand, as the stock is issued for the purchase of property which will become a part of the common property, and from which the dissenting stockholder will receive the same benefit, if any, as each of his associates, I can see no reason for the application of the rule in this case. The amount of stock to be issued to the parties interested in the properties to be conveyed was fixed upon the basis of their actual value.

The parties dealt at arm's length, and, as before observed, there is no reason to suspect that there is here the least element of a party making a contract with himself. Besides, it is well held in such cases that in case the corporation deprives a stockholder of his rights in this behalf, it is liable to an action at law for damages, and there is no suggestion that the zinc company is not of sufficient responsibility to answer to such action.

For these reasons, I think the complainants are not entitled to relief on that ground.

* * * I shall advise that the application for an order of restraint be denied.[66]

NOTES

(A) Although normally no pre-emptive right exists to subscribe to treasury stock, if the corporate directors, in breach of their fiduciary relation to stockholders, issue treasury shares to themselves, a preemptive right may arise. Hammer v. Werner, 239 App.Div. 38, 265 N.Y.S. 172, 2d Dep't., 1933; Note, 1933, 71 N.Y.U.L.Q. Rev. 78; 1934, 3 Brooklyn L.Rev. 337; 1933, 32 Mich.L.Rev. 110; 1933, 8 St. John's L.Rev. 153; 1934, 1 U. of Chi.L.Rev. 645.

(B) Even where stockholders are barred from pre-emptive rights by statute, they nevertheless have the right to demand that corporate directors do not use their position for their own personal advantage nor to cause stock to be issued to themselves to make a profit or obtain or retain control of the corporation. Schwab et al. v. Schwab-Wilson Machine Corporation, Ltd., et al., 13 Cal.App.2d 1, 55 P.2d 1268, 1936.

THOM v. BALTIMORE TRUST CO.

Court of Appeals of Maryland, 1930. 158 Md. 352, 148 A. 234.

URNER, J. The inquiry in this case is whether the appellants, as stockholders of the Baltimore Trust Company, were entitled to exercise the right to purchase a due proportion of a supplemental issue

p. 343, are significant in considering the Meredith Case,—"Against this doctrine defendants rely on the case of Meredith v. New Jersey Zinc & Iron Co., 55 N.J.Eq. 211, 37 A. 539, decided by myself, and affirmed on appeal, 56 N.J.Eq. 454, 41 A. 1116, on my opinion. What is expressly relied upon is found upon page 220 of 55 N.J. Eq., 37 A. 542, and counsel seem to think that the interpolation of the words in parentheses, 'if there be such,' after the words 'general rule,' manifested a doubt in my mind as to its existence. It is proper for me to say here that what I there said was the result of not more than ten minutes of consideration, and the only study given to the question was the reading of the section referred to in 2 Beach Corp. And if I had then had at command time to give the subject proper consideration, I am not at all sure that I should have dictated the sentence which immediately follows the citation of the Massachusetts case, which was not necessary for the decision of the cause."

66 Aff'd, without opinion, 56 N.J.Eq. 454, 41 A. 1116, 1898.

of its capital stock. It was held by the lower court that such a pre-emptive right would exist if the new shares had been intended to be sold for cash, but, that, as they were to be issued in payment for property, consisting of the stock of the National Union Bank of Maryland, the asserted right was not enforceable. The appeals are from an order and a decree effectuating that conclusion.

The case was heard on bill and answer, and from the pleadings and exhibits we learn the controlling facts, which may be briefly stated. At a meeting of stockholders of the Baltimore Trust Company, held after legal notice, approval was given, by the holders of more than two-thirds of its outstanding shares, to a plan recommended by its directors to merge its interests with those of the National Union Bank of Maryland. According to the plan, as submitted and adopted, the trust company would issue 15,000 shares of its stock, at a valuation of $112 per share, for the purpose of acquiring the 10,000 shares of the National Union Bank stock at a valuation of $168 per share. The contract to that end between the representatives of the two institutions was to be consummated only in the event that at least 70 per cent. of the bank stock could be delivered upon the agreed terms. The requisite increase of the trust company's capital stock was authorized by a charter amendment duly adopted by its stockholders. A contemporaneous amendment of the charter provided: "Upon any increased issue of stock, the stockholders shall have the pro rata preferential right to subscribe therefor at such price and on such terms as the Board of Directors may in each instance fix. In the event of the issue of any additional stock of the Company for the purpose of accomplishing the merger with or of acquiring any other bank or trust company or other property, the Directors may issue said stock without preferential subscription rights to stockholders or with preferential subscription rights to such extent and on such terms as the Board may in each instance deem proper." As the owner of 6,416 of the 70,000 shares of the trust company's capital stock, the plaintiffs voted and protested against the merger agreement, and the use of the proposed new issue of stock for the exchange purposes contemplated, which involved a disregard of the privilege of proportional purchase upon which the plaintiffs insisted. All of the 10,000 shares of the National Union Bank stock were in fact made available for delivery to the trust company upon the merger terms, and the whole of the new issue of 15,000 shares of the trust company's stock was required for the acquisition of the bank stock at the valuations specified in the agreement for the exchange.

The right of pre-emption claimed by the plaintiffs is said to be inherent in their stock ownership, and also to be conferred by the charters of certain corporations from the consolidation of which the Baltimore Trust Company derived its existence and the powers it possessed at the period when the merger with the National Union Bank was being negotiated. As then constituted, the Baltimore Trust Company owed its origin to the union of two corporations, one of which had been formed as the result of an earlier consolidation.

The charter of one of the constituent companies participating in the last consolidation made no provision for a pre-emptive right of stockholders with respect to additional issues of stock, and neither of the consolidation agreements made any reference to such a privilege. It was accorded in the charters of the two corporations which united under the first consolidation, but in one there was an important limitation, which the other did not contain, in regard to the exercise of the right. If the holders of stock of the Baltimore Trust Company, into which the stock of the constituent corporations was converted in pursuance of the consolidation, were entitled to refer to the charters of the former companies for the ascertainment of their rights, it would be impossible to find in those charters any support for the preemptive option as exercisable equally by all owners of the present company's stock. The effect of the successive consolidations was to end the existence of the constituent corporations and to vest in the new corporation all of their property, powers, and liabilities (Code, art. 23, § 34; Diggs v. Fidelity & Deposit Co., 112 Md. 72, 75 A. 517, 20 Ann.Cas. 1274), and, while consistent privileges of stockholders conferred by the superseded charters may presumably continue as incidents of the consolidated stock ownership, there could be no such survival of rights traceable to only one of the charters, or subject in one to a special limitation, because the uniform and equal recognition of the right in all the stockholders of the consolidated company is impossible, under such conditions, so far as any charter origin of the right is concerned.

Independently of the charters, however, the stockholders of a corporation have a preferential right to purchase new issues of its shares, to the proportional extent of their respective interests in the capital stock then outstanding, when the privilege can be exercised consistently with the object which the disposition of the additional stock is legally designed to accomplish. The right inheres in stock ownership as an essential means of enabling a stockholder to maintain the existing ratio of his proprietary interest and voting power in the corporation. It is an option which is capable of practical and useful exercise when new stock is to be issued for money needed to increase the company's cash assets. To that extent the right is well recognized, but to such stock issues it is generally restricted. In transactions involving the acquisition of property by corporations in exchange for shares of their stock, the determining consideration to the owners of the property may be the advantage of sharing as stockholders in the profits of the corporation with which they are contracting. In the present case every stockholder of the National Union Bank, for each of his shares of the stock of that institution, was to receive one and one-half shares of Baltimore Trust Company stock. It would not be feasible to consummate a transfer based upon such a consideration if the pre-emptive right asserted in this suit were to be held enforceable with respect to every new issue of stock regardless of the object of its disposition. Within the limits just indicated, the pre-emptive rights of the plaintiffs and other stockholders of the Baltimore Trust Company are recognized and protected by the new charter amendment which we have quoted. In declaring the right as to sales of stock for cash, and in restricting it as to issues of stock for accomplishing a merger or acquiring property, the amendment is in valid accord with the principles we have stated, which have adequate support in reason and authority. * * *

As our conclusion agrees with that of the lower court, we shall affirm its decree dismissing the bill of complaint.

Order and decree affirmed, with costs. [67]

ARCHER v. HESSE.

Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Division, First Department, 1914.
164 App.Div. 493, 150 N.Y.S. 296.

[The board of directors of a domestic corporation voted to issue 197 shares of its preferred stock to Hesse, a director. Plaintiff, Archer, on behalf of himself and all other stockholders, brought an action against the company and its directors to have the resolution declared void and the stock so issued cancelled and surrendered. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, directing Hesse to surrender his shares for cancellation. The company then had 197 shares of its authorized preferred stock unissued.

The directors adopted a resolution authorizing the issuance of 55 shares of preferred stock to attorneys, McCorkle and Bayne, for services rendered to the corporation and its directors in the cancellation proceeding. Certificates were issued and delivered.

Plaintiff obtained an order to show cause why the directors and the lawyers should not be punished for contempt of court for issuing, delivering and accepting the stock certificates. Defendants were adjudged guilty of contempt and directed to surrender and have cancelled the shares. From this order, the present appeal is taken by defendants.]

McLAUGHLIN, J. (after stating the facts). * * * But it is urged that the issuance of the stock to McCorkle and Bayne was unlawful, and, therefore, the order may be sustained upon that ground. What is claimed in this respect is that such stock was "unissued authorized capital stock of the company and before it could be issued lawfully every existing stockholder of the company was entitled to an opportunity to subscribe to it in such proportions as the stock he then held bore to the total amount of stock then outstanding." I do not understand this to be a correct statement of the law. A corporation may use its original unissued authorized capital stock for any legitimate or lawful purpose it sees fit, and the authorities cited are not to the contrary. Stokes v. Continental Trust Co., 186 N.Y. 285, 78

---

[67] 1930, 30 Col.L.Rev. 569; 1930, 39 Yale L.J. 905; 1930, 78 U. of Pa.L.Rev. 1026. See Frey, Shareholders' Pre-emptive Rights, 1929, 38 Yale L.J. 563.

A certificate of incorporation may be amended to deprive consenting stockholders of their pre-emptive rights to new stock issued for money but such an amendment is not binding on any dissenting stockholder. Albrecht, Maguire & Co., Inc. v. General Plastics, Inc., and others, 256 App.Div. 134, 9 N.Y.S.2d 415, 4th Dep't., 1939 aff'd without opinion, 280 N.Y. 840, 21 N.E.2d 887, 1939; Note, 1939, 25 Corn. L.Q. 124.

N.E. 1090, 12 L.R.A.,N.S., 969, 9 Ann.Cas. 738; Waters v. Horace Waters & Co., supra. Before making such use it is not obligated to give to existing stockholders an opportunity to purchase. It is only when the capital stock is increased by the issue of new shares that each holder of the original stock has a right to subscribe for and demand from the corporation such a proportion of the new stock as the number of shares already owned by him bears to the whole number of shares before the increase. In that case the rule simply applies when the new stock is issued for money only, and not to purchase property necessary for the purposes of the corporation, or to effect a consolidation. Stokes v. Continental Trust Co., supra; Waters v. Horace Waters & Co., supra.

The order appealed from, therefore, is reversed, with ten dollars costs and disbursements, and the motion to punish appellants for contempt denied, with ten dollars costs. [68]

ROSS TRANSPORT, INCORPORATED, et al. v. CROTHERS et al.

Court of Appeals of Maryland, 1946. 45 A.2d 267.

Stockholders' derivative suit by Charles T. Crothers, for himself and for other stockholders who might join and be made parties, against Ross Transport, Inc., and Wallace Williams and others to set aside the issuance of shares of stock to defendants, Elizabeth B. Williams, Corrine Williams, Lois Williams Young, and William B. Ross, wherein Edmund W. Crothers joined as a party plaintiff. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

MARBURY, CHIEF JUDGE. * * * It appears from the record that the corporation was organized on January 19, 1942 to operate a fleet of buses to transport employees of Triumph Explosives, Inc. to and from its plant at Elkton, Maryland. The incorporators were Wallace Williams, William B. Ross and Gervase R. Sinclair who later died. These three and F. DuPont Thomson and James W. Hughes were the directors. At the organization meeting of the directors, Williams was named as President and Ross as General Manager. The authorized stock was 5000 shares of no par value. At the organization meeting a resolution was passed authorizing the sale of this stock at $20 a share, and providing that stock to the value of $30,000 be offered for sale. This limited the stock to be issued to 1500 shares. * * * [The total original amount of stock issued was 1035 shares].

In the latter part of July 1942, after the death of Mr. Sinclair, Charles T. Crothers purchased the Sinclair stock, 200 shares, at $20 and 5% interest from the date of issuance. This did not, of course, increase the amount of stock outstanding. On August 26, 1942, the stock complained of was issued to the wife and daughters of Wallace Williams and to William B. Ross, totaling 365 shares in all, and increasing the outstanding stock to 1400 shares. All of this stock was issued at the set price of $20.00 a share. The stock issued to the Williams family was paid by Mr. Williams' check for $4800. Mr. Ross paid the company $2500 for his stock. * * *

[68] See Sec. 39–4(d) N. Y. Stock Corp. Law, supra, p. 333.

Williams and Ross, therefore, had the controlling interest in the company. Mr. Williams testified that all of the stock in the company was sold by him personally under the directors' resolution. * * *

The sale of this additional stock to a director and to the family of the president and director without any further authority than the original resolution, and without opportunity to buy given to other stockholders, is sought to be justified on the ground that it was originally planned, and that the money was needed to purchase additional buses at a cost of about $16,000. The facts, however, show no such need. The company was an immediate financial success. It was engaged in a special business, of which it had a monopoly, and in which it could not help making money so long as Triumph Explosives continued to operate its large plant, employing the workmen the Transport Corporation hauled. * * * On November 27, 1942, a dividend of $5 a share was declared. On December 17, 1942 one of $15 (called a return of capital, but not authorized by the stockholders, Code, Article 23, Sec. 32). On the same date, another dividend of $5 a share was declared payable June 30, 1943. The defendants, Williams and Ross, who were operating the company, knew on August 26, 1942, that they were about to receive large sums in dividends in addition to the salaries they were getting. The benefit of these dividends would not only increase the value of the stock, but the first two would pay back all the subscribers had invested, leaving any future earnings and distributions pure profit. Under these circumstances, they took the opportunity they thought they had to increase their investment, and in fact received in December the full amount they invested in August, leaving them with the additional stock on which to receive such further dividends as were obviously in sight.

The appellants contend that the company was not in the claimed good financial condition in August, because no allowance had been made for income and profits taxes. But if we reduce the book surplus of $25,000 on August 16, 1942, by allowing for a 40% tax (the limit unless the earnings increased), we still find the company with a net surplus of $15,000, 75% of the original investment. The stock had no "market value," but it must be obvious that it was worth much more than $20 a share on August 26th.

The appellees give two reasons for their contention that the stock sales of August 26th were void: First because they deprive them and the other original stockholders of their pre-emptive rights to purchase a proportionate amount of the remaining shares, and, second, because, in selling to themselves and their nominees, Williams and Ross have abused their trust as officers and directors. They claim to be injured in two ways. Their voting powers have been proportionately lessened, and the control of the company has passed to Williams and Ross. And the amount paid in dividends has to be divided among 365 more shares of stock to the consequent financial loss of the holders of the original shares. * * * The doctrine known as the pre-emptive right of shareholders is a judicial interpretation of general principles of corporation law. Existing stockholders are the owners of the business, and are entitled to have that ownership continued in the same proportion. Therefore, when additional stock is issued, those already having shares, are held to have the first right to buy the new stock in proportion to their holdings. This doctrine was first promulgated in 1807 in the case of Gray v. Portland Bank, 3 Mass. 364, 3 Am.Dec. 156. At that time, corporations were small and closely held, much like the one before us in this case. But in the succeeding years, corporations grew and expanded. New capital was frequently required. New properties had to be acquired for which it was desirable to issue stock. Companies merged, and new stock in the consolidation was issued. Stock was issued for services. Different kinds of stock were authorized—preferred without voting power but with prior dividend rights—preferred with the right to convert into common—several classes of both common and preferred with different rights. Some stock had voting rights. Other stock did not. Bonds were issued, convertible into stock. All of these changes in the corporate structure made it impossible always to follow the simple doctrines earlier decided. Exceptions grew, and were noted in the decisions.

Only one of these exceptions is involved in the present case. It has been held that pre-emptive rights do not exist where the stock about to be issued is part of the original issue. This exception is based upon the fact that the original subscribers took their stock on the implied understanding that the incorporators could complete the sale of the remaining stock to obtain the capital thought necessary to start the business. But this gives rise to an exception to the exception, where conditions have changed since the original issue. The stock sold the Williams family and Ross was part of the original issue, and it is claimed by the appellants that it comes within the exception, and the appellees and the other stockholders have no pre-emptive rights. Balto. Ry. Co. v. Hambleton, 77 Md. 341, 26 A. 279; Real Estate Trust Co. v. Bird, 90 Md. 229, 44 A. 1048; Thom v. Baltimore Trust Co., 158 Md. 352, 148 A. 234; Yasik v. Wachtel, Del. Ch., 17 A.2d 309; 40 Mich.L.Rev. 115. The appellees, on the other hand, contend, and the chancellors found, that changed conditions made it unnecessary to use the remaining unsold stock to obtain capital, and pre-emptive rights exist in it just as they would exist in newly authorized stock. Hammer v. Werner, 239 App.Div. 38, 265 N.Y.S. 172, Dunlay v. Avenue etc. Co., 253 N.Y. 274, 170 N.E. 917, 43 Harvard L.Rev. 586, 602–603.

It is unnecessary for us to decide which of these two conflicting points of view applies to this case, because another controlling consideration enters. The doctrine of pre-emptive right is not affected by the identity of the purchasers of the issued stock. What it is concerned with is who did not get it. But when officers and directors sell to themselves, and thereby gain an advantage, both in value and in voting power, another situation arises, which it does not require the assertion of a pre-emptive right to deal with. * * *[69]

Decree affirmed with costs.

NOTE

In one instance, the Atlantic Refining Company effected a merger with its wholly owned subsidiary (the Point Breeze Manufacturing Company) for the purpose of eliminating preemptive rights of the common stockholders:

"The Common Stock will be unchanged, except as it is affected by the reclassification of the Preferred Stock, and except that after the merger the Common Stockholders will have no preemptive subscription rights. The offering of future issues of Preferred or Common Stock for subscription will thereafter be discretionary with the Board of Directors. The elimination of subscription rights will greatly facilitate financing because the hazards of an underwriting commitment over a subscription period result in less favorable prices to the Company and heavier underwriting charges. In periods of uncertain business and market conditions, the cost of such an underwriting may be prohibitive." [70]

Students of the subject will observe that the common stockholder's defense against "dilution" is sacrificed, without ceremony, to the alleged business convenience of financing.

4. CONSIDERATION RECEIVED FOR STOCK

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW

§ 69. Consideration for issue of stock and bonds. No corporation shall issue either shares of stock or bonds, except for money, labor done or property actually received for the use and lawful purposes of such corporation. No shares of stock having par value shall be issued for money in an amount less than the par value of such shares. Any corporation may purchase any property authorized by its certificate of incorporation, or necessary for the use and lawful purposes of such corporation, and may issue stock to the amount of the value thereof in payment therefor, and the stock so issued shall be full paid stock and not liable to any further call, neither shall the holder thereof be liable for any further payment under any of the provisions of this chapter; and in the absence of fraud in the transaction the judgment of the directors as to the value of the property purchased shall be conclusive; and in all statements and reports of the corporation by law required to be published or filed, this stock shall not be stated or reported as being issued for cash paid to the corporation, but shall be reported as issued for property purchased.

§ 74. Partly paid stock. The certificate of incorporation or other certificate filed pursuant to law may contain a provision expressly authorizing the issue of the whole or of any part of the shares as partly paid, subject to calls thereon until the whole thereof shall have been paid in. The corporation may declare and may pay dividends upon the basis of the amount actually paid upon the respective shares. If upon the certificate issued to represent such stock the amount paid thereon shall be specified, the holder thereof shall not be subject to any liability to the corporation except for the payment of the amount shown by such certificate as unpaid.

[69] That part of the opinion dealing with the directors' fiduciary duty appears, infra, p. 1051.

[70] The Atlantic Refining Company Proxy Statement, March 20, 1947.

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

Sec. 14. Issuance of Stock for Cash, Labor Done, or Real or Personal Property; Consideration for Shares of Stock Without Par Value; Determination of Amount of Capital; Statements of Amount of Par Value and of Amounts of Authorized or Issued Shares of Stock; Issuance of Partly Paid Shares, and Liability in Respect Thereof; Options in Respect of Shares:—Subscriptions to, or the purchase price of, the capital stock of any corporation organized or to be organized under any law of this State may be paid for, wholly or partly, by cash, by labor done, by personal property, or by real property or leases thereof; and the stock so issued shall be declared and taken to be full paid stock and not liable to any further call, nor shall the holder thereof be liable for any further payments under the provisions of this Chapter. And in the absence of actual fraud in the transaction, the judgment of the directors, as to the value of such labor, property, real estate or leases thereof, shall be conclusive.

(a) Quality: Requirement That Consideration for Stock Issue shall be of a Stated Kind.

SCULLY et al. v. AUTOMOBILE FINANCE CO. et al.

Court of Chancery of Delaware, 1920. 12 Del.Ch. 174, 109 A. 49.

[The complainants are stockholders and directors of the Automobile Finance Co. and filed this bill to have cancelled all the common stock of the company. By amendment to the bill, all the common stockholders of the company were made defendants.

Two defendants, McEvilla and Chisholm, planned to establish an automobile agency to sell cars on the installment plan. They organized the Automobile Finance Company, under the laws of Delaware with dummy directors. 40,000 shares of capital stock of $10 par value were authorized, divided in 20,000 voting common and 20,000 nonvoting preferred.

As part of the plan, the same incorporators organized the Central Security Co., with a capital of 100 $50 par shares.

At the first directors' meeting of defendant company, McEvilla and Chisholm offered their scheme for the operation of the finance company and agreed to manage the corporation in return for 20,000 full-paid, non-assessable par value common shares. Said shares to be issued 19,988 to the Central Security Co. and three shares to each of four promoters. This offer was accepted by the dummy directors. A resolution valuing the plan and services so offered at $200,000 was adopted; the shares issued.

Later, defendant corporation engaged the services of the Central Security Co. as the exclusive selling agent for the preferred stock, on a commission basis. These shares were sold with a bonus of common stock. An additional bonus of common stock was given to directors of defendant company.]

THE CHANCELLOR. This suit was brought by four stockholders of the Automobile Finance Company to have cancelled all the shares of common stock of the company, on the ground that they had been issued without consideration and illegally. A demurrer to the original bill was overruled, answers were filed thereafter, and later an amended bill was filed and answers thereto filed. Testimony was taken, and a final hearing has been had. * * *

All of the shares of the common stock of the Automobile Finance Company of par value of two hundred thousand dollars were issued pursuant to the agreement made by the company with McEvilla and Chisholm, whereby they were (1) to turn over and assign to the company a plan of doing business, and (2) devote themselves to effectuating that business. Part of the consideration, therefore, was property and the rest consisted of services to be rendered. Did either constitute a valid consideration within the meaning of the constitution and statutes [71] of Delaware? The plan of business was an application to automobiles of plans by which prospective purchasers of property are assisted to buy and pay for the same and acquire title thereto, the company making the purchase and holding title until the whole of the purchase money is paid, in installments or otherwise, the customer in the meantime having possession under a form of bailment or lease. It was substantially the same as the Morris plan of banking. It was without novelty, had no element of property, was not assignable and could not in any fair sense be "acquired" by the company. Neither was it labor done, nor services rendered. It did not, therefore, constitute a valid consideration. This is equally true of the other thing which was stated as a consideration, the services to be rendered by McEvilla and Chisholm to the company. Services to be rendered cannot be a valid consideration for the issuance of full paid, non-assessable shares of stock, for these can be issued only for "labor done", i. e., after it has been done. This does not mean that shares may not be issued for services to be rendered so long as they are not marked fully paid until that condition has been fulfilled by rendering the service. By the statute shares may be issued before paid for, and will be subject to assessment either by the corporation or for the benefit of creditors up to the par value thereof, and this statute is not necessarily inconsistent with the constitution. General Corporation Law, Revised Code 1915, c. 65, §§ 20–23, pp. 925, 926.[72] Therefore, the issue in this case 71 See, supra, p. 356 and infra f. n. 75, p. 362.

---

72 Del.Rev.Code 1915, c. 65, § 20: "When the whole capital stock of a corporation shall not have been paid in, and the assets shall be insufficient to satisfy the claims of its creditors, each stockholder shall be bound to pay on each share held by him the sum necessary to complete the amount of the par value of such share * * *, or such proportion of that sum as shall be required to satisfy the debts of the company * * *" of the shares of common stock as full paid and non-assessable was without lawful consideration.

The pretense of a valuation by the directors of the consideration was ineffective to validate the consideration. Although there were two things offered as a consideration, the business plan and future services, the directors after accepting the proposition of McEvilla and Chisholm adjudged that "said service and effort on behalf of the corporation is of the actual value of two hundred thousand dollars to this corporation," and did not include the business plan in the valuation. There was no valuation of the plan of business, and the directors had no power to adjudge value to future services as a basis for full paid stock. Indeed, by their subsequent conduct the parties to that subscription agreement in effect concede that there was no lawful consideration for the common stock, for the corporation has so declared and levied an assessment thereon, and McEvilla and Chisholm have paid their assessments. This is probably not conclusive on other stockholders, and the complainants do not admit that the action of the company in making the assessment was valid.

But even assuming, as was contended, that the common stock was issued in part for labor done and to be done for the corporation, the business plan being a fruit of the labor performed, there was a conscious gross over-valuation thereof by the directors. Testimony was offered to show the services performed by McEvilla and Chisholm before the incorporation in framing the business plan, and of Chisholm since the incorporation, and there was testimony that the services of Chisholm were worth five thousand dollars, but no valuation was made of those of McEvilla. Obviously, then, there was an over-valuation of at least ninety-seven and one-half per cent., when something worth not more than five thousand dollars was valued at two hundred thousand dollars.

The legal effect of this conscious over-valuation has not been distinctly declared in this state where the corporation was a solvent, going concern. In Ellis v. Penn Beef Co., 9 Del.Ch. 213, 80 A. 666, the contract of subscription was valid, and there was no evidence of an over-valuation of the consideration for the shares of stock. There the question arose between a stockholder who had paid full value for his shares and other stockholders who had failed to deliver any but an insignificant part of the consideration for the stock. The Chancellor expressed the view that no pretended exercise of judgment could give value to that which had none. * * *

Under the circumstances of this case, what is the appropriate form of relief? All of the holders of common and preferred stock are parties to the cause. A prime consideration is that all of the holders of common stock took their shares with notice that they were bonus or gratuity shares, for which they paid or gave nothing (except perhaps Chisholm), or else they were put on inquiry, as were the shareholders held to be in Cooney Co. v. Arlington Hotel

---

Sections 21–23 deal with subscriptions to capital stock; failure to pay for stock and remedies therefore; and certificate of payment of capital stock.

Cf. Del.Rev.Code 1935, §§ 20–23, and N.Y.Stock Corporation Law, §§ 67, 68, 70–73.

Co., 11 Del.Ch. 286, 101 A. 879, supra. Indeed, it is admitted by solicitors for all the parties who have appeared that the holders of common stock are in pari delicto, and the Automobile Finance Company has assumed that the stock is not full paid, but is assessable. It is also true that even the shares for which the incorporators subscribed have lost their identity as such.

The most equitable and appropriate relief in this case is to leave the parties as they find themselves; hold the shares of common stock assessable by the corporation for the purposes of the company; and in order to protect the holders of the common stock and also any transferees and the public, require that each share shall be made to show what has been paid or credited thereon, and that they are not full paid. The relief advocated by the solicitor for the complainants is that all of the common stock be declared to be void, and that a receiver be appointed to sell the common stock under the direction of this Court. It was not made clear who would issue the shares, and how the new regime could be inaugurated, and the plan does not seem fair, practicable or effective.

It is urged against this that the control of the company is left in the hands of those who have acquired many shares of common stock gratuitously, and it does appear that seven persons, holders of two thousand and eighty-seven shares of common stock out of the four thousand nine hundred and seventy-one and one-half shares outstanding, hold no preferred stock, and (except perhaps Chisholm) have given nothing to the company; and it also appears that other persons hold common stock as gratuities, though not received as a bonus with their preferred stock. But there is neither allegation nor proof of mismanagement, or collusive attempt to use control of the company for any improper purpose, or to the detriment of the shareholders. This last objection does not seem, therefore, to have weight.

Is Chisholm entitled to compensation for services rendered by him, and if so, how much and how will it be allowed to him? Under ordinary circumstances where there has been either a lack of a real valuation, or a conscious and perhaps gross overvaluation, and yet some value or consideration was given for shares of stock, a court of equity to do full justice may, where it is possible to do so, give the holder of the stock credit in some way for what is found by it to have been given as a consideration for the stock. In Ellis v. Penn Beef Co., 9 Del.Ch. 213, 220, 80 A. 666, it was intimated that this might be done, though in that case there was no opportunity to do so. This view is supported by the case of Vineland Grape Juice Co. v. Chandler, 80 N.J.Eq. 437, 85 A. 213, Ann.Cas.1914A, 679.

It would seem that Chisholm could be most fittingly compensated for his services by allowing him as a payment on the shares held by him such sum as his services to the company were worth. This would be paying him in the way he expected to be paid, viz.: in shares of common stock and not money. From the testimony submitted it is clear that his services were not worth five thousand dollars to the company, and that a credit of five per cent. on each of the fourteen hundred and ninety-seven shares of common stock held by him would be a fair allowance therefor. This sum so allowed would be endorsed as payment pro rata on the shares of common stock of the company held by him, or otherwise as may be provided in the decree.

Inasmuch as the complainants as stockholders have by this suit been instrumental in putting on a legal basis the holdings of the common stock to the advantage of all of the stockholders of the Automobile Finance Company, the costs should be paid by that corporation.

Let a decree be entered accordingly. * * * [73]

NOTE

"The conclusion (drawn) * * * from * * * (the) review of the several 'good faith' rules as opposed to one another and to the 'true value' rule is that the distinctions are largely verbal. * * * There is little or no ground for making a practical distinction between the operation of the several rules, because the question in any case * * * resolves itself into a query as to what was a reasonable valuation of the property as made by the directors in the exercise of ordinary business judgment based on the circumstances that were evident at the time. * * * If the directors have exercised ordinary business prudence, and have valued the property as though they were purchasing it for their own use, the judgment will ordinarily be in favor of the defendant regardless of the nominal rule to which the court happens to subscribe. If, on the other hand, they made no serious attempt to value the property; or if they ignored the plain and obvious facts of the situation * * * the judgment will go against them. In effect, the standard of conduct for which all of the courts hold directors and shareholders responsible is that of ordinary business prudence. * * *" Reprinted from Dodd, "Stock Watering; The Judicial Valuation of Property for Stock Issue Purposes," by permission of Columbia University Press, 1930, 92–93.

JOHN W. COONEY CO. v. ARLINGTON HOTEL CO.

Court of Chancery of Delaware, 1917. 11 Del.Ch. 286, 101 A. 879.

[Defendant company was created under the laws of Delaware in 1911. Its authorized capital was fixed at $5,500,000, consisting of 55,000 shares of $100 par value each,—25,000 preferred and 30,000 non-assessable, full-paid common stock.

At the first meeting of the directors, the following resolution was adopted: "Resolved, that as the success of the enterprise will depend largely upon the energy, ability, and integrity of George Howard, Frank M. Andrews and James F. J. Archibald, in securing options on the property, promoting, financing and managing the same, and inasmuch as it is desired to offer additional inducements to subscribers of the preferred stock and to remunerate the said Howard, Andrews and Archibald for services rendered and to be rendered by them, and by others, therefore it shall be, and hereby is, assigned and transferred to the aforesaid persons the entire issue of the common stock, to be used by them for the purposes named, with the distinct understanding that the holders of the common stock shall agree to transfer the same to a voting trust consisting of the aforesaid persons, and to receive in lieu thereof trustee certificates, for the purpose of vesting in them the right to vote thereon for a period of five years from the date of the incorporation, such voting trust being created for the purpose of carrying out the purposes aforesaid and the articles of incorporation uninterruptedly during that period."

[73] For a discussion of the issuance of stock for services or labor, see Dodd, Stock Watering, The Judicial Valuation of Property for Stock-Issue Purposes, 1930, c. III. See, also, McQuillen v. National Cash Register Co., 27 F.Supp. 639, D.C.Md., 1939, aff'd, 112 F.2d 877, C.C.A.Md., 1940, cert. den. 311 U.S. 695, 61 S.Ct. 140 (1940); rehearing den. 311 U.S. 729, 61 S.Ct. 316 (1940).

On stockholders' liability to corporate creditors for unpaid subscriptions of stock issued for overvalued property and services, see Holcombe v. Trenton White City Co., 80 N.J.Eq., 122, 82 A. 618, 1912.

The preferred shares were subscribed and the common stock was issued. Howard and Andrews (directors), pursuant to the plan of distributing common stock to subscribers to preferred stock, declared a voting trust of 19,800 shares of non-assessable, full paid common stock held in their names as trustees. They issued voting trust certificates for 3,747½ shares. The remaining 16,052½ shares, for which voting trust certificates were not issued, became the property of Howard and Andrews, as holders of common stock.

In 1914, the enterprise failed and receivers were appointed by the court. This bill was filed by the receivers in order to compel defendant's stockholders to pay fully for their stock; the money so paid to be used to satisfy unpaid corporate creditors.]

THE CHANCELLOR. * * * Inasmuch as there is a question common to all the holders of shares of common stock, whether holders of certificates of stock or of certificates of the voting trust, that question should be determined in this present proceeding. The question is, Was the total issue of common stock rightly issued as full paid and nonassessable stock so as to exempt all of it, however held, from assessment for creditors? "Work done" is an equivalent for money, and in the absence of actual fraud the judgment of the directors as to the value of such labor is conclusive. See section 14 of the act.[74] None of the common stock was paid for in money, and it is not so claimed by any holder thereof. But it is claimed that they were issued for services, or rather that they were paid for by services rendered and to be rendered, and as there is no proof as to the value of the services which were rendered, the stock must be treated as full paid, as it was stated to be on its face when issued by the company. It may be true, as between the corporation and a stockholder, that shares may be issued for services to be performed, though even that is doubtful. Vineland, etc., Co. v. Chandler, 80 N.J.Eq. 437, 85 A. 213, Ann.Cas.1914A, 679; Vogeler v. Punch, 205 Mo. 558, 103 S.W. 1001; Shannon v. Stevenson, 173 Pa. 417, 34 A. 218. Contra, Stevens v. Episcopal, etc., Co., 140 App.Div.

---

[74] Del.Rev.Code 1915, c. 65, § 14: "Issuance of Stock for Labor or Real or Personal Property:—Subscriptions to or purchase of the capital stock of any corporation organized or to be organized under any law of this State may be paid for wholly or partly, by cash, by labor done, by personal property or by real property or leases thereof; and the stock so issued shall be declared and taken to be full paid stock and not liable to any further call, nor shall the holder thereof be liable for any further payments under the provisions of this Chapter. And in the absence of actual fraud in the transaction, the judgment of the Directors, as to the value of such labor, property, real estate or leases, shall be conclusive."
Cf. Del.Rev.Code 1935, § 14.

570, 125 N.Y.S. 573. "Work done" does not include promotion services performed before incorporation. Herbert v. Duryea, 34 App.Div. 478, 54 N.Y.S. 311, affirmed 164 N.Y. 596, 58 N.E. 1088. But when the interests of creditors are affected "work done" should not include prospective labor as an equivalent for money in exchange for shares of stock. By a strict construction "work done" does not include work to be done, or work done and to be done.

Whether it be moral, legal or actual fraud, or not fraudulent at all, the obvious purpose in issuing all the common stock to Howard, Andrews and Archibald, as set forth in the resolution of the directors at their first meeting on February 27, 1911, was to give them the stock without their having given the legal equivalent therefor. The most that could be claimed for it was that it was issued for services rendered and to be rendered, without stating what part of the $2,900,000.00 of common stock was issued for past services rendered and what for future services to be rendered. Furthermore the action as to the common stock was taken in the earliest stage of corporate life, viz.: at the first directors' meeting after the formal organization meeting, and at the first time when any business was done by the corporation, or any of its officers as such. When the incorporators met on January 28, 1911, for organization no business was transacted except to elect directors, and the issue of common stock was voted at the first meeting of directors on February 27, 1911, at which meeting officers were elected. With such scanty opportunity for having done work for the corporation after its organization, and in the absence of any statement of the character or value of such services theretofore rendered, or evidence of any valuation thereof by the directors, the issuing of $2,900,000.00 worth of stock for services rendered and to be rendered was of itself palpably indicative of an intention to avoid the statute and Constitution,[75] without reference to the other features of the resolution. In Ellis v. Penn Beef Co., 9 Del.Ch. 213, 80 A. 666, this court refused to regard as payment for stock the alleged delivery by the stockholders to the company of personal property when it appeared as a fact that though the property had been delivered it had not been paid for, but was in fact paid for by moneys of the company derived from other sources. It was a case of failure of consideration. In Holcombe v. Trenton, etc., Co., 80 N.J.Eq. 122, 82 A. 618, stock was issued in fact for services for promoters, and inasmuch as there was not of record any actual appraisement of the value of such services they were not regarded as payment in full, and the stock so issued was still subject to assessment for creditors as not full paid. But in fixing the liability of such stockholders, the court would have allowed them as credit on the par value of the stock the reasonable compensation for services rendered, if such proof had been made.

In the present case there was no valuation by the directors of the services of the promoters, and there has been no proof offered as to the value of the services which had been rendered by Howard, Andrews and Archibald at the time of the issue of the common stock to them, though opportunity to do so was open to the stockholders. It is readily seen that $3,000,000.00 of stock was such a gross and, therefore, unlawful overvaluation that counsel did not pretend that there was any appraisement by the directors, or if they had made such a valuation that any sensible person would have accepted their judgment. In the absence of such proof it is now open to this court to say that the directors have not determined that three million of stock was issued for work done, and that no value was given by the stockholders to the company for the common stock. Of course, it is obvious that the stock was to be bonus stock, issued without value. Therefore, it is impossible to escape the conclusion that the shares of common stock have not been paid for in whole or part. In the hands of the original takers, Howard, Archibald and Andrews, they were liable to assessment for creditors after the enterprise failed, and the corporation became insolvent. "Holders of bonus stock are always required to pay for their shares to satisfy the claims of creditors." Holcombe v. Trenton, etc., Co., 1912, 80 N.J.Eq. 122, 82 A. 618, affirmed without opinion in 82 N.J.Eq. 364, 91 A. 1069. An innocent purchaser for value who took these shares, would have been exempt from liability to pay any part of the par value thereof. * * *

---

[75] Del.Const. art. IX, § 3: "No corporation shall issue stock, except for money paid, labor done or personal property, or real estate or leases thereof actually acquired by such corporation."

This article remains unchanged.

Inasmuch as the question upon whom and in what proportions the assessment should be made, was not discussed by counsel, the court will, if it be desirable, hear counsel on the point before a decree is entered. * * *[76]

(b) Amount: Requirement That Consideration for Stock Issue shall be of Stated Value or Amount, and Determination Thereof

VALUATION OF PROPERTY CONTRIBUTED IN PAYMENT FOR STOCK

The various rules covering valuation of property transferred to a corporation as consideration for the issue of stock are exhaustively examined in "The Valuation of Property" by James C. Bonbright (Volume 2, Chapter XXIII, 1937). Professor Bonbright discusses the various statutes permitting stock to be issued in exchange for property of specified quantity up to the extent of the "value" of such property; but points out that this involves a judicial determination of "value". The Statutes commonly use colorless phrases such as "reasonable value", "actual value", "cash value", "fair valuation", "fair value" and so forth.

"Value" has many meanings: market value; or peculiar value to the corporation; or the price which would have been reached by arms length negotiation; or replacement value; or even "capitalized earning power", and so on. The word should always be looked at twice when it appears in any legal context. See also; David L. Dodd "Stock Watering —The Judicial Valuation of Property for Stock-Issue Purposes" (New York 1930).

---

[76] Modified and affirmed, 11 Del.Ch. 430, 106 A. 39, 7 A.L.R. 955, 1918.

On the issue of stock for promoters' services, see, Note, Validity of Issuance of No Par Stock for Property and Services, 1930, 5 St.John's L.Rev. 95.

New York Stock Corporation Law (section 69) provides: "no corporation shall issue either shares of stock or bonds, except for money, labor done or property actually received for the use and lawful purpose of such a corporation".

The following cases illustrate some of the conclusions reached by courts in wrestling with the problem of valuation of property used as consideration for the issue of stock.

BOYNTON et al. v. ANDREWS.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1875. 63 N.Y. 93.

[Appeal from judgment of General Term affirming a judgment for plaintiffs entered upon a verdict.

Creditors of the Empire Manufacturing & Planing Mill Co., a New York Corporation, brought this action under N.Y.Laws 1848, c. 40, § 10,[77] against defendant as a stockholder, to recover a debt due from the corporation on the ground that the capital stock was not full paid.

The certificate of incorporation stated that the company's authorized capital stock was $100,000, the whole amount being issued to purchase property from one of the trustees.

Testimony at the trial revealed that the property was worth at most, $50,000. The court charged that the amount of capital had not been paid in and directed a verdict for plaintiffs. Judgment was entered on the verdict; the judgment was affirmed by General Term; defendant appeals.]

MILLER, J. The second section of the act of 1853 (chap. 333), which amends the act authorizing the formation of corporations for manufacturing and other purposes (chap. 40, S.L.1848), confers authority upon the trustees of any such company to purchase property "necessary for their business and to issue stock to the amount of the value thereof in payment therefor."[78] The words "value thereof" evidently mean the fair valuation of the property, considering the purposes for which it is to be used, the nature of the business for which it is purchased and for the prosecution of which the corporation is organized. This rule authorizes an extended and wide latitude in the determination of the question of value. While certain kinds of property which are employed for manufacturing purposes, such as machinery, fixtures, etc., have a specific and definite value which is readily ascertained and fixed, there are other descriptions of property where the value is dependent upon circumstances which render it quite uncertain and frequently very difficult to decide what the real fair and just value of the same actually is. Mines and mining lands may properly be considered as embraced in the latter class, as their intrinsic value is fluctuating and uncertain and depends, to a very great degree, upon their successful development. It, therefore, may well be that an honest overvaluation might be made, of property of this kind, or agreed upon, without a semblance of intentional fraud. So, also, an error of judgment or a mistake in placing a valuation of property, appropriated as capital by a manufacturing company, if made in good faith and not to evade the provisions of the act in question, would not, of itself subject the owner of stock issued in payment of the property purchased to a personal liability. (See Schenck v. Andrews, 57 N.Y. 133, where the rule as to the valuation of such property is fully discussed.) A discrepancy in the opinions of witnesses upon the question of value cannot be considered as sufficient to establish fraud so as to render a stockholder individually liable. Nor can the value estimated and agreed upon by the parties, in all cases be regarded as the correct criterion by which to determine the actual and true value within the meaning of the statute, as such a rule might lead to the grossest abuse. As was held in the case cited, a discretion is vested in the trustees which calls for the honest exercise of their judgment. If they acted in good faith the stockholders could not be made liable. The real question in cases of this character is whether the property was placed and taken at a high valuation with a fraudulent intent of evading the provisions of the statute. While a disparity as to value might not establish fraud of itself, cases may arise where the acknowledged difference between the price allowed or agreed upon and the actual value is so erroneous as to bear upon its face clear and unmistakable indicia that a fraud was intended to be perpetrated. It cannot be questioned that where property, the value of which is well known and understood, or capable of being easily ascertained, is taken at a most exorbitant estimate, far beyond any intrinsic and real value, it raises a strong presumption that the valuation is not in good faith and was made for a fraudulent purpose. This presumption will be conclusive unless it is rebutted by evidence which fully explains the apparent bad faith. In the case at bar the whole amount of capital for which the stock was issued was $100,000. It is proved by the trustee from whom it was purchased that it was worth not to exceed $50,000, and it is thus established beyond any controversy that it was taken for double its real value. The articles taken were not of a class where the value was not apparent or depended upon circumstances, but such as any one familiar with that species of property could readily ascertain and estimate. In fact the trustee from whom they were purchased knew all about them as he had been the owner of the property, and the valuation he placed upon them is a conceded fact. There could be no mistake or error of judgment in fixing a value upon this particular property by its owner, and under the circumstances it is manifest that there was a plain case of gross overvaluation with full knowledge of the facts. Such a transaction was fraudulent in law, on its face, and as the evidence stood there was no question of fact for the jury to pass upon. Had the case been submitted to the jury and they had rendered a verdict in favor of the defendant, it would have been the duty of the court to set it aside for want of evidence to sustain the finding. It follows that there was no error in the decision of the judge that the plaintiff had made out a case within the statute, and that the amount of the capital stock had not been paid in, as well as in his direction of the jury to render a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs.

[77] N.Y.Laws 1848, c. 40, § 10: "All the stockholders of every company incorporated under this act, shall be severally, individually liable to the creditors of the company in which they are stockholders, to an amount equal to the amount of stock held by them respectively for all debts and contracts made by such company, until the whole amount of the capital stock fixed and limited by such company shall have been paid in * * * and the capital stock so fixed and limited, shall all be paid in * * * within two years from the incorporation of said company or such corporation shall be dissolved."

Cf. N.Y.Stock Corporation Law, §§ 70 (supra, p. 315), and 73 (supra, p. 315).

[78] N.Y.Laws 1853, c. 333, § 2.

The point made, that the holders of stock issued under the provisions of the act of 1853 are not and cannot be made personally liable for the debts of the corporation, whether such stock be full paid up stock or not, is without foundation. The act of 1848 (§ 10)[79] declares that the stockholders shall be individually liable to the creditors of the company to the amount of the stock, until the whole shall be paid in. The act of 1853, which was an amendment of the act of 1848, allowed trustees to issue stock for property purchased as therein provided, to the amount of the value of the same. The capital could be paid in property instead of money, and this did not change the effect of the act of 1848, which is applicable to cases where money is paid as well as to those where property is taken and the value thereof allowed. For the same reason a certificate is required to be filed in the one case precisely as in the other. Both stand on the same footing and are controlled by the same rule.

There was no error upon the trial in the rejection of evidence, and no other question raised which demands comment.

The judgment should be affirmed with costs.

NOTE

Many jurisdictions apply the "good-faith" rule, which exonerates stockholders from liability to creditors where the property has been valued in good faith. In this connection, consider what evidence can be adduced to prove "good faith". See, Colman and Finn, Comparison of Business Corporation Law of Minnesota and Delaware, 1938, 22 Min.L.Rev. 661, 667; Jennings and Solether, The Minnesota Business Corporation Act, 1937, 12 Wis.L.Rev. 419, 445–449; Wallstein, The Issue of Corporate Stock for Property Purchased—A New Phase, 1906, 15 Yale L.J. 111; Wickersham, The Capital of A Corporation, 1909, 22 Harv.L.Rev. 319, 322–329; Notes, 1924, 24 Col.L.Rev. 772, 1906, 19 Harv.L.Rev. 366, 1922, 31 Yale L.J. 883, 1928, 37 Yale L.J. 362; Book Note, 1903, 16 Harv.L.Rev. 382; 1913, 13 Col.L.Rev. 747; 1938, 22 Minn.L.Rev. 731.

STATE TRUST CO. v. TURNER.

Supreme Court of Iowa, 1900. 111 Iowa 664, 82 N.W. 1029, 53 L.R.A. 136.

[The Hess Electric Storage Battery Co. was organized in Iowa in 1890 to adapt and perfect certain patents. The authorized capital of the company was $100,000, of which not more than $90,000 might be issued as fully paid to purchase necessary patents and property. The balance of the stock was to remain in the treasury, to be issued only upon payment of the face value thereof in cash.

[79] Supra, f. n. 77, p. 364.

The Board of Directors agreed to purchase certain patents for $90,000 full-paid capital stock and $500 cash from three of the incorporators. The contract recited that although the patents were worth only $500 at the time, they were believed to be of potentially great value.

The day before this contract was entered into, $1,000 in full-paid shares was issued to defendant, vice-president and a director of the corporation, who paid nothing for them. These shares were treated as part of the $90,000 to be issued.

The corporation experimented with the patents for several years without success. In 1893, it borrowed $670 from the Commercial Loan Association, who knew the above facts. The Association took the company's note for the loan and, at maturity, transferred it to plaintiff, who recovered a judgment which remained unsatisfied. This action is a suit on that judgment. The court below held for defendant; plaintiff appeals.]

DEEMER, J. (after reciting the facts). * * * Involved primarily is the so-called "trust-fund doctrine," as applied to stockholders' obligations to creditors. This is founded on the proposition that as the state undertakes to relieve the stockholder in a corporation of general liability for the debts of the concern, to the amount that he has invested in the enterprise, he ought, in good faith, to pay in money or its equivalent the face value of the stock received; and, if he fails to do this, he should be treated as holding the remainder in trust for the benefit of the creditors of the corporation. From this proposition two apparently conflicting and inconsistent rules have grown up, one of which may be called the "true-value rule," and the other the "good-faith rule." Courts adopting the good-faith rule are also divided on the proposition as to what is necessary to be shown to constitute good faith. Some of them hold that, in the absence of an affirmative showing of fraud aliunde, mere overvaluation of the property given in exchange for stock will not render the stockholder liable for the difference, while others hold that overvaluation itself, especially if gross, constitutes, or at least raises a strong presumption of, fraud. [Citing cases.] * * *

It will be noticed that there is some confusion in the New York and United States supreme court cases, and it is difficult to say just what rule prevails in Illinois. See Sprague v. Bank, 172 Ill. 149, 50 N.E. 19, 42 L.R.A. 606. But the supreme court has never departed from the principles of Sawyer v. Hoag, and other like cases. See Camden v. Stuart, 144 U.S. 104, 12 S.Ct. 585, 36 L.Ed. 363. Nothing further need be said regarding the attitude of the various courts of the country on these propositions. Some of the cases cited may not clearly fall to the places assigned them, but, on the whole, we think this as fair a classification of the authorities as can be made. In view of our previous holdings, this discussion may seem unnecessary; but, as counsel seem to think that the question is new to this court, we have attempted to state in brief some of the holdings in other jurisdictions.

We think our previous cases adopt the true-value rule,—perhaps not to its full extent; but such has been the drift of these cases. In Osgood v. King, 42 Iowa 478, we said: "Every principle of honesty and justice demands that, as between the stockholder and the creditor, the stock shall be considered paid only to the extent of the fair value of the property conveyed, and that for the balance the stockholder shall be held individually liable." In Jackson v. Traer, 64 Iowa 477, 20 N.W. 767, quoting from Taylor on Corporations, we said: "If the property secured is grossly unequal in value to the par value of the shares, the subscriber who secured the shares originally, or his subsequent transferee with notice of the circumstances, may be compelled to make up the difference in value." In Chisholm v. Forny, 65 Iowa 333, 21 N.W. 664, Seevers, J., speaking for the court, said: "Persons dealing with the corporation had the right to assume that it owned valuable assets to the amount of its capital stock; that is to say, that, in consideration for the stock issued, the corporation had received money or property which would be available to pay an indebtedness incurred in its business. A patent is, as has been said, a property in a notion, and has no corporal, tangible substance, and cannot be levied on and sold under execution issuing from state courts; and whether it can be sold on executions issuing from the federal courts is regarded as doubtful. Until its usefulness has been established, the value of a patent right is purely speculative." Judge Robinson, in Wishard v. Hansen, 99 Iowa 307, 68 N.W. 691, uses this language: "Where the capital stock of a corporation is issued to one of its promotors and organizers for property which is taken at a gross overvaluation, the transaction is fraudulent against creditors of the corporation, if it be insolvent; and the stockholder who receives such stock with knowledge * * * will be liable to creditors, on the stock he holds, for the difference between the par value * * * and the amount actually paid." In Stout v. Hubbell, 104 Iowa 499, 73 N.W. 1060, it is said: "It is alleged * * * that the land was given and received under an agreement that it was a full payment for the stock. This would, alone, be no defense; for this court has held, as to creditors of a corporation, that, when property is received by the corporation at an excessive valuation in payment for shares of its capital stock, it is only a payment to the extent of the value of the property received, and the owner of such stock is liable to creditors for the difference between the actual value of the property and the face value of the stock." In Carbon Co. v. Mills, 78 Iowa 465, 43 N.W. 290, 5 L.R.A. 649, we again quoted with approval the rule announced by Mr. Taylor in his work on Corporations, and said that no plea of fraud was necessary. From this review it is apparent that we have, in effect, adopted the true-value rule, although saying in some cases that the reason for so doing was to prevent fraud. There is nothing in these decisions or in the statutes that inhibits the taking of property in exchange for stock, providing it is taken at its true value; and this value we do not think should in all instances, if in any, be measured by results. The parties have the right in good faith to agree on the value of the property taken, but this should not be a speculative or fictitious one. An honest mistake in judgment will not necessarily destroy the value agreed upon, but it must be such a valuation as prudent and sensible business men would approve. Values based on visionary or speculative hopes, unwarranted by existing conditions or facts, and without reasonable evidence from present appearances, are not such that the law will tolerate, as against creditors. It is apparent that the patent and property sold the corporation by Porter et al. had no such value as the parties placed upon it. The valuation was wholly speculative, visionary, and imaginary, as experience has shown. Indeed, we doubt if the parties thought it had any such value as they fixed upon it. They say they hoped and believed the company would realize therefor and thereon more than $90,000, but no one had the temerity to say that he regarded the patent and property as of that value. The actual value received was but little over $500. * * *

As the Commercial Loan Association had full knowledge of all the facts relating to the issuance and payment for the stock owned by the defendant, it could not recover. * * *

We have already said more, perhaps, than the case warrants; but as the questions are important, and the authorities are conflicting, we have attempted to lay down rules that may be followed in this class of actions, that are becoming more frequent in this age of corporations. Our conclusion is that the judgment of the trial court should be, and it is, affirmed.

NOTE

"[By the true-value rule] * * * payment for capital stock with property is no payment except to the extent of the true value of the property. If property is taken at an overvaluation the stockholder is liable to make up the deficiency and perform his obligation to give money or money's worth to the full amount of the par value of the stock taken." Ballantine, Stockholders' Liability in Minnesota, 1923, 7 Minn.L.Rev. 79, 93. See, also, Dodd, Stock Watering, 1930, c. III; Bark, Valuation of Property, Labor or Services Taken in Payment for Stock, 1919, 3 Marq.L.Rev. 195; Thompson, Payment of Shares in Property or Labor, 1893, 36 Cent.L.J. 92; Thompson, Payment for Shares in Property, 1902, 36 Am.L.Rev. 840; Warren, The Progress of the Law; Corporations, 1920, 34 Harv.L.Rev. 282, 285–288.

DONALD v. AMERICAN SMELTING & REFINING CO.

Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, 1901.
62 N.J.Eq. 729, 48 A. 771, 1116.

DIXON, J. The bill in this case was presented by several holders of stock in the American Smelting & Refining Company to enjoin the company and its directors from entering into a contract with M. Guggenheim's Sons for (1) the transfer to the company of the smelting and refining plants, appurtenant property, and business of that firm; (2) the payment by the firm to the company, in cash or in working capital, of a sum equal to two-thirds of the company's working capital on January 1, 1901, said to be about $6,000,000; and (3) the payment by the firm to the company of the further sum of $6,066,666.66 in cash; and for the issuance and delivery to the firm by the company of $45,200,000 in aggregate par value of the company's capital stock, one-half thereof preferred and one-half common;—and also to enjoin them from increasing the capital stock of the company from $65,000,000 to $100,000,000, in order to use the added $35,000,000, with $10,200,000 of its originally authorized capital stock, still held by the company, for the carrying out of such bargain.

On filing the bill and accompanying affidavits a rule to show cause and stay were granted by the chancellor, which, on the coming in of the answer and its accompanying affidavits, were discharged. [48 A. 786.] Thereupon the complainants appealed to this court, and, having secured from us a stay pending the appeal, brought on for hearing the application for an injunction pendente lite.

The controversy, in its present stage, turns upon the charge of the complainants, that the cash and property to be acquired by the company are not worth the par value of the stock to be issued therefor, and hence that the transaction contemplated is illegal.

The rule to be applied in determining whether on such a contention a contemplated original issue of corporate stock is legal or not, is prescribed by sections 48 and 49 of our Corporation Act, P.L.1896, p. 277.[80] They run as follows:

"Sec. 48. Nothing but money shall be considered as payment of any part of the capital stock of any corporation organized under this act, except as hereinafter provided in case of the purchase of property.

"Sec. 49. Any corporation formed under this act, may purchase mines, manufactories or other property necessary for its business, or the stock of any company or companies owning, mining, manufacturing or producing materials or other property necessary for its business, and issue stock to the amount of the value thereof in payment therefor."

The meaning of section 48 is not questionable. The money must equal the face value of the stock. The language of section 49 is even more explicit. The corporation may issue stock to the amount of the value of the property. The value of the property in the one case, just as the value of the money in the other, must at least equal the face value of the stock. Such was the view expressed for this court by Mr. Justice Depue in Wetherbee v. Baker, 35 N.J.Eq. 501, and supported by abundance of authority.

The distinction between the contemplated issue of corporate stock for property and its issues for money lies, not in the rule for valuation, but in the fact that different estimates may be formed of the value of property. When such differences are brought before judicial tribunals, the judgment of those who are by law intrusted with the power of issuing stock "to the amount of the value of the property," and on whom, therefore, is placed the first duty of valuing the property, must be accorded considerable weight. But it cannot be deemed conclusive when duly subjected to judicial scrutiny. Nor is it necessary that conscious overvaluation or any other form of fraudulent conduct on the part of these primary valuers should be shown, to justify judicial interposition. Their honest judgment, if reached without due examination into the elements of value, or if based in part upon an estimate of matters which really are not property, or if plainly warped by self-interest, may lead to a violation of this statutory rule, as surely as would corrupt motive. * * *

[80] Cf. N.J.S.A. 14:8-9: "Only cash or its equivalent and property, including stock of another corporation, and labor as in section 14:3-9 of this title is specified, shall be considered as payment of any part of the capital stock of any corporation organized under this title."

14:3-9: "Any corporation formed under any law of this state may purchase real and personal property and, * * * the stock of any other corporation necessary or desirable for its business, and pay therefor in cash or its equivalent, or in the capital stock of the purchasing corporation to the amount of the value thereof, and the stock so issued shall be fully paid stock and not liable to any further call. Any such corporation may also issue stock for the amount it actually pays for labor performed. When property or stock is purchased the purchasing corporation shall receive in property or stock what the same is reasonably worth in money at a fair bona fide valuation. No fictitious stock shall be issued."

Cf. N.Y.Stock Corporation Law, § 69, supra, p. 355.

When corporate stock has once been issued for property purchased, then the legislature has directed the application of a different rule. In the words of the same section 49, "the stock so issued shall be full-paid stock, and not liable to any further call, neither shall the holder thereof be liable for any further payment under the provisions of this act; and in the absence of actual fraud in the transaction the judgment of the directors as to the value of the property purchased shall be conclusive."

Under these provisions, after the property has been purchased and the stock issued therefor, nothing short of actual fraud in the transaction can impair the right of the holder to hold his stock as full-paid stock, free from further call. The cases of Bickley v. Schlag, 46 N.J. Eq. 533, 20 A. 250, and Homestead Co. v. Wildes, 54 N.J.Eq. 668, 35 A. 896, indicate that the completed transaction was equally secure, even before the statute received its present decisive form.

By the rule above stated, then, the matter in hand must be judged. The evidence before us shows that, in the bargain projected, M. Guggenheim's Sons were to give, for $45,200,000 of stock, about $12,-000,000 in cash and working capital, their plants at Perth Amboy, N. J., at Pueblo, Colo., at Aguas Calientes and Monteroy, Mexico, and somewhere in South America, and their leases and contracts, the nature of which is not disclosed in these proceedings. Regarding the "cash and working capital" as so much money, and setting it off against an equal amount of stock, there remains about $33,000,000 of stock to be equivalenced by the property purchased. It is substantially admitted that the value of the plants themselves as physical possessions does not exceed $10,000,000 thus leaving about $23,000,000 to be made up in the value of the good will of the business and the leases and contracts mentioned.

The defendants insist that the complainants have not borne the burden cast upon them by law of proving that these items are not worth that sum, and certainly we would be unwilling now to adjudge that such a negative is established. But it must be remembered that the cause is yet in a preliminary stage; that the complainants have shown the value of everything which they could reasonably be expected to discover before instituting their suit; that the directors are their trustees, and are intending a very large issue of stock for property which they have not seen fit hitherto to define. Under these circumstances, the legal rule imposing the burden of proof on the complainant should not be rigorously applied. Indeed, as these trustees are seeking to exercise a specially delegated power, which can be justly exercised only in accordance with a prescribed standard, it is not entirely clear that a burden does not rest on them, when challenged beforehand, to vindicate their proposed action. But, assuming the burden to be on the complainants, we think that for present purposes it is sustained.

The proofs point strongly to the conclusion that in the negotiations between the parties the real value of the property to be acquired has not been the basis on which they have determined the amount of stock to be issued therefor. This is explicitly stated in the affidavit annexed to the answer made by Daniel Guggenheim, who had entire charge of the negotiations on behalf of his firm. He said:

"From the outset the purpose of both parties was to reach a just conclusion as to comparative values, and to determine on that basis what amount of the securities we would justly receive for our business and properties, as against those of the American Company, represented by its outstanding $54,800,000 of stock."

In other words, on the assumption that the possessions of the company are worth $54,800,000, the parties concluded that what the firm was to deliver to the company is worth $45,200,000. This mode of arriving at the value of property to be purchased by the issue of stock is not that contemplated by the statute, and can be made to accord with it only by proof that the assumption is well founded. But there is no support for the assumption above stated, except the general averment that the company's net earnings for the year ending October 31, 1900, exceed $4,500,000 (i. e., about 8½ per cent. of the par value of its outstanding stock), and the fact that the shares of that stock are fully paid. The earnings of a single year hardly afford satisfactory evidence of the value of the company's property; and whether the shares are fully paid merely because they were issued for property purchased, without the presence of fraud in the transaction, and whether the consideration received for them has depreciated since the company was organized in April, 1899, we have not the means of knowing. What the defendants have taken care to show to the court, though for another purpose, is that the commercial world has never, until the proposed bargain came into view, estimated the stock of the company at more than two-thirds of its face value.

The fact just mentioned underlies another position taken by the defendants, viz. that the contemplated contract would be advantageous to the company and its stockholders, since even the mere expectation that it would be consummated has increased the value and market price of the stock, and therefore, it is argued, the complainants, as stockholders, are not aggrieved. But not there is the pith of the controversy. If the intrinsic value and market price of the company's stock were only 60 per cent. of its face, and an outsider were to offer 80 per cent. in money for additional stock to be issued, such an offer would clearly be advantageous to the company and its stockholders; but it could not be legally accepted, because the legislature has required that 100 per cent., whether in cash or in property, shall be received for corporate stock when originally issued. It is the illegality of the transaction which warrants complaint. Stockholders have the same right to prevent an issue of stock in violation of the statute as they have to prevent a use of corporate property beyond the scope of the corporate power, without regard to loss or gain. Pom.Eq.Jur. §§ 1093–1095.

In view of the undefined nature of the property for which $23,000,000 of stock is to be issued, of the illegitimate basis on which the price to be paid for that property appears to have been fixed, and of the probability that the stock has been rated by the parties at its market value rather than at par, we think proper ground is shown for restraining the completion of the contract until full investigation can be made. * * *

For reversal—* * *9.

For affirmance—* * *5.[81]

DIAMOND STATE BREWERY, Incorporated v. DE LA RIGAUDIERE et al.

Court of Chancery of Delaware, 1941. 17 A.2d 313.

Suit by the Diamond State Brewery, Incorporated, against Camille De La Rigaudiere and others, for the cancellation of certain shares of complainant's capital stock owned by respondents.

Decree in conformity with opinion advised.

Suit for the cancellation of certain shares of complainant's capital stock owned by respondents. The original bill named Camille de la Rigaudiere, Guy de la Rigaudiere and Isabelle de la Rigaudiere Tunis as respondents, and the case was heard on the bill, answer of these parties, testimony, and exhibits. At the conclusion of the hearing, complainant obtained leave to amend and did amend its bill in order to join as a party respondent the Reverend Sylvester A. Hosinski. This respondent answered the amended bill; and before the argument of the cause, the solicitors for all parties agreed that it be finally determined upon the pleadings and the evidence theretofore adduced.

THE VICE CHANCELLOR. Complainant's case is that certain shares of its capital stock now owned by respondents were illegally issued without sufficient consideration and should therefore be cancelled. Respondents deny illegality in the original issuance, and assert that in any event, as to most of the shares, they were bona fide purchasers for value without notice of any infirmity, and that the stock should not be cancelled.

Complainant was incorporated under the laws of Delaware on April 7, 1933. Its name, New Jersey-Delaware Brewing Company, was later changed to Diamond State Brewery, Inc. On March 22, 1933, a short time prior to its organization, the Congress of the United States authorized the manufacture of beer with a limited alcoholic content. 48 Stat. 16. In Delaware, such manufacture was permitted by an Act of the General Assembly, passed on May 3, 1933. 38 Del.Laws, c. 19. The time of complainant's incorporation, its name, its objects and purposes as stated in its certificate of incorporation, as well as the activities it actually carried on, all indicate that the motivating purpose of its organization was the production of beer.

---

81 Wickersham, The Capital of a Corporation, 1909, 22 Harv.L.Rev. 319, 322; Note, 1901, 1 Col.L.Rev. 402; 1901, 1 Col.L.Rev. 407.

The incorporators named in complainant's certificate of incorporation were employees of a company which undertakes the work of preparing corporate charters and forming Delaware corporations and which acts as statutory agent for them. Neither the incorporators nor original directors, elected by the former, appear to have had any substantial financial interest in the corporation. One Guy de la Rigaudiere was the principal if not the sole promoter of the corporation, as is apparent from a resolution of the directors adopted at their first meeting, "That due appreciation be given to Guy de la Rigaudiere for his services as organizer of the New Jersey-Delaware Brewing Company which have extended over a period of eight months. * * *".

Complainant's charter authorizes the issuance of 800,000 shares of Class A Stock of the par value of one dollar, and 200,000 shares of Class B Stock of the par value of twenty-five cents per share, the latter Class being the voting stock. At the meeting of the incorporators, April 7, 1933, there was presented a written offer of Guy de la Rigaudiere, dated the same day, to sell and assign all his "rights, title and interest in and to a secret formula for the compounding of a beverage known as 'Chamonix' with all necessary equipment to manufacture the same and to accept in full payment therefor fifty thousand shares of your Class A stock and one hundred and twenty five thousand shares of your Class B capital stock full paid and non-assessable". The incorporators adopted a resolution authorizing the board of directors "to acquire said formula and equipment and to issue said stock in payment therefor, provided same are in the opinion of the Board of Directors of the actual value above stated and necessary to the business of the Company". The directors at their first meeting resolved that the company accept the offer in accordance with the resolution of the incorporators; and the board did "adjudge and declare that said formula and equipment are of the actual value of $81,250.00 and that same are necessary for the business of the company which is hereby authorized and directed to issue" the stock to de la Rigaudiere or his nominees "in full settlement for the above formula and equipment".

The value, $81,250, fixed by the directors, was equal to the par value of the shares authorized to be issued. All of such shares were issued as full paid to persons designated by Guy de la Rigaudiere; and 41,830 Class A shares and 117,155 Class B shares were registered in the names of Guy de la Rigaudiere and his wife, Camille de la Rigaudiere, one of the respondents. Most of these shares were so held at the death of Mr. de la Rigaudiere in February 1934. From them are derived the shares which complainant would now have cancelled in the hands of the respondents.

Complainant says that the issuance of this stock was without consideration and in violation of the following provisions of the Constitution of the State of Delaware, and of the Delaware Corporation Law:

[Quoting Art. IX, § 3 Del. Const. and Del. Gen. Corp. Law, § 14, supra, p. 356.] * * *

Complainant adduced evidence concerning the formula and equipment for which the directors agreed to issue the shares. In 1932 or 1933, one Marcel Tournier, a naturalized citizen of French birth, who resided in Vineland, New Jersey, sold to Mr. de la Rigaudiere a formula for Chamonix, and equipment, consisting of a saturator and a carbonator for manufacturing it. For these, de la Rigaudiere agreed that Tournier should receive, after the organization of the present complainant corporation, one thousand dollars in shares of its capital stock. Tournier transferred the formula but never delivered, and complainant never received the equipment. Tournier testified: "I didn't deliver the machine to him [de la Rigaudiere] because I sold him the equipment and formula for the sum of one thousand dollars in shares of stock, but I only received five hundred shares of Class A stock and fifty shares of Class B stock, which was around six hundred dollars, so there was around four hundred dollars due to me, and I didn't deliver the equipment."

Tournier further testified that he had bought the equipment in France; that the formula was regularly supplied with each purchase of equipment; that the formula was not secret but was known all over France; that it was valueless; that from 1922 to 1924, he, Tournier, had manufactured a beverage from the formula and that he had given it the name "Chamonix", but that he had stopped making it because he didn't know the English language, couldn't sell the drink, and "lost money on it". * * * An examination of the formula itself raises serious doubt whether it alone contains sufficient directions to enable anyone to make any certain beverage. It specifies a quantity of "coloring matter" but does not designate any particular color or coloring material. It specifies a quantity of "essence", presumably a flavoring component, but fails to prescribe the kind of essence. Complainant never undertook to do anything with the formula. The directors did not even take the trouble to acquire the equipment with which to make use of it. Certainly no justification is apparent for the great disparity between the price de la Rigaudiere agreed to pay Tournier, and the price at which he agreed to sell the same property to the corporation he had organized. The evidence, it seems to me, fairly establishes that the formula had no substantial value.

Respondents correctly assert that under Section 14 of the Delaware Corporation Law, in the absence of actual fraud in the transaction, the judgment of the directors as to the value of the property acquired shall be conclusive; and that consequently, a showing of no more than excessive valuation is insufficient to overcome the conclusiveness of the directors' judgment. But the attending circumstances may constitute a proper basis for a finding of fraud; and inadequacy of consideration may be considered in connection with other facts from which fraud may be inferred. McCombs Producing & Refining Co. v. Ogle, 200 Ky. 208, 254 S.W. 425. Here, in addition to gross overvaluation, a partial failure of consideration has been demonstrated. The equipment, never received, appears from the testimony of Tournier to be the only part of the consideration which had value. The Delaware constitution contemplates the production of the thing itself and not the mere promise to produce, to justify the issuance of stock as full paid. Sohland v. Baker, 15 Del.Ch. 431, 141 A. 277, 58 A.L.R. 693. The issuance of stock as full paid for a consideration never delivered to, nor acquired by the corporation constitutes "actual fraud" within the meaning of Section 14 of the Delaware Corporation Law. Ellis v. Penn Beef Co. et al., 9 Del.Ch. 213, 80 A. 666. Indeed, the circumstances of this case point to the conclusion that the resolutions and dealings with respect to the formula and equipment were nothing more than a veil to hide the issuance of shares without consideration. There was thus a violation of the constitutional and statutory requirements. Sohland v. Baker, supra; Blair et al. v. F. H. Smith Co. et al., 18 Del.Ch. 150, 156 A. 207; Ellis v. Penn Beef Co. et al., supra.

All of the shares sought to be cancelled are a part of those originally issued in the joint names of Guy de la Rigaudiere and Camille de la Rigaudiere. Some of the respondents contend with respect to the shares claimed by them that they are bona fide purchasers for value without notice or knowledge of any infirmity; and that in consequence the corporation is estopped from denying the recital in the stock certificate that the shares are full paid and nonassessable. * * * Without regard to any questions as to the consideration for the transfer of the shares, the registered holders have not demonstrated that they were innocent purchasers. * * *

Lastly, respondents insist that the proper remedy is assessment of the unpaid purchase price of the shares rather than cancellation. The rule in Delaware has been stated in Blair et al. v. F. H. Smith Co. et al., 18 Del.Ch. 150, 165, 166, 156 A. 207, 213: If the issuance of stock was void, cancellation is the proper remedy; if merely voidable, "then that form of relief is to be adopted which would seem to be most in accord with all the equities of the case." I find nothing in the position of the respondents which would justify allowing them to retain the Class B stock in question. Complainant is entitled to relief; it has prayed for cancellation; no reason has been suggested why that form is inadequate from its standpoint. Thus, the prayer should be granted with respect to the B stock. The same may be said as to the A stock pledged with the bank, except that the bank's interests must not be prejudiced. When a form of decree is presented, the solicitors may suggest provisions appropriate to safeguard the rights of the bank and at the same time to afford relief as to any remaining interest in the shares.

A decree in conformity with this opinion will be advised.

COHEN (COHEN INTERVENER) v. BENEFICIAL INDUSTRIAL LOAN CORPORATION et al.

District Court of the United States, D. New Jersey, 1946. 69 F.Supp. 297.

Stockholders' derivative suit by Hannah Cohen, executrix of the estate of Sol Cohen, deceased, against the Beneficial Industrial Loan Corporation, a corporation, and others for appointment of a receiver and for an accounting for funds and assets that individual defendants were alleged to have fraudulently diverted and appropriated to their own use, wherein David F. Cohen intervened as a party plaintiff. On motions by the individual defendants for an order dismissing the fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and ninth causes of action and for a more definite statement or a bill of particulars, and on countermotion by plaintiff for leave to take depositions and for issuance of subpoenas duces tecum.

Defendants' motions to dismiss fifth, sixth, seventh, and ninth causes of action granted, and motion to dismiss fourth cause of action denied.

MEANEY, DISTRICT JUDGE. This action, a stockholder's derivative suit, was instituted by Sol Cohen in 1943, as the holder of 100 shares of Common Stock which had been acquired by purchase in 1937, and seeks the appointment of a receiver and an accounting for funds and assets which it is alleged the individual defendants fraudulently diverted and appropriated to their own use.

David F. Cohen, as holder of 150 shares of the corporation's common stock, intervened as a party plaintiff. On February 14, 1946, by order of the court, Hannah Cohen, executrix of the estate of Sol Cohen, deceased, was substituted as plaintiff. * * *

The fifth cause of action, against which the defendants likewise seek a dismissal, charges that at or after the time of incorporation of the defendant, Industrial, in May, 1929, it acquired the combined assets of the former Beneficial Industrial Loan Corporation, American Loan Company and Industrial Bankers of America, and at the same time assumed all the liabilities of the three aforementioned companies.

Prior to the acquisition of such assets, it is alleged that the former Beneficial Loan Corporation one of the acquired companies, was organized and had acquired assets of three other loan companies by the issuance of 1,250,000 shares of its capital stock. It is further charged that at the time of the issuance of those shares, the former Beneficial Industrial Loan Corporation wrote up the value of the assets transferred from the three companies from which they were acquired, by more than eight million dollars and that the defendant, Industrial, acquired this stock at the same value ascribed to it on the books of the former Beneficial Industrial Loan Corporation, even though an examination of the books of that company would have revealed the excessive value at which the assets were written up and held. It is then charged that the defendant, Industrial, upon acquiring the assets of the former Beneficial Loan Company, American Loan Company, and Industrial Bankers of America in May 1929, issued its stock to the stockholders of these three companies, in exchange for the stock held by them respectively in said three companies, the stockholders of the former Beneficial Industrial Loan Corporation receiving stock from defendant, Industrial, on the basis of the inflated values previously ascribed to the stock of the former Beneficial Industrial Loan Corporation. Thereafter, it is charged, in September of 1930 the book value of the assets which had been acquired by the defendant corporation from the former Beneficial Industrial Loan Corporation was written down from its inflated value to the same extent as it allegedly was previously written up. As a result of the above it is charged that there was fraudulently and unlawfully issued, 449,209 shares of common stock of defendant corporation which remain outstanding and for which no consideration has been paid or received by it. Upon the shares so issued, it is further charged there has been unlawfully paid by the corporation, from 1929 to 1945, inclusive, more than eleven million dollars by way of unlawful and illegal dividends.

This alleged cause of action is objected to and dismissal sought on the ground that it fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted in this action. Defendants insist that any possible cause of action which could be predicated upon the transactions asserted in the fifth alleged cause of action, would be on behalf of the individual stockholders of American Loan Company and Industrial Bankers of America, Inc. against the stockholders of the former Beneficial Industrial Loan Corporation. In any event it is insisted that the plaintiff fails to set forth any cause of action on behalf of the corporation since there is nothing contained in the charges that would indicate that any rights of the corporation have been invaded resulting in damage to it.

Examination of the allegations contained in the fifth alleged cause of action support the defendants' contention that the plaintiff has failed to show any damage to the corporate entity.

The stock issues referred to consisted entirely of shares of stock without par value. Under Delaware law, necessarily controlling insofar as the validity of the stock issue in question is concerned, (the defendant being incorporated under the laws of the State of Delaware) there is no requirement as to the amount of consideration which must be received in respect to an original issue of no par stock, although the quality of consideration must meet the same requirements as stocks having a par value. Bodell v. General Gas & Electric Corporation, 15 Del.Ch. 119, 132 A. 442, affirmed 15 Del.Ch. 420, 140 A. 264; West v. Sirian Lamp Co., Del.Ch., 37 A.2d 835.

Hence, where it is apparent that the original stock issue is of no par stock, the amount of consideration is of no particular moment in an action of this nature.

While it may well be that as a result of the manipulation alleged, an excessive valuation was placed upon the assets of one of the consolidating corporations, resulting in an improper proportionate distribution of the new stock, it cannot be concluded thereby that, the new stock being of no par value, no consideration has been paid for it. There has been no damage to the defendant corporation thereby, since the only result, as far as the corporation is concerned, was that each share simply represented a proportionately smaller part of the total corporate assets. There is no way to spell out any increase in corporate liabilities and hence no damage to the corporation to which the plaintiff can point. * * *

It is further stated by the plaintiff that the defendant, Industrial, acquired the stock of the former Beneficial Industrial Loan Corporation at the value ascribed to it on the books of that corporation "even though an examination of the books of that Company would have revealed the excessive value at which its assets were written up and held." Any stockholder had the right to examine the books of the Company; but nevertheless, the Agreement of Consolidation, out of which the present corporate defendant grew, was approved by more than ⅔rds of the stockholders of each of the consolidating companies. This in effect, negatives any suggestion of fraud and misrepresentation.

Since a stockholder's derivative suit on behalf of the corporation derives its cause of action out of an invasion of the rights of the Corporation, if the Corporation itself has no such cause of action it necessarily follows that a stockholder cannot sue in its behalf. Gallagher v. Pacific American Co., 9 Cir., 97 F.2d 193; Laughner v. Schell, 3 Cir., 276 F. 241, 18 C.J.S., Corporations § 559. Under the facts set forth in the fifth alleged cause of action, defendant, Beneficial Industrial Loan Corporation, could not maintain this action, and plaintiff suing as a stockholder has no better right. Defendants' motion to dismiss the fifth cause of action, for the reasons above set forth, is granted. * * *

An order in accordance with the above ruling may be entered.

5. STOCK OPTIONS

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

§ 14. * * * Subject to any provisions in respect thereof set forth in the Certificate of Incorporation every corporation shall have power to create and issue, whether or not in connection with the issue and sale of any shares of stock or other securities of the corporation, rights or options entitling the holders thereof to purchase from the corporation any shares of its capital stock of any class or classes, such right or options to be evidenced by or in such instrument or instruments as shall be approved by the Board of Directors. The terms upon which, the time or times, which may be limited or unlimited in duration, at or within which, and the price or prices at which any such shares may be purchased from the corporation upon the exercise of any such right or option shall be such as shall be fixed and stated in the Certificate of Incorporation or in any amendment thereto, or in a resolution or resolutions adopted by the Board of Directors providing for the creation and issue of such rights or options, and, in every case, set forth or incorporated by reference in the instrument or instruments evidencing such rights or options; provided, however, that, in case the shares of stock of the corporation to be issued upon the exercise of such rights or options shall be shares having a par value, the price or prices so to be received therefor shall not be less than the par value thereof; and provided further, that in case the shares of stock so to be issued shall be shares of stock without par value the consideration therefor as to corporations incorporated prior to April 1, 1929, and on or after April 1, 1929, as the case may be, shall be determined in the manner hereinabove provided in this Section for the fixing of the consideration for the issue of such stock.

NOTES

OPTIONS TO PURCHASE STOCK

(A) The modern "warrant" or option to purchase stock in a limited or unlimited period of time has not, as yet, been litigated, and there is no law available on it, though the device was known as early as 1872, and formed a part of the financing of the Illinois Central Railroad.

Warrants are now apt to be used either

(a) To give to promoters, bankers, and others a chance to make profits out of the rise of the stock or securities in respect of which the warrant is issued; or

(b) To be attached to bonds or preferred stock as an additional inducement to their purchasers; or

(c) As a straight means of raising capital.[82]

The public utility companies have issued them in great volume; some having more warrants outstanding than they have stock.

Warrants tend to retard the advance of stock in the open market. They are normally not exercised when the corporation is in bad shape and needs capital, and they normally are exercised when the corporation is in good shape and could secure the capital far more cheaply, if it needs it at all.

They travel from hand to hand, much as different shares of stock; but there is no judicial decision as yet as to their negotiability.

It remains to be determined whether a warrant holder has any interest in the corporation which will be recognized by law. His financial interest, however, is sufficiently plain.

(B) "A stock purchase warrant may be defined as a corporate instrument by whose provisions the corporation binds itself to deliver shares of its stock to the holder at his election upon payment to it by the holder of a specified sum of money per share, at or within a time and on conditions set forth in the instrument. * * * Commonly they are delivered by the corporation at the time of the sale of its bonds or notes, as part consideration for the payment of the purchase price of such obligations * * * They are frequently delivered to banking houses of issue and retained by such houses as a part of their compensation for undertaking flotation of an issue of securities. * * * Their only invariable features are covenants on the part of the issuing corporation to deliver stock upon payment of a stated price * * * and covenants defining and limiting the time or times, or period of time, * * * at or within which the privilege may be exercised." Berle, Convertible Bonds and Stock Purchase Warrants, 1926, 36 Yale L.J. 649.

(C) "The warrant holder is in no sense a stock holder. His rights are based upon his contract, which is to deliver, upon exercise within a certain time by the payment of a stated amount, a certain amount of shares. The integrity of the shares must be maintained. In the case of a dissolution, the option holder is entitled to nothing and can not stand in the way of ending the business.[83] In the case of mergers with another corporation, or consolidation or formations of a new corporation, there is a question of whether the corporate identity can be traced through the proceedings to determine whether the warrant holder will be able to enforce his option against stock of the new company. * * * As long as the corporation will deliver to him the shares denominated in his contract, or the equivalent capital value thereof, upon the payment of the option price, the option holder has no cause of action. * * * There is no breach of contract until refusal to deliver the shares and no cause of action arises until the election to exercise. The corporation has not the power to revoke the paid-for offer, or to destroy the power in the offeree to accept. * * * It is not beyond the power of the corporation still to deliver even after it has sold the shares that are reserved for the exercise of the warrant, although, if it sells out the shares * * * reserved for the exercise of the warrant, it may encounter problems of pre-emptive rights in a new issue." Garner and Forsythe, Stock Purchase Warrants and "Rights", 1931, 4 So.Calif.L.Rev. 375, 385–387.[84]

---

[82] Another common use of options to purchase stock appears, f. n. 85, infra.

[83] The fact that a corporation is in equity receivership at the time the owner of stock purchase warrants seeks to exercise his option to purchase treasury stock

(D) "Legally, option warrants are subject to a number of serious objections which have not been worked out. The first is the chance that they may be held to be pure gambling contracts, not designed to represent any actual delivery of the stock. The second is that at the time when the stock purchase warrants are issued, particularly if they are perpetual, it is almost beyond human wisdom to set any fair price on such options. A board of directors issuing them (or bankers buying them) must necessarily fix a price determined solely by what the traffic will bear; and a stock holder who chooses to step in and enjoin the transaction on the ground that the price bore no relation to the ultimate participation, may very easily succeed in so doing.[85] In the third place, they share the weakness of convertible bonds. If, when the time comes, the corporation either has not the stock to deliver or does not wish to deliver it, the remedies of the shareholders are nothing if not obscure. Courts will probably not decree the issue of the stock. The amount of damages they would grant to the disappointed holder is as yet unascertained." Berle, Corporate Devices for Diluting Stock Participations, 1931, 31 Col.L.Rev. 1239, 1262–1263.

(E) "* * * of itself, a stock option warrant is not a negotiable instrument because the Negotiable Instruments Law requires that a promise to pay money must appear; * * * the qualities of a negotiable instrument may be secured by the insertion of a proper contract agreement in the option warrant itself * * *" Garner and Forsythe, Stock Purchase Warrants and "Rights", 1931, 4 So.Calif.L. Rev. 375, 391.[86] is no defense to the corporation in an action for breach of the option contract. North Butte Mining Company v. Tripp, 117 F.2d 304, C.C.A.Minn. 1941.

---

[84] On the power of a corporation to revoke its offer to stockholders to purchase stock as of a certain date, before that day arrives, see, Note, 1930, 39 Yale L.J. 1163.

[85] But see, McQuillen v. National Cash Register Co., 27 F.Supp. 639, 648–655, D. C.Md.1939, aff'd, 112 F.2d 877, C.C.A.Md.1940, where a corporate officer, in consideration of his being the general manager of defendant corporation, was given a five-year option to purchase stock, provided that the option would become null and void if he ceased to be either an officer or a director of the corporation. The contract was upheld, the court saying that its consideration was the promise to become chairman of the board of directors and of the executive committee of the company and to undertake the duties incident to those offices. Nor was this invalid as an issuance of stock for future services, because here, the court said, there was no issuance of stock, but the application of stock already issued and held in the corporate treasury. This was a contract for the future delivery of stock, if and when the particular services had been periodically rendered. Nor did the court sustain plaintiff's contention that this option was in effect, a gift, because the officer was receiving in addition a salary of $100,000 a year. The court refused to interfere with the judgment of the board of directors in fixing the compensation of this officer.

[86] See. also. on stock purchase warrants: Berle and Means, The Modern Cor-

C. DIVIDENDS

NOTE

1. DEFINITIONS

"A dividend is a corporate profit set aside, declared and ordered by the directors to be paid to the stockholders upon demand or at a fixed time, Cook Corp., 6th Ed., § 534." People ex rel. Pullman Co. v. Glynn, 1909, 130 App.Div. 332, 333, 114 N.Y.S. 460, order affirmed, 1910, 198 N.Y. 605, 92 N.E. 1097.

"That portion of the profits and surplus funds of the corporation which has been actually set apart by a valid resolution of the board of directors, or by the shareholders at a corporate meeting, for distribution among the shareholders according to their respective interests, in such a sense as to become segregated from the property by the corporation, and to become the property of the shareholders distributively. 2 Thomp. Corp. § 2126." Bouvier's Law Dictionary, title Dividend.[1]

PROBLEMS OF DIVIDENDS

Early corporations (for instance, the British East India Company) did not declare dividends in the modern sense. They carried out a voyage as an enterprise; liquidated it; and divided the entire assets of the corporation, capital as well as profits. At a later phase the business practice developed of keeping capital intact and declaring to the stockholders a fraction of the profits: dividends.

The right of a corporation to declare dividends depends on certain precedent conditions determined by statute. Commonly dividends must be declared out of "surplus"—assets in excess of the aggregate of existing debts plus statutory "capital". In some states, however, there is an exception to the rule: dividends may be declared out of "net profits arising from the operation of business"—and the statutory poration and Private Property, 1932, 151–152, 180–185, 199–202; Berle, Studies in the Law of Corporation Finance, 1928, c. 7; Doris and Friedman, Corporate Secretary's Manual and Guide, 1936, 726–732; Ballantine, Questions of Policy in Drafting a Modern Corporation Law, 1931, 19 Calif.L.Rev. 465, 468–469; Berle, Convertible Bonds and Stock Purchase Warrants, 1926, 36 Yale L.J. 649; Garner and Forsythe, Stock Purchase Warrants and "Rights", 1931, 4 So.Calif.L.Rev. 269, and 375; Hills, Model Corporation Act, 1935, 48 Harv.L.Rev. 1334, 1357, n. 34; Keith, Convertible Securities and Stock Purchase Warrants, 1929, 2 Rocky Mt. L.Rev. 16; Notes, 1929, 29 Col.L.Rev. 491, 1937, 37 Col.L.Rev. 785, 798–804, 974–976, 1939, 6 U. of Chi.L.Rev. 399, 435–437.

---

[1] For general discussion of the subject of dividends, see: II Bonbright, The Valuation of Property, 1937, c. 27; Hatfield, Accounting, 1932; Reiter, Profits, Dividends and the Law, 1926; Ballantine and Hills, Corporate Capital and Restrictions upon Dividends under Modern Corporation Laws, 1935, 23 Calif.L.Rev. 229; Berle and Fisher, Elements of the Law of Business Accounting, 1932, 32 Col.L.Rev. 573; Frey, The Distribution of Corporate Dividends, 1941, 89 U. of Pa.L.Rev. 735; Greenough and Ayers, Funds Available for Corporate Dividends in Washington, 1934, 9 Wash.L.Rev. 63; Hills, Model Corporation Act, 1935, 48 Harv.L.Rev. 1334, 1364–1370; Katz, Accounting Problems in Corporate Distributions, 1941, 89 U. of Pa.L.Rev. 764; Kehl, The Origin and Early Development of American Dividend Law, 1939, 53 Harv.L.Rev. 36; Kripke, Accountants' Financial Statements and Fact Finding in the Law of Corporate Regulation, 1941, 50 Yale L.J. 1180; Sparger, Profits, Surplus and the Payment of Dividends, 1929, 8 N.C.L.Rev. 14; Weiner, Theory of Anglo American Dividend Law: The English Cases, 1928, 28 Col.L.Rev. 1046; Weiner, Theory of Anglo American Dividend Law: American Cases and Statutes, 1929, 29 Col.L.Rev. 461; Weiner, The Amount Available for Dividends Where No Par Shares have been Issued, 1929, 29 Col.L.Rev. 906; Weiner and Bonbright, Theory of Anglo American Dividend Law; Surplus and Profits, 1930, 30 Col.L.Rev. 330, 954; Notes, 1928, 55 A.L.R. 8; 1932, 76 A.L.R. 885; 1937, 109 A.L.R. 1381; 1933, 3 Brooklyn L.Rev. 91, Federal Control over Corporate Distributions to Stockholders under the Public Utility Holding Company Act, 1940, 49 Yale L.J. 492.

tests raise a question whether, even though there may be no surplus, dividends may nevertheless be declared if, despite that fact, there are current net earnings.

Certain states at one time required that dividends be declared only out of "net profits arising from the operation of the business"—which would seem to prevent payment of dividends out of paid in surplus, or surplus arising from upward revaluation of the assets of the corporation; and occasionally other restrictions appear, either in statutes or in charter provisions.

The first task of the lawyer is, therefore, to discover whether the statutory or charter conditions permit declaration of a dividend.

In addition to the statutory and charter test, there is a purely business test which is always present in the minds of business men. Dividends are commonly paid in cash; and the payment accordingly depletes the cash or current assets of the corporation. Although it may have ample surplus and ample earnings, its "current ratio"—that is, the amount of cash and current assets in proportion to its current debts and liabilities—may be low. Banks and trade creditors do not look with favor on dividend payments depleting current assets if this raises the possibility current debts may go unpaid. Over-generous dividend policies adversely affect credit-rating.

Another, and purely business consideration, arises out of the fact that shares are widely traded on stock exchanges. A buyer likes to know with great definiteness whether, if he buys stock, a dividend being declared at or about that time is payable to him or to his predecessor in title. In consequence, dividends are commonly declared payable to stockholders of record on a stated date; and advance notice of the "record" of this date, commonly called the "record date" must be sent to the stock exchanges. Sales made prior to the record date give to the purchaser the right to the dividend; sales after that date are "ex-dividend", the dividend being paid to the holder as of the record date.

As a result, most dividend declarations have three dates:

(1) the date on which the dividend was declared by the Board of Directors;

(2) payable to the stockholders of record at close of business on a date stated in the declaration;

(3) the dividend actually being payable at a subsequent date.

Thus the directors of a corporation may meet on December 5, and may then declare a dividend payable to stockholders of record at close of business on December 20, the dividend itself to be payable on January 1.

Manipulation of Dividends

If no questions existed other than those of practice, dividend laws would be fairly simple. But, when a corporation has more than one class of stock, many means exist permitting the directors, by varying the timing of dividends, actually to direct the stream of profits of the corporation towards one or another class of stock.

Thus, a corporation may have non-cumulative preferred stock and common stock. Dividends on non-cumulative preferred stock, under the Federal rule, are payable only if declared in, or in respect of, a particular year; if not declared, that year's dividends are lost to the non-cumulative preferred stockholders. It is true that when non-cumulative preferred dividends are unpaid, common dividends may not be paid in that year to the common stock.

But in the case of a corporation with ample regular earnings to cover non-cumulative preferred dividends and also to pay dividends on common, the directors might adopt a policy of not declaring dividends in every year but only every two years. In that case, in the intermediate years, the dividends on non-cumulative preferred stock would be lost to those stockholders; and would then become available for declaration to the common stock. The result would be to keep down the income received by the non-cumulative preferred to one-half of what it would be if dividends were regularly declared; and the savings thus accomplished could then be declared as dividends to the common stockholders.

With more complex corporate structures, with non-participating preferred and other similar classes of stock, the possibility of manipulation becomes very great. Thus, in addition to the technical problem which arises out of declaration of dividends, there is also an equitable problem: the problem of whether the discretion which directors enjoy to declare dividends is absolute, or whether it is controlled by equitable principles. There is a current of legal opinion that the discretion is not absolute; that directors cannot, from self-interest or whim, exercise their discretion to the detriment of one class of stockholders and in favor of another. But, since the opinion of Mr. Justice Holmes in Wabash Railway v. Barclay and the prevalence of the Federal as against the New Jersey rule, the majority view for the moment appears to be that if the corporate papers permit this manipulation, the stockholders must be taken to have consented to it and what happens to them is their own fault. The conception is inherently so shocking that a lawyer may expect continued resistance to the harshness of the rule.

A second problem arises out of the fact that dividends powerfully affect the market value of stock. Thus on one occasion the directors of a well-established company which had declared dividends regularly for years met on the usual date on which dividends were declared and adjourned without action on the dividend. The natural result was a violent drop in the market value of the stock. Shortly thereafter the directors met again and declared the regular dividend. Query: Whether in this situation directors might not be liable for losses to shareholders who sold at the lower price, unless they could justify their action by valid business reasons?

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW

§ 58. Dividends. No stock corporation shall declare or pay any dividend which shall impair its capital, nor while its capital is impaired, nor shall any such corporation declare or pay any dividend or make any distribution of assets to any of its stockholders, whether upon a reduction of the number or par value of its shares or of its capital, unless the value of its assets remaining after the payment of such dividend, or after such distribution of assets, as the case may be, shall be at least equal to the aggregate amount of its debts and liabilities, including capital. In case any such dividend shall be paid, or any such distribution of assets made, the directors in whose administration the same shall have been declared or made, except those (1) who may have caused their dissent therefrom to be entered upon the minutes of the meetings of directors at the time or (2) who having been absent when such action was taken may have communicated in writing their dissent to the secretary or caused their dissent to be entered on the minutes within a reasonable time after learning of such action, or (3) who affirmatively show that they had reasonable grounds to believe, and did believe, that such dividend or distribution would not impair the capital of such corporation, shall be liable jointly and severally to such corporation and to the creditors thereof to the full amount of any loss sustained by such corporation or by its creditors respectively by reason of such dividend or distribution.

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

§ 34. Dividends; Reserves:—The directors of every corporation created under this Chapter, subject to any restrictions contained in its Certificate of Incorporation, shall have power to declare and pay dividends upon the shares of its capital stock either (a) out of its net assets in excess of its capital as computed in accordance with the provisions of Sections 14, 26, 27 and 28 of this Chapter, or (b), in case there shall be no such excess, out of its net profits for the fiscal year then current and/or the preceding fiscal year; provided, however, that if the capital of the corporation computed as aforesaid shall have been diminished by depreciation in the value of its property, or by losses, or otherwise, to an amount less than the aggregate amount of the capital represented by the issued and outstanding stock of all classes having a preference upon the distribution of assets, the directors of such corporation shall not declare and pay out of such net profits any dividends upon any shares of any classes of its capital stock until the deficiency in the amount of capital represented by the issued and outstanding stock of all classes having a preference upon the distribution of assets shall have been repaired. Subject to any restrictions contained in its Certificate of Incorporation, the directors of any corporation engaged in the exploitation of wasting assets may determine the net profits derived from the exploitation of such wasting assets without taking into consideration the depletion of such assets resulting from lapse of time or from necessary consumption of such assets incidental to their exploitation.

Nothing contained in this Section shall prevent the stockholders of any corporation, or the directors thereof if the Certificate of Incorporation shall so provide, from setting apart out of any of the funds of the corporation available for dividends a reserve or reserves for any proper purpose or from abolishing any such reserve in the manner in which it was created.

A director shall be fully protected in relying in good faith upon the books of account of the corporation or statements prepared by any of its officials as to the value and amount of the assets, liabilities and/or net profits of the corporation, or any other facts pertinent to the existence and amount of surplus or other funds from which dividends might properly be declared and paid.

§ 35. Dividends; How Declared and Paid; Violations of Section; Penalty; Exoneration from Liability:—No corporation created under the provisions of this Chapter, nor the Directors thereof, shall pay dividends upon any shares of the corporation except in accordance with the provisions of this Chapter. Dividends may be paid in cash, in property, or in shares of the capital stock, in the case of shares with par value at par, and in the case of shares without par value at such price as may be fixed by the Board of Directors. In case of any willful or negligent violation of the provisions of this Section, the Directors under whose administration the same may happen shall be jointly and severally liable, at any time within six years after paying such unlawful dividend, to the corporation and to its creditors, in the event of its dissolution or insolvency, to the full amount of the dividend so unlawfully paid, with interest on the same from the time such liability accrued; provided that any Director who may have been absent when the same was done, or who may have dissented from the act or resolution by which the same was done, may exonerate himself from such liability by causing his dissent to be entered at large on the books containing the minutes of the proceedings of the Directors at the time the same was done, or forthwith after he shall have notice of the same, or by causing a true copy of such dissent to be published, within two weeks after the same shall have been so entered, in a newspaper published in the County where the corporation has its principal office.

(a) Contract Obligation to Declare a Dividend (Rare)

AMICK v. COBLE.

Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1943. 222 N.C. 484, 23 S.E.2d 854.

Action by G. L. Amick against W. V. Coble and others, officers and directors of the Central Grocery Company, Inc., to require defendants to pay corporate dividends. From the judgment, plaintiff and defendants appeal.

Affirmed on defendants' appeal; modified and affirmed on plaintiff's appeal.

Civil action to require defendants to pay dividends. Under C.S. § 1178.

[The Central Grocery Company, a corporation, was organized in 1927 by the plaintiff and defendant, W. V. Coble, with a capital paid-in stock of $10,000 composed of 100 shares of $100 par value stock, to carry on the wholesale grocery business. Plaintiff became secretary-treasurer and general manager of the corporation, and continued in that capacity until February 15, 1940; at the end of the year 1939, seventy-eight shares of the capital stock were outstanding,—the other twenty-two shares having been bought in by the corporation and held as treasury stock; also at the end of the year 1939 the corporation had built up a surplus of $39,971.38, in addition to earnings of $5,528.96 in that year, based upon merchandise inventory $38,614.93, as plaintiff contends, or $21,623.89 based upon a merchandise inventory reduced to $29,389.15 as averred by defendants; at a meeting of the board of directors held early in 1940, plaintiff as secretary-treasurer and general manager was superseded by defendant W. V. Coble. For the year 1940, the company showed a net profit of at least $2,636.91; and $2,116.92 in 1941. In 1941, the stockholders and directors set aside $43,500 as working capital; for 1942 they set aside $50,000 for the same purpose. Both sums were found to be more than the surplus existing at the end of the years in question.

Plaintiff, in his complaint, seeks to have all of the surplus accumulated prior to 1940 declared as a stock dividend, and to have the profits for the years 1940 and 1941 paid out in cash dividends.

Upon hearing in Superior Court, a jury trial was waived and it was agreed that the court might find the facts and enter judgment accordingly.

The court found that defendants had no right to set aside the whole surplus as "working capital"; that these sums were far in excess of what could, in good faith, be set aside, and ordered the directors to declare as dividends from profits for the years 1940 and 1941, the sum of $4,278.44.].

WINBORNE, JUSTICE. * * * The statute relating to corporations, Chapter 22, Consolidated Statutes of North Carolina, Section 1178, provides that: "The directors of every corporation created under this chapter shall, in January of each year, unless some specific time for that purpose is fixed in its charter, or by-laws, and in that case at the time so fixed, after reserving, over and above its capital stock paid in, as a working capital for the corporation, whatever sum has been fixed by the stockholders, declare a dividend among its stockholders of the whole of its accumulated profits exceeding the amount reserved, and pay it to the stockholders on demand. * * *

The court finds as a fact that at the beginning of the year 1940 the corporation had a surplus of approximately $44,075, and at the end of year 1941 the surplus was approximately $43,156.14. Also while the court further finds that prior to 1940 the stockholders were paid only small dividends and the earnings were permitted to remain in the treasury of the company and be used in whatever way the corporation needed them, and mainly in the increase of stock of goods, it also finds that no corporate resolution had been adopted with respect to this surplus. Moreover, it appears that no corporate action was taken by the stockholders until after the hearing of this action in the court below, when, at the suggestion, and with the consent of the court, a special meeting of stockholders and of directors was called at the instance of defendants, the stated purpose of which was "to establish the working capital of this company for the year 1942, and to designate by resolution a reserve as working capital for the years 1940 and 1941." And the court finds that at such meeting the stockholders by majority vote set aside as working capital for the year 1941 an amount which is more than the surplus at the end of that year,—before taxes had been paid and a reserve for bad debts set up. Upon this the court in effect holds that the defendants as majority stockholders did not act in good faith. Therefore, if it be conceded that at such meeting the majority stockholders, acting in good faith, could have set aside a working capital after the institution of this action, the ruling below is tantamount to holding that no such action has been taken in good faith. The effect of this is that no valid corporate action has been taken with respect to setting aside a working capital either before or after the institution of this action. Consequently, the accumulated profits are available for dividends, and the directors are controlled by the provisions of C.S. § 1178, and have no discretion with respect to the performance of the duty imposed. Cannon v. Mills Co., supra. But it appears that the plaintiff seeks to have paid in cash only the profits for the years 1940 and 1941, and there is, therefore, no error in the judgment directing the payment of cash dividends from the profits for those years.

Plaintiff's Appeal: Plaintiff assigns as error the refusal to the court to order paid as cash dividends the whole of the profits for the years 1940 and 1941 as shown in the annual statements rendered at the end of those years, respectively. However, the court finds that the profits shown on the 1940 statement are subject to income tax, to allowance for bad debts, and to inventory adjustment; and that the profits shown on the statement for the year 1941 are subject to income tax and to deduction for bad debts, thereby reducing the total profits for those years to $4,753.83. Manifestly, the income tax, allowance for bad debts, and the inventory adjustment are properly deductible in order to ascertain the net profits. However, we are of opinion that the court erred in allowing ten per cent of the net accumulated profits for 1940 and 1941 to be deducted to cover probable expenses. The order should have directed the payment of the full amount of $4,753.83. That this may be done without impairing the capital structure of the corporation is, on this record, patent. For after paying this amount as dividend, there still remains of the surplus as of the end of the year 1941, the sum of $38,302.31, on a paid-in and outstanding capital of $7,800, as shown by facts found by the court to which no exceptions are presented.

As the court rendered no judgment with respect to the payment of the accumulated profits prior to the year 1940, we make no ruling with regard thereto, and leave the matter for future determination in this action, if any of the parties so move.

On Defendants' Appeal—Affirmed.

On Plaintiff's Appeal—Modified and affirmed.

LYDIA E. PINKHAM MEDICINE COMPANY v. GOVE et al.

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1939. 303 Mass. 1, 20 N.E.2d 482.

Suit by Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Company against Aroline P. Gove and others for damages and injunctive relief predicated on breaches of trust by defendants as directors and officers of plaintiff corporation. On reservation and report.

Decree for plaintiff in part in accordance with opinion.

QUA, JUSTICE. When this suit came before the full court upon a previous occasion (Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co. v. Gove, Mass., 9 N.E. 2d 573) we held that no error had been shown in overruling the defendants' demurrer to the bill and the defendants' plea; that the defendants' exceptions to the master's first report must be overruled; that the plaintiff was entitled to injunctive relief and to damages and costs against the defendants Aroline P. Gove and Lydia P. Gove; that the bill should be dismissed as to the defendant Renehan, with costs to her; and that upon the entering of the final decree the temporary injunction restraining the defendants Gove from further prosecuting their suit in Maine for the appointment of a receiver of the plaintiff should be dissolved. We then stated in substance that further hearings upon various matters would be necessary before the details of a final decree could be settled and ordered the case to stand for further proceedings in the county court.

Thereafter the cause was recommitted to the master for further findings of fact, and both his first report and his supplemental report have been confirmed. * * *

5. The plaintiff is entitled to have the defendants Gove as directors join in declaring dividends in compliance with a by-law of the plaintiff which reads as follows: "The net surplus of the company shall not be accumulated or maintained to an amount exceeding $1,000,000. Until the net surplus is reduced to $1,000,000 dividends shall be declared and paid to the stockholders out of the current net earnings of the company so far as the same shall be sufficient for that purpose, and the balance, so far as necessary, out of the net surplus of the company, at the rate of $3,000 per share per annum payable in ten equal payments on the first day of each calendar month except January and February. Thereafter so far as consistent with the maintenance of a net surplus of $1,000,000 and unless otherwise voted unanimously by the full board of directors, dividends shall be declared and paid to the amount of the net earnings of the company in ten equal payments each year as above provided." The surplus was "reduced to $1,000,000" but now again exceeds that amount, and the defendants Gove in bad faith and as one means of compelling the Pinkhams to sell their stock have in times past refused to join in declaring dividends.

A question might be raised as to whether the plaintiff is a proper party to seek relief of this kind, inasmuch as it is not shown to have suffered pecuniary loss or damage in its property through the retention of money that ought to have been paid out as dividends. Nevertheless we think it can fairly be held that a corporation has a cause of action when a command like this embodied in its organic law has been violated by its officers. One of the objects of the corporation's existence is to earn money for its stockholders. It is not devoid of interest in the orderly conduct of its affairs. It cannot be wholly indifferent to the continuance of a deadlock which results in one half of its ownership being wrongfully deprived of the income that belongs to the shares. Such a situation is bound to have repercussions affecting the well-being and the future prospects of the corporation itself. So far as we can discover all the decisions recognizing the right to compel the declaration of dividends agree that a shareholder cannot sue without first attempting to move the corporation, unless such attempt would be useless, and that the corporation is at least a proper party to a suit brought by a shareholder. Indeed, it has been asserted more than once that the shareholder's right to have a dividend declared is wholly derivative, and that any suit that he may bring should be brought in behalf of the corporation as for a wrong to the corporation itself. [Citing cases.] * * *

We do not intend to intimate that a bill brought by a stockholder for the benefit of all stockholders would not lie. Such bills have succeeded of this purpose in other jurisdictions. Stevens v. United States Steel Corp., 2 Robb. (N.J.) 373, 59 A. 905. Probably in most instances practical considerations will make this course necessary, as it will seldom happen that a corporation whose directors refuse to declare dividends will itself bring suit. [Citing cases.] * * * But in a case like this one a right to sue in the corporation and a right to sue in the stockholders are not necessarily mutually exclusive, and it is convenient that all issues arising out of the conduct of the defendants Gove should be adjusted in one suit. See Dunphy v. Traveller Newspaper Association, 146 Mass. 495, 499, 16 N.E. 426.

The by-law is a reasonable regulation of the shareholders' rights to receive dividends. The required surplus of $1,000,000 and the requirement limiting the dividends to net earnings protect the interests of the corporation and of its creditors. The by-law is valid, and where the shareholders' rights are definitely fixed by a valid by-law the discretion of the directors is correspondingly limited, and the reasons that have made courts reluctant to order the declaration of dividends lose their force. [Citing cases.] * * * No reason has been advanced why dividends should not be declared and paid regularly in accordance with the by-law. The defendant directors in refusing to declare dividends have not exercised their judgment in good faith.

The requirement that the dividends shall be declared and paid "in ten equal payments each year" on the first day of each month except January and February presupposes the ascertainment before the first day of March in each year of a fixed sum, based upon the then existing financial condition of the corporation, as the "amount of the net earnings" (in excess of the amount required to maintain the surplus at $1,000,000) which is to be divided in equal payments during that year. A sum which varies monthly or even daily cannot be divided into ten equal monthly payments. If during any year it should appear that to continue the payments established at the beginning of the year would reduce the net surplus below $1,000,000 so much of any payment as would have that effect is to be withheld. This is a result of the condition that the equal payments are to be made "so far as consistent with the maintenance of a net surplus of $1,000,000." * * *

Applying these principles to the facts found, we think that the defendants Aroline P. Gove and Lydia P. Gove should be enjoined as follows: * * *

(F) From making or contracting or purporting to contract to make any disposition of moneys or other assets of the corporation except as directed by the board of directors or by the president and from refusing or neglecting or delaying to make or threatening not to make such payments and dispositions of money and assets as the board of directors or the president under the authority of the vote of June 7, 1927, shall direct to be made. * * *

A final decree is to be entered in accordance with this opinion.

Ordered accordingly.

(b) Directors' discretion to declare dividends and limitations on that discretion

DODGE v. FORD MOTOR CO.

Supreme Court of Michigan, 1919. 204 Mich. 459, 170 N.W. 668, 3 A.L.R. 413.

Bill by John F. Dodge and another against the Ford Motor Company and others to compel the declaration of dividends and for an injunction. From the decree rendered, defendants appeal. * * *

OSTRANDER, J. (after stating the facts). The authorized capital stock of the defendant company is $2,000,000. Its capital, in July, 1916, invested in some form of property, including accounts receivable, was $78,278,418.65, and, less liabilities other than capital stock, was more than $60,000,000. Besides this, it had and was using as capital nearly $54,000,000 in cash or the equivalent of cash. * * * [3]

---

[3] The following is the balance sheet of the company on July 31, 1916:

Assets
Working—
Cash on hand and in bank	$ 52,550,771.92
Michigan municipal bonds	1,259,029.01
Accounts receivable	8,292,778.41
Merchandise and supplies	31,895,434.69
Investments—outside	9,200.00
Expense inventories	434,055.19
Plant—
Land	5,232,156.10
Buildings and fixtures	17,293,293.40
Machinery and power plant	8,896,342.31
Factory equipment	3,868,261.02
Tools	1,690,688.54
Patterns	170,619.77
Patents	64,339.85
Office equipment	431,249.37
Total assets	$132,088,219.58
Liabilities
Working—
Accounts payable	$ 7,680,866.17
Contract deposits	1,519,296.40
Accrued payrolls	847,953.68
Accrued salaries	338,268.86
Accrued expenses	1,175,070.72
Contract rebates	2,199,988.00
Buyers' P. S. Rebates	48,099.00
Reserves—
For fire insurance	57,493.89
For depreciation of plant	4,260,275.33
Total liabilities	$ 18,127,312.05
Surplus	$111,960,907.53
Capital stock	2,000,000.00
Total	$132,088,219.58

The rule which will govern courts in deciding these questions is not in dispute. It is, of course, differently phrased by judges and by authors, and, as the phrasing in a particular instance may seem to lean for or against the exercise of the right of judicial interference with the actions of corporate directors, the context, or the facts before the court, must be considered. This court, in Hunter v. Roberts, Thorp & Co., 83 Mich. 63, 71, 47 N.W. 131, recognized the rule in the following language:

"It is a well-recognized principle of law that the directors of a corporation, and they alone, have the power to declare a dividend of the earnings of the corporation, and to determine its amount. 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1st Ed., p. 725. Courts of equity will not interfere in the management of the directors unless it is clearly made to appear that they are guilty of fraud or misappropriation of the corporate funds, or refuse to declare a dividend when the corporation has a surplus of net profits which it can, without detriment to its business, divide among its stockholders, and when a refusal to do so would amount to such an abuse of discretion as would constitute a fraud, or breach of that good faith which they are bound to exercise towards the stockholders."

In 2 Cook on Corporations, 7th Ed. § 545, it is expressed as follows:

"The board of directors declare the dividends, and it is for the directors, and not the stockholders, to determine whether or not a dividend shall be declared.

"When, therefore, the directors have exercised this discretion and refused to declare a dividend, there will be no interference by the courts with their decision, unless they are guilty of a wilful abuse of their discretionary powers, or of bad faith or of a neglect of duty. It requires a very strong case to induce a court of equity to order the directors to declare a dividend, inasmuch as equity has no jurisdiction, unless fraud or a breach of trust is involved. There have been many attempts to sustain such a suit, yet, although the courts do not disclaim jurisdiction, they have quite uniformly refused to interfere. The discretion of the directors will not be interfered with by the courts, unless there has been bad faith, wilful neglect, or abuse of discretion.

"Accordingly, the directors may, in the fair exercise of their discretion, invest profits to extend and develop the business, and a reasonable use of the profits to provide additional facilities for the business cannot be objected to or enjoined by the stockholders."

In 1 Morawetz on Corporations, 2d Ed., § 447, it is stated:

"Profits earned by a corporation may be divided among its shareholders; but it is not a violation of the charter if they are allowed to accumulate and remain invested in the company's business. The managing agents of a corporation are impliedly invested with a discretionary power with regard to the time and manner of distributing its profits. They may apply profits in payment of floating or funded debts, or in development of the company's business; and so long as they do not abuse their discretionary powers, or violate the company's charter, the courts cannot interfere.

"But it is clear that the agents of a corporation, and even the majority, cannot arbitrarily withhold profits earned by the company, or apply them to any use which is not authorized by the company's charter. The nominal capital of a company does not necessarily limit the scope of its operations; a corporation may borrow money for the purpose of enlarging its business, and in many instances it may use profits for the same purpose. But the amount of the capital contributed by the shareholders is an important element in determining the limit beyond which the company's business cannot be extended by the investment of profits. If a corporation is formed with a capital of $100,000 in order to carry on a certain business, no one would hesitate to say that it would be a departure from the intention of the founders to withhold profits, in order to develop the company's business, until the sum of $500,000 had been amassed, unless the company was formed mainly for the purpose of accumulating the profits from year to year. The question in each case depends upon the use to which the capital is put, and the meaning of the company's charter. If a majority of the shareholders or the directors of a corporation wrongfully refuse to declare a dividend and distribute profits earned by the company, any shareholder feeling aggrieved may obtain relief in a court of equity.

"It may often be reasonable to withhold part of the earnings of a corporation in order to increase its surplus fund, when it would not be reasonable to withhold all the earnings for that purpose. The shareholders forming an ordinary business corporation expect to obtain the profits of their investment in the form of regular dividends. To withhold the entire profits merely to enlarge the capacity of the company's business would defeat their just expectations. After the business of a corporation has been brought to a prosperous condition, and necessary provision has been made for future prosperity, a reasonable share of the profits should be applied in the payment of regular dividends, though a part may be reserved to increase the surplus and enlarge the business itself."

One other statement may be given from Park v. Grant Locomotive Works, 40 N.J.Eq. 114, 3 A. 162; Id., 45 N.J.Eq. 244, 19 A. 621:

"In cases where the power of the directors of a corporation is without limitation, and free from restraint, they are at liberty to exercise a very liberal discretion as to what disposition shall be made of the gains of the business of the corporation. Their power over them is absolute as long as they act in the exercise of their honest judgment. They may reserve of them whatever their judgment approves as necessary or judicious for repairs or improvements, and to meet contingencies, both present and prospective. And their determination in respect of these matters, if made in good faith and for honest ends, though the result may show that it was injudicious, is final, and not subject to judicial revision."

It is not necessary to multiply statements of the rule.

To develop the points now discussed, and to a considerable extent that may be developed together as a single point, it is necessary to refer with some particularity to the facts.

When plaintiffs made their complaint and demand for further dividends the Ford Motor Company had concluded its most prosperous year of business. The demand for its cars at the price of the preceding year continued. It could make and could market in the year beginning August 1, 1916, more than 500,000 cars. Sales of parts and repairs would necessarily increase. The cost of materials was likely to advance, and perhaps the price of labor, but it reasonably might have expected a profit for the year of upwards of $60,000,000. It had assets of more than $132,000,000, a surplus of almost $112,000,000, and its cash on hand and municipal bonds were nearly $54,000,000. Its total liabilities, including capital stock, was a little over $20,000,000. It had declared no special dividend during the business year except the October, 1915, dividend. It had been the practice, under similar circumstances, to declare larger dividends. Considering only these facts, a refusal to declare and pay further dividends appears to be not an exercise of discretion on the part of the directors, but an arbitrary refusal to do what the circumstances required to be done. These facts and others call upon the directors to justify their action, or failure or refusal to act. In justification, the defendants have offered testimony tending to prove, and which does prove, the following facts. It had been the policy of the corporation for a considerable time to annually reduce the selling price of cars, while keeping up, or improving, their quality. As early as in June, 1915, a general plan for the expansion of the productive capacity of the concern by a practical duplication of its plant had been talked over by the executive officers and directors and agreed upon, not all of the details having been settled and no formal action of directors having been taken. The erection of a smelter was considered, and engineering and other data in connection therewith secured. In consequence, it was determined not to reduce the selling price of cars for the year beginning August 1, 1915, but to maintain the price and to accumulate a large surplus to pay for the proposed expansion of plant and equipment, and perhaps to build a plant for smelting ore. It is hoped, by Mr. Ford, that eventually 1,000,000 cars will be annually produced. The contemplated changes will permit the increased output.

The plan, as affecting the profits of the business for the year beginning August 1, 1916, and thereafter, calls for a reduction in the selling price of the cars. It is true that this price might be at any time increased, but the plan called for the reduction in price of $80 a car. The capacity of the plant, without the additions thereto voted to be made (without a part of them at least), would produce more than 600,000 cars annually. This number, and more, could have been sold for $440 instead of $360, a difference in the return for capital, labor and materials employed of at least $48,000,000. In short, the plan does not call for and is not intended to produce immediately a more profitable business but a less profitable one; not only less profitable than formerly but less profitable than it is admitted it might be made. The apparent immediate effect will be to diminish the value of shares and the returns to shareholders.

It is the contention of plaintiffs that the apparent effect of the plan is intended to be the continued and continuing effect of it and that it is deliberately proposed, not of record and not by official corporate declaration, but nevertheless proposed, to continue the corporation henceforth as a semi-eleemosynary institution and not as a business institution. In support of this contention they point to the attitude and to the expressions of Mr. Henry Ford.

Mr. Henry Ford is the dominant force in the business of the Ford Motor Company. No plan of operations could be adopted unless he consented, and no board of directors can be elected whom he does not favor. One of the directors of the company has no stock. One share was assigned to him to qualify him for the position, but it is not claimed that he owns it. A business, one of the largest in the world, and one of the most profitable, has been built up. It employs many men, at good pay.

"My ambition," said Mr. Ford, "is to employ still more men, to spread the benefits of this industrial system to the greatest possible number, to help them build up their lives and their homes. To do this we are putting the greatest share of our profits back in the business."

"With regard to dividends, the company paid sixty per cent. on its capitalization of two million dollars, or $1,200,000, leaving $58,000,000 to reinvest for the growth of the company. This is Mr. Ford's policy at present, and it is understood that the other stockholders cheerfully accede to this plan."

He had made up his mind in the summer of 1916 that no dividends other than the regular dividends should be paid, "for the present."

"Q. For how long? Had you fixed in your mind any time in the future, when you were going to pay—

"A. No.

"Q. That was indefinite in the future?

"A. That was indefinite, yes, sir."

The record, and especially the testimony of Mr. Ford, convinces us that he has to some extent the attitude towards shareholders of one who has dispensed and distributed to them large gains and that they should be content to take what he chooses to give. His testimony creates the impression also, that he thinks the Ford Motor Company has made too much money, has had too large profits, and that although large profits might be still earned, a sharing of them with the public, by reducing the price of the output of the company, ought to be undertaken. We have no doubt that certain sentiments, philanthropic and altruistic, creditable to Mr. Ford, had large influence in determining the policy to be pursued by the Ford Motor Company—the policy which has been herein referred to.

It is said by his counsel that—

"Although a manufacturing corporation cannot engage in humanitarian works as its principal business, the fact that it is organized for profit does not prevent the existence of implied powers to carry on with humanitarian motives such charitable works as are incidental to the main business of the corporation."

And again:

"As the expenditures complained of are being made in an expansion of the business which the company is organized to carry on, and for purposes within the powers of the corporation as hereinbefore shown, the question is as to whether such expenditures are rendered illegal because influenced to some extent by humanitarian motives and purposes on the part of the members of the board of directors."

In discussing this proposition, counsel have referred to decisions such as Hawes v. Oakland, 104 U.S. 450, 26 L.Ed. 827; Taunton v. Royal Ins. Co., 2 Hem. & M. 135; Henderson v. Bank of Australasia, L.R. 40 Ch.Div. 170; Steinway v. Steinway & Sons, 17 Misc. 43, 40 N.Y.S. 718; People ex rel. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Hotchkiss, 136 App.Div. 150, 120 N.Y.S. 649. These cases, after all, like all others in which the subject is treated, turn finally upon the point, the question whether it appears that the directors were not acting for the best interests of the corporation. We do not draw in question, nor do counsel for the plaintiffs do so, the validity of the general propositions stated by counsel nor the soundness of the opinions delivered in the cases cited. The case presented here is not like any of them. The difference between an incidental humanitarian expenditure of corporate funds for the benefit of the employees, like the building of a hospital for their use and the employment of agencies for the betterment of their condition, and a general purpose and plan to benefit mankind at the expense of others, is obvious. There should be no confusion (of which there is evidence) of the duties which Mr. Ford conceives that he and the stockholders owe to the general public and the duties which in law he and his codirectors owe to protesting, minority stockholders. A business corporation is organized and carried on primarily for the profit of the stockholders. The powers of the directors are to be employed for that end. The discretion of directors is to be exercised in the choice of means to attain that end and does not extend to a change in the end itself, to the reduction of profits or to the nondistribution of profits among stockholders in order to devote them to other purposes.

There is committed to the discretion of directors, a discretion to be exercised in good faith, the infinite details of business, including the wages which shall be paid to employees, the number of hours they shall work, the conditions under which labor shall be carried on, and the prices for which products shall be offered to the public. It is said by appellants that the motives of the board members are not material and will not be inquired into by the court so long as their acts are within their lawful powers. As we have pointed out, and the proposition does not require argument to sustain it, it is not within the lawful powers of a board of directors to shape and conduct the affairs of a corporation for the merely incidental benefit of shareholders and for the primary purpose of benefiting others, and no one will contend that if the avowed purpose of the defendant directors was to sacrifice the interests of shareholders it would not be the duty of the courts to interfere.

We are not, however, persuaded that we should interfere with the proposed expansion of the business of the Ford Motor Company. In view of the fact that the selling price of products may be increased at any time, the ultimate results of the larger business cannot be certainly estimated. The judges are not business experts. It is recognized that plans must often be made for a long future, for expected competition, for a continuing as well as an immediately profitable venture. The experience of the Ford Motor Company is evidence of capable management of its affairs. It may be noticed, incidentally, that it took from the public the money required for the execution of its plan and that the very considerable salaries paid to Mr. Ford and to certain executive officers and employees were not diminished. We are not satisfied that the alleged motives of the directors, in so far as they are reflected in the conduct of the business, menace the interests of shareholders. It is enough to say, perhaps, that the court of equity is at all times open to complaining shareholders having a just grievance.

Assuming the general plan and policy of expansion and the details of it to have been sufficiently, formally, approved at the October and November, 1917, meetings of directors, and assuming further that the plan and policy and the details agreed upon were for the best ultimate interest of the company and therefore of its shareholders, what does it amount to in justification of a refusal to declare and pay a special dividend, or dividends? The Ford Motor Company was able to estimate with nicety its income and profit. It could sell more cars than it could make. Having ascertained what it would cost to produce a car and to sell it, the profit upon each car depended upon the selling price. That being fixed, the yearly income and profit was determinable, and, within slight variations, was certain.

There was appropriated—voted—for the smelter $11,325,000. As to the remainder voted there is no available way for determining how much had been paid before the action of directors was taken and how much was paid thereafter, but assuming that the plans required an expenditure sooner or later of $9,895,000 for duplication of the plant, and for land and other expenditures $3,000,000, the total is $24,220,000. The company was continuing business, at a profit—a cash business. If the total cost of proposed expenditures had been immediately withdrawn in cash from the cash surplus (money and bonds) on hand August 1, 1916, there would have remained nearly $30,000,000.

Defendants say, and it is true, that a considerable cash balance must be at all times carried by such a concern. But, as has been stated, there was a large daily, weekly, monthly, receipt of cash. The output was practically continuous and was continuously, and within a few days, turned into cash. Moreover, the contemplated expenditures were not to be immediately made. The large sum appropriated for the smelter plant was payable over a considerable period of time. So that, without going further, it would appear that, accepting and approving the plan of the directors, it was their duty to distribute on or near the first of August, 1916, a very large sum of money to stockholders.

In reaching this conclusion, we do not ignore, but recognize, the validity of the proposition that plaintiffs have from the beginning profited by, if they have not lately officially, participated in, the general policy of expansion pursued by this corporation. We do not lose sight of the fact that it had been, upon an occasion, agreeable to the plaintiffs to increase the capital stock to $100,000,000 by a stock dividend of $98,000,000. These things go only to answer other contentions now made by plaintiffs and do not and cannot operate to estop them to demand proper dividends upon the stock they own. It is obvious that an annual dividend of sixty per cent. upon $2,000,000 or $1,200,000, is the equivalent of a very small dividend upon $100,000,000, or more.

The decree of the court[4] below fixing and determining the specific amount to be distributed to stockholders is affirmed. In other respects except as to the allowance of costs, the said decree is reversed. Plaintiffs will recover interest at five per cent. per annum upon their proportional share of said dividend from the date of the decree of the lower court. Appellants will tax the costs of their appeal, and two-thirds of the amount thereof will be paid by plaintiffs. No other costs are allowed. * * *[5]

---

[4] The directors of the Ford Motor Co. were ordered to declare a dividend of $19,275,385.96. A permanent injunction was issued prohibiting: the company from owning, holding or operating any smelting plant or blast furnace; the increase of the fixed capital assets; the holding of liquid assets beyond what might reasonably be required for the operation of the company; and the corporation and its directors were ordered to declare and distribute as dividends any such excess which might now exist or might accrue in the future.

[5] Note, 1919, 17 Mich.L.Rev. 502; 1920, 20 Col.L.Rev. 93; 1919, 28 Yale L.J. 710.

Following the above litigation, in 1919, the minority stockholders sold out to Henry and Edsel Ford, who thus became sole owners of the Ford Motor Co. For the history of this transaction, see James Couzens, 11 B.T.A. 1040, 1928.

MORRISON v. STATE BANK OF WHEATLAND et al.

Supreme Court of Wyoming, 1942. 58 Wyo. 138, 126 P.2d 793.

Action by Margaret Morrison and H. W. Loomis against the State Bank of Wheatland and others to compel defendants to declare and pay a dividend. The case was ordered dismissed as to plaintiff H. W. Loomis, and from a judgment for defendant, plaintiff Margaret Morrison appeals.

Affirmed.

[Action was brought against the State Bank of Wheatland, Josephine Brice, Paul H. Toy, A. L. Kendig and Oscar O. Natwick, as members of the Board of Directors, to compel them to declare and pay a dividend of not less than $600 per share upon the outstanding capital stock of said bank. It was alleged that the defendant bank should and could have paid during the years from 1936 to 1940 substantial cash dividends but did not do so because of an ulterior and dishonest motive of the defendant Directors Brice, Kendig and Toy to gain control of defendant bank and acquire ownership of all its assets for a grossly inadequate consideration, by buying up all of the outstanding shares of capital stock; that this scheme was conceived by the defendant Brice and that the defendants Toy and Kendig actively joined and participated and the defendant, Natwick, being in fact only a dummy Director, unwittingly contributed to this scheme; that the defendant Brice, immediately upon her becoming a Director, began the pursuit of this scheme to control the bank and the Board of Directors and to make it possible for defendants to buy up for a grossly inadequate price the outstanding shares of capital stock, while concealing the actual value of the shares of capital stock and the amount, character and assets of the defendant bank; that in pursuit of this policy defendant Brice ordered a transfer of five shares belonging to Toy to Natwick, who in 1936 became a Director; she purchased about 212 outstanding shares from various estates and individuals for a fixed price of $200 per share, and no dividends were paid from 1936 to 1940 because of the alleged conspiracy; that the defendant Brice entered into an agreement or understanding with Kendig early in 1937 whereby Brice was to obtain and turn over to Kendig a substantial block of the capital stock which she was to deliver to him at $200 per share and that he was, after the stock purchases were made, to become a Director and Executive Vice President of the then bank but his connection with the scheme was to be concealed during the stock buying campaign. The defense was a general denial and a statement of the bank's policy to build up a large surplus.]

METZ, District Judge. * * * The trial lasted several days. At the close of plaintiff's evidence, the defendants jointly and severally moved the court for judgment. Their motion was sustained by the court and judgment was entered as prayed for, and it is from this judgment that the plaintiff has taken her appeal to this court. * * *

The main question involved in this litigation is: "Did the directors of this bank fail or refuse to declare dividends upon the stock of the bank for the sole purpose of depreciating the value of the bank stock and compelling a sale of the same by different individuals to some of the directors, and has the plaintiff proven the allegations of her petition?" This is the first time the question of requiring the payment of dividends by a bank has been before this court for its consideration.

Hundreds of cases may be cited showing that the law is well settled as to the rights of stockholders and the duties and responsibilities of directors in the average private corporation, but cases involving the demand for the payment of dividends by a bank are, in comparison, few.

The general rule in regard to the payments of dividends by a corporation is thus stated in 18 C.J.S., Corporations, § 466, p. 1106: "The mere fact that a corporation has a large amount of surplus or net profits does not entitle the stockholders to the payment of dividends. When a corporation has net or surplus profits, unless some restraint is imposed by statute, charter, by-laws, contract, or otherwise, whether a dividend shall be declared and, if declared, its amount, rest in the sound discretion of the directors. Generally speaking, the courts have no right to declare dividends, and in the exercise of their discretion directors will not be controlled or interfered with by the courts, unless they act fraudulently, oppressively, or unreasonably."

The rule is also well stated in Cook on Corporations, 7th Ed., p. 1587: "The discretion of the directors will not be interfered with by the courts unless there has been bad faith, wilful neglect, or abuse of discretion."

As indicated before, this case is predicated upon an alleged conspiracy, fraud, and bad faith on the part of the directors, and particularly on the part of Josephine Brice. The record in this case is quite voluminous, involving some thousand pages. The history of this bank is interesting, and perhaps portrays the trials and tribulations of the average bank doing business in a small town, depending upon the farmers and stockmen for its business, they in turn depending upon an uncertain water supply, sudden and depressing fluctuating livestock values for their income, and contending with several years of drouth and a national depression. * * *

By March, 1933, the bank had a $40,000 capital, a $60,000 surplus, and had set aside a $284,000 special working fund, all of this having been plowed back into the capital structure by the directors, of whom the plaintiff's father was a moving party, and from whom the plaintiff inherited her stock.

Then the drouth, lack of water, crop failures, depleted farm and livestock values, hit the Wheatland country, and within a few months the bank's loans became more and more frozen, and, the directors of the bank desiring to become a member of the Federal Reserve System and to secure Federal Depository insurance, it was examined by both Federal and State Bank Examiners. The examiners gave this bank a thorough examination and compelled the directors of the bank to charge off $190,000 of bad loans and assets, and to set up a special reserve of $100,000 to cover additional doubtful and slow paper then held by the bank. The bank examiners further informed the directors that this $100,000 special reserve fund was not to be used or in any manner reduced without special permission from the State Bank Examiner's office. * * *

It is of interest to note that D. W. Brice's death occurred about a year and a half after this $190,000 charge-off was made by the Examiner; and we take it as a matter of course that these officers and directors had learned about this required action by the Examiners. No wonder these new directors were cautious about dividends and desired to build up the reserves, and especially so considering the drouth and water shortage the community was suffering. It is not necessary for us to comment on the losses of livestock and crops during these two or three years, as indicated by this record. The drouth was general and was not confined to the Wheatland community. The Western states were all having their troubles. We wonder what would have happened in 1933, when this $190,000 was charged off, if the policy of the bank had not been to maintain a large reserve. It probably would have been closed, and another bank failure added to the list. * * * There is no question but what this bank, in 1939, at the time the demand was made by the plaintiff, that the directors declare a dividend, had good-sized reserves, and also that if the directors felt that in their opinion a dividend should have been declared, it could have been paid without any criticism. But that is not the point involved in this litigation. We are not concerned about how large the reserves are, only as indicating the feasibility of a dividend. The payment of dividends is entirely a matter for the board of directors, if they are acting in good faith. The courts do not step in, dictate to directing boards how to run their business, or substitute the court's judgment for the judgment of the governing body of the corporation. Only in extreme cases, and then only where the evidence is clear, satisfactory and convincing that the directors are acting either in a fraudulent manner, or with ulterior motives, will the court interfere.

"There is no rule of law which prevents one or more persons from purchasing a majority of the shares of a corporation for the purpose of acquiring control thereof." 18 C.J.S., Corporations, § 496, p. 1174.

And the above rule of law applies even when the purchase of its stock is made by an officer or director of the corporation. See 84 A.L.R. 618, and authorities cited. In regard to this, the author of the annotations says: "The general rule * * * is that an officer or director of a corporation does not sustain a fiduciary relation to an individual stockholder with respect to his stock, and consequently the mere failure on the part of such officer or director, in purchasing the shares from the stockholder to disclose any inside information, will not militate against him so long as he does not actively mislead the seller or perpetrate a fraud; in other words, ordinarily, a corporate officer or director has a right to purchase the stock of a shareholder therein, the same as any other person has a right to purchase such stock, and there is nothing in the mere fact that the purchaser is an officer or director of the corporation whose shares he purchases from which fraud or unfair dealing may be inferred."

There are a few cases holding to the contrary, but the above rule is sustained by the overwhelming weight of authority. * * *

It is quite apparent from reading this record that these new directors, and particularly Mrs. Brice, did not know the value of the stock in this bank. The physical condition as testified to by Wilde, Christensen, Bertagnolli, and herself, shows that even an expert would have had considerable difficulty in arriving at the actual value of the stock in this bank. All of their acts, under the conditions as they existed at that time, between 1935 and 1939, taking into consideration the unsettled conditions, drouth, lack of water, depreciated livestock values, can be more reasonably construed as being in good faith and being cautious, rather than indicating fraud.

The plaintiff contends that this case comes under the "special circumstance rule," which applies to cases where the court can say that false representations were actually made, or there were special circumstances of such a nature that the court regarded the purchasers' conduct or failure to make full disclosure as fraudulent in law, or where a director as purchaser, knowingly makes only a partial disclosure to a stockholder seeking information amounting under the circumstances, to a fraudulent concealment. See "Stock purchase by officer or director," 84 A.L.R. 623, subdivision III, with authorities cited therein. * * *

The plaintiff's brief is largely devoted to charges of a conspiracy and concealment, fraud, wrongful or arbitrary abuse of discretionary powers, etc., against these defendants, in not declaring a dividend and in the purchase of different stock certificates throughout 1936 and 1937, and in fact up to 1939. The record discloses that the board of directors' acts for several years between 1935 and 1939 were approved at the annual stockholders' meetings, usually by unanimous vote; also all charge-offs by any officer were approved by the board at a later meeting of the directors.

Also, in speaking of dividends, the dividends that were paid in 1940 and 1941, after this case was started, were derived from money realized and recovered from the paper charged off and from land sales. These defendants all testified that Mrs. Brice never tried to control or influence their actions on the board; in fact the evidence shows that Josephine Brice did not take a particularly active part in the bank's business, and the managing of the bank was left to Kendig and Toy and Gans. There is no evidence to show that Josephine Brice knew anything about banking. In fact, the evidence is to the contrary. It might be noted also that the plaintiff in this case was one of the judges of the annual stockholders' election in 1941 and admitted voting for all of these defendants for directors, this occurring subsequent to the filing of this law suit.

The different purchases of stock by Mrs. Brice occurred through 1935 to 1937. * * * The record further discloses that in a number of estates, appraisers appointed by the court in fixing the value of the bank stock, appraised it at from $100 to $150 a share. In fact, the D. W. Brice estate stock was appraised at $150 a share in the estate proceedings, and Josephine Brice, in purchasing stock from different individuals, paid $200 a share for the stock, and offered it for the same figure to any satisfactory party that would come in and manage the bank. * * *

In some instances very little, if anything, was said about the purchase and the sale, an offer of $200 was made and no statement was made about the bank's condition, and later the party came back and offered to sell for $200 and was paid that amount. An examination of this record in our minds discloses the absence of any fraudulent representation whatsoever by any defendant. The trial judge heard all the evidence from the witnesses and had a good opportunity to analyze their testimony and demeanor while on the stand. The plaintiff failed to convince him that there had been any fraud or conspiracy practiced by any defendant on anyone whatsoever. The plaintiff admits having received at least 350% in dividends on her stock since she inherited it, in 1927. The bank's policy for more than 25 years prior to the time these defendants became interested in the bank was to maintain large reserves, and it is true they paid splendid dividends at times. In fact, the dividends would average around 25% a year over that period of time.

We do not feel that the facts or the law would warrant us in ordering this board of directors to declare a dividend simply because it has a good sized surplus and reserve, and even a larger reserve than most banks carry. The State Examiners testified that because of the peculiar situation that existed in the Wheatland community, and had for years, they suffered a 10% larger charge-off than the average bank in Wyoming, and that also because of these conditions mentioned, it was necessary for this bank to carry a much larger surplus and undivided profits account than other banks of like size in the state of Wyoming.

It is our duty, as we see it, to encourage directors in banks to build up their capital structure until it is unassailable. A bank is not an ordinary private corporation in which the stockholders are the only interested parties. The directors in a bank are the trustees of the funds of the whole territory it serves. Nothing can so wreck a community, or cause as much hardship, misery and heartaches, as a bank failure. The community is a great deal more interested in the safety and solvency of a bank than are stockholders who own a small minority interest. It is the sacred duty of all bank directors and officers to protect their depositors first, and their stockholders last. Too many banks throughout Wyoming have failed because they did not build up their capital structure before declaring dividends.

The conditions that face the officers of our banks today are not particularly encouraging, with taxes pyramiding, inflation and its aftermath just around the corner, a world war that is being financed by the United States and its banks, the uncertainties of the war, the disruption of the community's business and social life and its personnel, all add to the worries and uncertainties and make the decisions of boards of directors in banks arduous and more difficult. It is far better for the directors to be safe rather than sorry.

The decision of the lower court is affirmed.

HARRY CHANNON v. H. CHANNON COMPANY et al.

Appellate Court of Illinois, 1920. 218 Ill.App. 397.

MR. JUSTICE O'CONNOR delivered the opinion of the court.

Harry Channon, a stockholder of the H. Channon Company, a corporation, filed his bill in this case against the corporation and the directors of it praying that an account of the financial condition of the company be had and a cash dividend declared. Complainant contended that the action of the board of directors in refusing to pay a dividend was unjustifiable and arbitrary. The case was referred to the master who took the evidence and reported that the company was in good financial condition; that its financial ability to pay a dividend was admitted, and that the refusal of the directors to a declare a reasonable dividend was arbitrary, unjustifiable, and a denial of the right of minority stockholders to share in the profits of the company.

He recommended that a decree be entered as prayed for requiring the payment of a 10 per cent cash dividend. The findings and recommendations of the master were approved by the chancellor and a decree entered accordingly, to reverse which the corporation and two of the directors prosecute this appeal.

The record discloses that defendant company was incorporated January, 1883, with a capital stock of $100,000, divided into 1,000 shares of the par value of $100 each. The object of the corporation was to manufacture rigging, sails, canvas goods and other merchandise usually dealt in by ship chandlers; that in April, 1913, the capital stock was increased to $1,000,000, divided into 10,000 shares of the par value of $100 each; that from the time of the incorporation of the company down to the present it has been engaged in the business for which it was incorporated. The stock of the company is substantially all held by the Channon family as follows: Henry Channon, the father, 5,400 shares; Elizabeth Channon, his wife, 819 shares; the complainant, Harry Channon, a son, 981 shares; James H. Channon, a son 781 shares; Mrs. Grace C. Bortell, a daughter, 819 shares. John L. Hanley, the secretary of the company, owns 50 shares. Employees of the company own 310 shares, and 840 shares are in the treasury of the company unissued. It appears that the business was founded by the father and that he has always been the dominating factor of it although at the time of the hearing he was about 82 years old. He is president, treasurer and a director of the company. John L. Hanley is the secretary and also a director. James H. Channon is the other director. Cash dividends have been declared and paid as follows: 1911, 10 per cent; 1912, 15 per cent; 1913, 4 per cent; 1914, 2 per cent, making a total of $85,000 paid in dividends. On January 15, 1917, a meeting of the board of directors was held. James H. Channon moved that a dividend be declared at such rate as the directors should consider reasonable. The motion was defeated without any discussion by the votes of Henry Channon and Hanley, the secretary. On February 6 following the bill was filed.

There is no dispute as to the financial standing of the company as shown by the balance sheet of January 1, 1917, from which it appears that the company had on that date in cash, $151,287.81. The company owns real estate valued at $113,769.38. In the statement there is shown a reserve of $75,000 for depreciation of stock on hand, and also a reserve of $100,000 for a building fund; that the net sales for the year 1916 amounted to $2,115,573.49, and the net profits for that year were $341,215.85. On December 31, 1916, the company had on hand merchandise valued at $526,497.45; that it owed current bills amounting to $66,626, and also $41,227.24 to Henry Channon, which he had left in the company's treasury for several years and for which he was paid interest. The evidence tended to show that there was a turnover of the merchandise two or three times per year; that there was no justification for the $75,000 reserve for depreciation; that such reserve had never been made before and instead of any decrease in the value of the goods on hand, they had increased and would continue to increase in value. In reference to the $100,000 reserve for the building fund, the court found that while there had been some talk of procuring a new site nothing had been done in this regard for the past 3 or 4 years. The evidence also tends to show that the real estate held by the firm, although in the name of Henry Channon, had been so held for a number of years contrary to the statute of this State, and that it could be sold for $100,000.

It is the theory of the complainant that the reserve of $75,000 for depreciation of the stock on hand, and of $100,000 for a building fund was simply a subterfuge to avoid the payment of a dividend. There is evidence that the father, Henry Channon, who dominated the conduct of the business, had stated that he would never declare any further dividend while he lived, and that Hanley, a director, was completely dominated and controlled by him. Defendant's position is that the question whether a dividend should be declared rests in the discretion of the board of directors, and in the absence of proof of fraud or breach of trust a court of equity is without power to decree the payment of a dividend. As a general proposition, the action of the board of directors in refusing to declare a dividend is final, and such discretion will not be interfered with by a court of equity in the absence of bad faith or arbitrary or unjustifiable conduct. Cratty v. Peoria Law Library Ass'n, 219 Ill. 516, 76 N.E. 707. But the power of a court of equity to order the directors of a trading corporation to declare and pay a dividend from the unused profits when they have improperly refused to do so is undoubted. Laurel Springs Land Co. v. Fougeray, 50 N.J.Eq. 756, 26 C. 886; Scott v. Eagle Fire Ins. Co., 7 Paige (N.Y.) 198; Morawetz on Corporations (2nd Ed.), sec. 447; 2 Clark & Marshall on Corporations, sec. 517; 6 Fletcher's Cyclopedia of Corporations, sec. 3656. A trading corporation is organized and carried on primarily for the profit of the stockholders and it would be a strange rule indeed if the board of directors could arbitrarily refuse to pay dividends when the financial condition of the company would warrant it. In the instant case there is outstanding 9,160 shares of stock of the par value of $916,000, 10 per cent of which is $91,600. Upon a consideration of the entire record we find that it is undisputed that the company was transacting a large and lucrative business. There is no dispute that it was amply able to pay the dividend decreed without in any way impairing its financial condition. We think the refusal of the board of directors to declare and pay a dividend was unjustifiable and arbitrary. In these circumstances a court of equity may intervene to compel the directors to declare and pay a dividend as was done in the instant case.

The decree of the superior court of Cook county is affirmed.

NOTE

Equity will order corporate directors to pay accrued dividends on cumulative preferred shares where they have abused their discretion in refusing to declare annual dividends. O'Neall v. O'Neall, 108 Ind.App. 116, 25 N.E.2d 656, 1940, 28 Geo. L.J. 1135, 15 Ind.L.J. 575.

2. EFFECT OF DECLARATION; REVOCABILITY

KING v. PATERSON & H. R. R. CO.

Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, 1861. 29 N.J.L. 504.

THE CHANCELLOR. The action is brought to recover the amount of two dividends, declared in January and July, 1857, upon two hundred shares of the capital stock of the corporation owned by the plaintiffs. The dividends were made payable at the branch office of the Ohio Life Insurance and Trust Company, in the city of New York, the trust company being appointed registers of the railroad company to transfer stock and to pay dividends. Notice of the dividends and of the time and place of payment was published in a newspaper printed and published in the city of New York. The money to pay the dividends was deposited by the defendants in the office of the trust company, before the day of payment of each of said dividends, ready to be paid to the plaintiffs on their application. The money was left in the hands of the trust company until the 24th of August, 1857, when the company failed, and the money was lost.

After a dividend is declared, all community of interest in relation to such dividend, as between the stockholders themselves and between the stockholders and the corporation, is at an end. The right of a party to whom the dividend is payable is recognized as a separate and independent right, which may be enforced as against the corporation. Davis v. Bank of England, 5 Barn. & Cress. 185; Coles v. Bank of England, 10 Ad. & E. 437; Carlisle v. South Eastern Railway Co., 6 English Rail. Cas. 685; 1 Shelf. on Rail. 205. * * *

The true principle is, that the dividend, from the time that it is declared, becomes a debt due from the corporation to the individual stockholder, for the recovery of which, after demand of payment, an action at law may be maintained. State v. Baltimore & Ohio Railway, 6 Gill., Md., 363; Philadelphia, Wil. & Balt. Railway v. Cowell, 28 Pa. 329, 70 Am.Dec. 128; Ohio City v. Cleveland & Toledo Railway, 6 Ohio St. 489.

Like any other debt, it may be set off against the debt of the stockholder to the corporation. Bates v. New York Insurance Co., 3 Johns. Cas., N.Y., 238; Rogers v. Huntingdon Bank, 12 Serg. & R., Pa., 77.

It may be, by banking corporations, sometimes carried to the general account of the stockholder with the corporation, and is thus applied in adjusting balances between the parties or in satisfying the claims of the corporation against the stockholder. They thus act in the character not of trustees, but of debtors. The fund is dealt with not as a trust fund, but as money due. And why should it not be so regarded? What principle is violated? Does not sound policy require that the relation between the stockholder and the corporation in relation to the dividend should be simply that of debtor and creditor; that the stockholder should have his remedy at law, and that the corporation should be permitted to apply it by way of set-off to satisfy demands against the stockholder? * * *

The debt is strictly demandable and to be paid at the office of the corporation. Admitting the right of the corporation to make it payable elsewhere, it must be done at the risk of the corporation. The debtor has no right, without the consent of the creditor, express or implied, to intrust a third party with the fund for the purposes of payment. The trust company with whom the funds were deposited for payment was the agent of the corporation, not of the stockholders; of the debtor, not of the creditor. If the agent prove faithless, or the fund is lost in his hands, the loss must fall upon the owner. The deposit was made in the name of the corporation, and was subject to their control. There is nothing in the special verdict that shows a consent, express or implied, on the part of the plaintiffs to their funds being intrusted to, or deposited with, the Ohio Life and Trust Company.

Strong considerations in support of this conclusion may, perhaps, as was urged upon the argument, be derived from the peculiar provisions of the charter of the railroad company, as well as from the policy of the law, which would deny to a corporation within this state the right to deposit moneys due to its creditors in the hands of a foreign corporation. But the decision is designedly based upon the sole ground, that after a dividend is declared, it becomes a debt due from the corporation to the stockholder as an individual, and that the selection of an agent for the payment of that debt by the debtor without the concurrence of the creditor must be at the risk of the debtor alone. The fund remains the property of the corporation until payment is made. If a loss is sustained, it falls upon the owner.

The judgment must be affirmed.

NOTE

A debtor-creditor relation exists between a corporation and its stockholders after a dividend is declared, and the stockholder may maintain an action at law to recover the sum due any time after the date is fixed for the payment of each dividend. The Statute of Limitations begins to run against such action from the time the dividend becomes payable. Jacques and Stoddard v. White Knob Copper & Development Co., Ltd., 260 App.Div. 640, 23 N.Y.S.2d 326, 1st Dep't., 1940

STAATS v. BIOGRAPH CO.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Second Circuit, 1916.
236 F. 454, L.R.A.1917B, 728.

In Error to District Court of United States for Southern District of New York.

Action at law by Richard H. Staats against the Biograph Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The defendant is a corporation organized in 1895 pursuant to the laws of the state of New Jersey. It has an authorized capital of $2,000,000, and of this amount $1,000,000 is outstanding, and is engaged in the moving picture business.

The plaintiff is a citizen of the state of New York and is the record owner of 550 shares of the par value of $55,000 of the stock of the defendant company, and has been since prior to January 1, 1913.

On December 28, 1914, the board of directors of defendant declared a dividend of 50 per cent. on its outstanding capital stock, payable February 1, 1915, to the stockholders of record of January 18, 1915. The dividend as declared was payable February 1, 1915. It was to be paid in registered scrip certificates containing upon their face an agreement by the defendant that they might be converted on or before December 21, 1916, at par, without interest, wholly or partly in cash, wholly or partly at par, or wholly or partly in such form of interest-bearing obligation as might be deemed by the directors to the best interests of the company. Announcement of this action was made in a circular to the stockholders, dated December 28, 1914.

Without authorization from the stockholders and on August 10, 1915, and without the plaintiff's consent, the directors passed a resolution rescinding the declaration of the dividend previously declared, and this action was announced in a circular to the stockholders dated August 26, 1915.

On September 14, 1915, the plaintiff made a demand on the defendant for the delivery of the registered scrip certificates which he claimed pursuant to the Resolution of December 28, 1914. The demand was not complied with, and this action is brought to recover $27,500; that being the face amount of the scrip certificates which were issuable to him in respect of the $55,000 par value of the stock held by him. At the close of the trial of the action a motion was made to dismiss the complaint. That motion was denied. Both sides asked the court to direct a verdict, and a verdict was directed for the defendant; an exception being reserved for the plaintiff.

ROGERS, CIRCUIT JUDGE (after stating the facts as above). The question involved herein concerns the power of a board of directors of a corporation to rescind a resolution declaring a scrip dividend, after the resolution declaring the dividend has been announced, and notwithstanding the existence of a surplus at the time of the adoption of both resolutions.

It is conceded that no dispute as to the facts exists. The decision below was limited by its terms to a decision against the plaintiff on questions of law alone.

Prior to 1913 the defendant company had paid cash dividends at the rate of 12 per cent. annually; but on February 28, 1913, the directors decided to reduce the rate to 6 per cent. annually.

The company had purchased land in the Bronx borough in New York City, upon which it proposed to construct a new plant. The reduction in the dividend was for the purpose of facilitating the completion and equipment of this new plant. On December 31, 1912, the company had a surplus of $831,149 after deducting a reserve for depreciation. All of this surplus was profit earned by the company in excess of dividends paid to the stockholders. The balance sheet of the company on June 30, 1915, shows that there was on that day a profit and loss surplus of $1,010,169.83. The evidence shows that at the end of every month during the year of 1915 the surplus always was in excess of $1,000,000. Nevertheless on August 10, 1915, the board adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, that the action taken at the meeting of the board of directors held December 28, 1914, declaring a scrip dividend of fifty (50) per cent., be and the same is hereby rescinded."

It is not claimed that the corporation had between the time of the declaration of the dividend and its rescission suffered any unforeseen or material loss. All the surplus which existed when the resolution declaring the 50 per cent. scrip dividend was passed still existed when the revoking resolution was adopted and in fact at the time the latter resolution was passed the surplus had been somewhat increased above what it was when the original declaration was made, and at no time since has it fallen below $1,000,000.

But it appears that intermediate to the passage of the resolution declaring the dividend, December 28, 1914, and its rescission, August 10, 1915, the business of the company was seriously affected by the European War. Conditions had so changed that the officers of the company voluntarily consented that their salaries should be reduced. On his own request the president's expense allowance of $7,500 per annum was discontinued, and his salary, which had been $18,750 a year, was reduced to $15,000. The company had to borrow cash from its directors to meet its needs. The operating expenses of the company were about $50,000 a week. A few days prior to the adoption of the rescinding resolution, it borrowed from its president $27,000, who with others accepted the notes of the company unsecured by any collateral. * * *

This seems to be an attempt on the part of a single stockholder to dictate to a directorate and to compel it against its will and honest judgment to pay a dividend to him in cash or stock. The general rule is well established that, when a corporation has a surplus, whether a dividend shall be made rests in the fair and honest discretion of the directors, uncontrollable by the courts. Williams v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 93 N.Y. 162; Gibbons v. Mahon, 136 U.S. 549, 565, 10 S.Ct. 1057, 34 L.Ed. 525, 1890.

There have been numerous attempts to induce courts to interfere with directors in the exercise of their discretion, but they have quite uniformly refused to do so, unless it appeared that the directors had wilfully abused their discretion and acted in bad faith and in neglect of duty. It takes a very strong case to induce a court to order directors to declare a dividend. A court has no jurisdiction to do so unless fraud or a breach of trust is involved. Cook on Corporations, 7th Ed., vol. 2, § 545, p. 1588.

In the case at bar there is nothing to lead us to doubt the perfect honesty and good faith of this board of directors, and the soundness of their judgment in this matter. But this plaintiff is not in this court asking us to compel the board of directors to declare a dividend. He is here, he asserts, because the board has declared the dividend and announced it, and then recalled its action and rescinded the vote.

In proper cases courts protect minorities, even minorities of one against the oppression of the majority of stockholders and of boards of directors. It sometimes happens, however, that a minority institute "strike" suits and seek to oppress majorities and to involve the corporation itself in disaster for purposes of their own and for reasons not always revealed. So that there are cases in which courts are compelled to protect minorities against majorities and majorities against minorities.

In this case it does not escape observation that the plaintiff's right to a stock dividend, if he has such a right and can enforce it, would gain him nothing. We say it would gain him nothing, because while a stock dividend would increase the number of his shares, it proportionately diminishes the value of each of his shares, leaving the aggregate value as it was before. He acquires the ownership of more shares, but he adds nothing to his proportionate ownership of the assets of the corporation. Green v. Bissell, 79 Conn. 547, 555, 65 A. 1056, 8 L.R.A.,N.S., 1101, 118 Am.St.Rep. 156, 9 Ann.Cas. 287, 1907. What he expects through this suit is not the stock but the cash value of the stock. But the question which this court must pass upon, whatever the consequences in this particular case may be, is whether a board of directors, having declared the dividend in the form already stated, had the power to rescind its action.

We may, however, remark in passing that while it might be very disastrous to the welfare of the defendant, under the circumstances in which it now finds itself, if any large number of its stockholders could come into a court of law as this plaintiff has done and enforce the demand that they receive the value of the stock dividend as declared, yet the corporation might easily have avoided any such situation. For we confess our inability to see how the corporation or its stockholders could in the least degree have been prejudiced if the scrip dividend had been issued as originally voted, and the corporation had then elected to pay it in stock. The property of the corporation would not have been impaired in the slightest extent.

The right to reconsider the declaration of a dividend would seem to depend upon the circumstances under which the dividend was declared, as well as upon the character of the dividend itself.

1. If a board of directors, for example, should declare a dividend, and, before any public announcement of the action has been made, should reconsider the vote and rescind the action, its right to do so, perhaps, could not successfully be challenged.

2. If a board of directors should declare a dividend when there are at the time the declaration is made no profits to divide, and if public announcement of the declaration of the dividend should be made, it may be that the right to reconsider and rescind would not be denied. Until such a dividend is paid there would seem to be a locus poenitentiae, and the directors might recall their ultra vires act. They would not be under any obligation to consummate an illegal act which is merely in fieri. Thompson on Corporations, vol. 2, § 2135.

3. But if a board of directors should declare a cash dividend and make a public announcement of the fact, the courts have held that thereafter the board has no right to reconsider and rescind its action. The reason seems to be that the declaration of the dividend sets apart from the profits of the corporation a sum which is to be paid to the stockholders in proportion to their shares, and that it creates a debt due from the corporation to each shareholder, resulting in the relation of debtor and creditor. A dividend divides the property which belongs to the corporation into that which the corporation retains and that which the corporation agrees to pay to the stockholders, and which it is thereby bound to pay. That which one person is bound to pay to another is a debt. Lockhart v. Van Alstyne, 31 Mich. 76, 78, 18 Am.Rep. 156, 1875. Such a dividend cannot be rescinded because a debtor does not have it within his power to "rescind" his debt. Beers v. Bridgeport Spring Co., 42 Conn. 17, 1875; King v. Paterson & H. L. R. Co., 29 N.J.L. 82, 87, 1860; Ford v. Easthampton Rubber Thread Co., 158 Mass. 84, 32 N.E. 1036, 20 L.R.A. 65, 35 Am.St.Rep. 462, 1893; Cook on Corporation, 7th Ed., vol. 2, § 541, p. 1580. And sometimes the corporation becomes not merely a debtor, but is a trustee, as where the corporation has not only declared a dividend, but has deposited a fund out of which the dividends are to be paid. LeRoy v. Globe Insurance Co., 2 Edw.Ch., N.Y., 657, 1836; Van Dyck v. McQuade, 86 N.Y. 38, 52, 1881. A trust relation, having been established, cannot be terminated at the pleasure of the board of directors by a vote rescinding its former action.

In Taylor on Corporations, 5th Ed., § 568, it is said that:

"The discretion of the corporate management is exhausted in declaring the dividend; thereupon their only function is to pay it to the stockholders."

So in Machen on Modern Law of Corporations, vol. 2, § 1358, that writer says:

"As a dividend when declared becomes a debt of the company, it follows that a dividend once properly declared, cannot be revoked."

Morawetz, in his book on Corporations, volume 1, § 445, says that:

"A dividend properly declared by the directors of a corporation cannot subsequently be revoked; those persons who were shareholders on the books of the company at the time when the dividend was declared have a legal claim against the company for the payment of the amount of the dividend."

And in Marshall on Corporations, § 283, it is said:

"Since the right of the stockholders of a corporation to a dividend becomes vested as soon as the dividend has been fully declared by the directors, and the corporation becomes their debtor for their respective shares, it follows that neither the same board of directors nor their successors can afterwards reconsider their action and revoke the declaration without the stockholders' consent."

4. A difference seems to exist between a cash dividend and a stock dividend, so that, if a board of directors declare a stock dividend, the authorities appear to recognize the right of the board subsequently to rescind its action at any time prior to the actual issuance of the stock.

The leading case on the subject is that of Terry v. Eagle Lock Co., 47 Conn. 141, 1879. It appears in that case that at a meeting of stockholders of the defendant company held on August 5, 1875, it was voted to increase the capital stock 2,000 shares, and that the said increase be out of the surplus earnings of the company. It was at the same time voted that the directors be authorized and directed to cause the stock to be issued to the present stockholders pro rata. On August 18, 1875, a specially called stockholders' meeting was held, and a vote was passed rescinding the vote of August 5th increasing the capital stock. The plaintiff stockholder who had not been present at the meeting at which the former vote was rescinded asked to have his pro rata share of the increase issued to him, or the value thereof paid to him, claiming that by the first vote he had a vested right of which he could not be deprived by the subsequent rescission. The court, in referring to the alternative prayer in the plaintiff's petition asking for a proportionate part of the supposed increase of stock or the cash value of his proportion of the increase, declared it very clear that the alternative prayer ought not to be granted, as it would in effect be making it a cash dividend, something "the company never intended. It would withdraw from the working funds of the company that amount which would not have been the result had the stock dividend been carried into effect. It is in effect asking the court to make a dividend instead of enforcing one made by the company." The Connecticut court denied, also, the stockholders' right to compel the company to issue the stock certificates, and it clearly pointed out the difference existing between a cash and a stock dividend. In the course of its opinion the court said:

"There is a difference, however, between a cash and a stock dividend. The former is created by a simple vote of the directors, and the amount thereby becomes severed from the general fund and belongs to the stockholders pro rata. The latter can be initiated only by a vote of the stockholders. That is followed by issuing the stock, and the increase can only be completed legally by filing with the town clerk and with the secretary of the state the certificates required by law. Suppose the vote had been to increase, not from the surplus earnings, but by a sale of the newly created stock. In such a case, it cannot be said that the capital is actually increased until the new stock is subscribed for at least. Until then there is an element of uncertainty about it. It may never be taken. It is very clear that the vote to increase is not per se an increase. Nor is it such where the increase contemplated is from the surplus earnings.

"Again, a cash dividend entitles the stockholder to so much money, the ordinary way in which he receives from time to time the fruits of his investment. Such dividends do not materially affect the value of the stock. A stock dividend is exceptional. It does not add to his ready cash, but it changes the form of his investment by increasing his number of shares thereby diminishing the value of each share, leaving the aggregate value of all his stock substantially the same. It is of no special importance whether that value be divided into few or many shares.

"These differences are somewhat material, and serve to show that the petitioner's right, if he has such a right, to an increase of the number of his shares, was at the time a mere nominal right, and one which possessed no appreciable pecuniary value. It is at least doubtful whether a court of equity will in any case aid in enforcing such a right. But however this may be, there are other reasons of a pretty substantial character why the prayer of the petition should not be granted.

"The petitioner's right, as we have seen, was a mere naked right which he might waive without losing anything, and might enforce, if it could be enforced, without gaining anything. It became a mere question of expediency—shall the surplus be actually converted into capital, or remain surplus and be used as capital? The corporation chose the latter; and the petitioner, having nothing to gain or lose in either case, acquiesced in that decision."

In Dock v. Schlichter Jute Cordage Co., 167 Pa. 370, 379, 31 A. 656, 1895, a stock dividend was declared on July 16, 1890, and on March 16, 1891, it was rescinded. The court held that a resolution adopted by the directors of a corporation distributing among the shareholders shares of stock of the company which had been purchased by the company out of its earnings cannot be subsequently rescinded where it is not shown that such distribution would be injurious to the business of the company. It was said that if, upon the declaration of a dividend, the company deposited the moneys to pay the dividends with a banker and drew its check to the order of each entitled on the fund so deposited, or in the case of a stock dividend if the company executed its power of attorney to transfer the shares and these awaited delivery, the stockholders' right would be a vested one which could not be taken from him by a rescinding vote of the directors. Then followed this statement:

"It is believed that, when there has been no such appropriation as that above mentioned, a company by its board of directors in a proper case and for cause may rescind a resolution declaring a dividend; as where owing to destruction of a plant by fire immediately following such resolution. If in the business and honest judgment of the board the earnings intended to be distributed should be recalled and used for the restoration of the destroyed property, it would be within its power to so deal with them; but, unless some similar thing appear, the declaration of a dividend of earnings is the announcement of an obligation due each shareholder for which proceedings may be had as legal methods indicate, and the burden of manifesting that the debt or obligation is not due after such a declaration is upon the company."

In the above case the court wrote no opinion, but affirmed "on the clear, concise and convincing report of the master."

In Billingham v. E. P. Gleason Mfg. Co., 101 App.Div. 476, 91 N.Y.S. 1046, the directors passed a resolution providing for a regular cash dividend and for a scrip dividend. The scrip certificates were issued, and the court held that they constituted an indebtedness. An action was brought on one of them against the company, and the court held the action maintainable, and in speaking of the certificates the court said:

"It was so much set apart and reserved for him as undivided earnings. His share was ascertained and his right to it was fixed. It was a divided share of past earnings, and, as we think, became a severed indebtedness of the company, for nothing is better understood than that a dividend when declared is a debt due absolutely to the stockholders."

In the case at bar the scrip certificates were never issued.

In Machen on Modern Law of Corporations, vol. 1, § 601, the law is stated as follows:

"Rescission of Stock Dividends. A stock dividend should also be distinguished from a cash dividend, in that, in the case of cash dividend, the right of the shareholder becomes indefeasible immediately upon the declaration of the dividend, and the company cannot subsequently rescind its action. In the case of a stock dividend, on the other hand, until the formalities required by law as conditions precedent to an increase of capital have been completed, all is in fieri, so that until then the company may revoke the dividend. The reason of this rule applies, however, only where the stock dividend involves an increase of the company's nominal capital, and therefore a dividend payable in shares which had been purchased by the company should be in this respect assimilated to a cash dividend and is irrevocable."

It is undoubtedly true that directors may repeal any previous resolution or rescind any previous action unless repeal or rescission would involve a breach of contract or disturb a vested right. The resolution originally adopted by the directors certainly created no debt. The declaration was not to pay a cash dividend absolutely, for the directors had an option which they reserved as to whether they would or would not pay in cash. The distinguishing and necessary feature of a "debt" is that a fixed and specific amount is owing by a certain and express agreement, and that does not exist under the circumstances we find in this case. The directors did not bind themselves to pay a cash dividend absolutely, and in all events, and if they should ultimately elect to pay in cash, they were left free to determine how much should be in cash and how much should be in stock. And as to the declaration as to the stock dividend it should be said that the whole matter rested in fieri, and, not having become obligatory, was subject to repeal. * * *

Decree affirmed.[6]

---

[6] On the revocability of declared dividends, see Notes, 1916, 16 Col.L.Rev. 599; 1917, 15 Mich.L.Rev. 432; 1930, 28 Mich.L.Rev. 914; 1917, 26 Yale L.J. 598. See Note, 1930, 39 Yale L.J. 1163, 1166–1172, on the revocability of a stock dividend.

In Re ASSOCIATED GAS & ELECTRIC COMPANY. CLARKE v. NEW YORK TRUST COMPANY et al.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Second Circuit, 1943.
137 F.2d 607.

Proceedings in the matter of the reorganization of the Associated Gas & Electric Company, debtor, under § 101 et seq. of the Bankruptcy Act, 11 U.S.C.A. § 501 et seq. On petition of Stanley Clarke, trustee of the debtor, for determination of status of certain funds claimed by him to be general assets of debtor's estate, opposed by New York Trust Company, as trustee, and others. From parts of an order holding funds to be trust funds for special classes of creditors, debtor's trustee appeals.

Order modified.

SWAN, CIRCUIT JUDGE. Associated Gas and Electric Company, hereafter called the Company, filed a voluntary petition for reorganization on January 10, 1940. On that date there existed undisbursed balances of funds which the Company had previously transmitted to Transfer and Paying Agency (called Trapa), Irving Trust Company and Chase National Bank, respectively, to be used to pay obligations of the Company maturing before January 10, 1940. The trustee in reorganization claims these balances as general assets of the company's estate and has appealed from portions of an order of the district court holding them to be trust funds for the benefit of the holders of matured but uncollected securities, interest coupons and checks payable before January 10, 1940. * * *

The third fund involved in this appeal is a balance of $17,910.17 in an account in the Chase National Bank entitled "Associated Gas and Electric Company, Dividend Account No. 1." No claimant, other than the trustee in reorganization, to any part of this fund appeared in the district court or in this court. This is readily understandable when it is noted that the number of checks outstanding against the account is 5,175, of which only 111 call for $25 or more; these 111 checks total $5,689.56. The account was opened in April 1927. Checks drawn upon it were signed by the Company's officers. It was the Company's practice at times to withdraw from the account an amount representing uncashed checks outstanding for six months or more and to deposit such withdrawals in the Company's general bank account. When old checks were later presented, sums were deposited to replenish the account to that extent. Millions of dollars passed through the account but by August 1932 it had become inactive and had a balance of less than $400. On October 31, 1934, while an involuntary 77B proceeding, 11 U.S.C.A. § 207, was pending, the Company deposited in the account the sum of $21,157.03, which was the balance shown by its books in the "Reserve for unpaid dividend and interest checks." Later, in March 1935, a list of outstanding unpaid checks was prepared and the balance in the account was adjusted to equal the total of such list, namely, $21,334.17. The list proved not to be complete; unlisted checks were presented from time to time and were paid from the account. The district court's opinion states that practically all the money in the account represents outstanding checks for dividends on capital stock, either of the Company or its subsidiaries. By a supplemental finding the court found that some of the outstanding checks on the account are for interest while others are for dividends and that the proportion of the deposits and of the outstanding checks that is for interest and the proportion that is for dividends is unknown.

Where a corporation has not only declared a dividend but has specifically set apart from its other assets a fund out of which the dividend is to be paid, such fund is held in trust for stockholders entitled to the dividend. In re Interborough Consol. Corporation, 2 Cir., 288 F. 334, 341, certiorari denied sub nom. Porges v. Sheffield, 262 U.S. 752, 43 S.Ct. 700, 67 L.Ed. 1215; Staats v. Biograph Co., 2 Cir., 236 F. 454, 458, L.R.A.1917B, 728; In re Interborough Consol. Corporation, D.C.S.D.N.Y., 267 F. 914, 919. While the question is not free from doubt, we believe that the October 1934 deposit falls within this rule to the extent that dividend checks may be presented for payment out of the fund, notwithstanding the intermingling of interest and dividend checks in determining the amount of the deposit. Affirmance of the order in this respect will doubtless have little significance in actual dollars since holders of the checks are by the terms of the order to be barred unless their claims are presented by a date to be fixed by further order of the court, and such portion of the $17,910.17 as is not paid on dividend checks will become general assets of the Company.

The cause is remanded for modification of the order in conformity with this opinion.

MEYERS v. EL TEJON OIL & REFINING COMPANY.

Supreme Court of California, 1946. 174 P.2d 1.

Action by Walter J. Meyers against El Tejon Oil and Refining Company on a promissory note. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendant appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

TRAYNOR, JUSTICE. On March 15, 1940, a dividend was declared upon defendant's common stock at a special meeting of defendant's board of directors attended by only four of its seven directors. No notice of the meeting was given to the directors as required by section 307a of the Civil Code, nor did the absent directors sign a waiver of notice or a consent to the meeting or an approval of its minutes as required by section 307b of the Civil Code. Plaintiff who was then vice-president of the corporation as well as one of its directors was present at the meeting. The dividend was paid in cash to all holders of common stock, but the seven directors who were also holders of such stock, immediately returned their dividends to the corporation and received in exchange promissory notes in amounts equal to their respective dividends. Only one of the seven notes has been paid. The present action was brought on April 14, 1944, to recover upon the one given plaintiff. The trial court found "that any irregularity in the declaration of the dividend of March 15, 1940, has been ratified and confirmed by [defendant] corporation" and entered judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

Defendant contends that since the authority to declare a dividend is vested in the board of directors (Civ.Code, §§ 305, 363) and since the directors can pass a valid resolution only if the board is duly assembled for the purpose of transacting corporate business (Civ.Code, § 307; Pauly v. Pauly, 107 Cal. 8, 18, 40 P. 29, 48 Am.St.Rep. 98; Hotaling v. Hotaling, 193 Cal. 368, 377, 224 P. 455, 56 A.L.R. 734; Curtin v. Salmon River, etc., Co., 130 Cal. 345, 350, 62 P. 552, 80 Am.St.Rep. 132; see 6A Cal.Jur. 1097), the declaration of the dividend was invalid, and that therefore the corporation issued the note to plaintiff without consideration. A resolution of the board of directors declaring a dividend, even though it is unlawful in its inception for lack of a duly held meeting, can be ratified by the board of directors, and such ratification does not require the holding of a regular meeting of the board or the passing of a resolution declaring the ratification. Brown v. Crown Gold Milling Co., 150 Cal. 376, 387, 89 P. 86; Scott v. Superior Sunset Oil Co., 144 Cal. 140, 143, 77 P. 817; Hibernia Sav. & Loan Soc. v. Belcher, 4 Cal.2d 268, 276, 48 P.2d 681; see 6A Cal.Jur. 1181; 19 C.J.S., Corporations, §§ 1018-1024, pp. 495-507; 11 Fletcher, Corporation, § 5351. "Anything from which it may be clearly found * * * that the board as a board had agreed that the void act should be binding will suffice." Milligan v. G. D. Milligan Grocer Co., 207 Mo.App. 472, 233 S.W. 506, 510. Thus, in Hibernia Savings & Loan Soc. v. Belcher, 4 Cal.2d 268, 275, 48 P.2d 681, it was held that if authority to make the assignment there involved was vested only in the board of directors, the subsequent acquiescence of an absent director in the assignment made at a special meeting attended by only two of the three directors of the corporation constituted an implied ratification of the assignment. In the present case the record discloses that each director returned the cash payment and accepted in exchange a note similar to the one given plaintiff; that all of these notes were carried as notes payable upon subsequent financial statements of the corporation; and that one of them has since been paid. This evidence supports the finding of the trial court that the irregularity of the resolution declaring the dividend was cured by subsequent ratification of the dividend. In Milligan v. G. D. Milligan Grocer Co., supra, a dividend declared at an invalid meeting of the board of directors was held to be ratified under similar circumstances. The court stated that "the fact that the dividend was credited on the books of the corporation to the individual stockholders immediately after it was purported to be declared, and had been permitted to so remain for about 18 months before this suit was brought, and that in the meantime at least one regular meeting of the board was held and no order made of record disaffirming * * the dividend, * * * is sufficient to [support] a finding [of ratification]." 233 S.W. at page 510. Since a ratification has retroactive effect (see 19 C.J.S., Corporations, § 1023, p. 505) the dividend must be regarded as authorized by the board of directors as of the time when it was declared, and thus, plaintiff did not acquire the note without consideration.

Defendant applied for the admission of additional evidence under section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure that since the issuance of the note in 1940, defendant defaulted on the payment on dividends on its preferred stock, that the last dividend on that stock was paid in January, 1942, and that therefore the corporation by paying the note would violate its articles of incorporation, which provide that the dividends on the preferred stock are cumulative and payable before any dividends on the common stock are paid. It is immaterial, however, whether the corporation became delinquent on its preferred stock years after the dividend on the common stock was declared. Each holder of common stock acquired a vested right to the payment of the dividend, which cannot be defeated by later revocation of the dividend without his consent. Smith v. Taecker, 133 Cal.App. 351, 352, 24 P.2d 182; see Ballantine, Private Corporations, 502, 504, and cases there cited. Under these circumstances it is unnecessary to determine whether the taking of additional evidence would otherwise be proper.

Defendant also contends that the dividend was not declared out of surplus or net profits as required by section 346 of the Civil Code. Defendant's answer to the complaint did not raise this issue, and at the trial defendant limited its defense to the issue that the dividend was declared at a meeting of the board of directors that was not properly held. When the trial judge stated at the trial: "I have looked over the answer. The only defense seems to be that it was a dividend that was not properly declared," counsel for defendant declared, "Our defense is that there was no legal meeting at which the dividend was declared." The issue whether defendant had sufficient surplus or net profits to declare a dividend is entirely different from the issue whether the board of directors had properly authorized the dividend, and cannot first be raised on appeal. Even in a complaint of a shareholder seeking the payment of a dividend declared by the corporation the plaintiff need not allege that the corporation had the necessary surplus or profits. Any issue as to the availability of the surplus or profit required for the declaration of a dividend must be raised by the corporation. See 11 Fletcher, Corporations, § 5365; Federal Mining & Smelting Co. v. Wittenberg, 15 Del.Ch. 409, 138 A. 347, 55 A.L.R. 8, 145; City Bank Farmers' Trust Co. v. Hewitt Realty Co., 257 N.Y. 62, 177 N.E. 309, 76 A.L.R. 885, 896; Bates v. Brooks, 222 Iowa 1128, 270 N.W. 867, 109 A.L.R. 1381, 1400; 13 Am.Jur. 736. Moreover, the testimony of defendant's secretary, on which defendant relies, to the effect that the payment of the dividend to the directors in cash "would have run our working capital a little short at that time" falls short of establishing that defendant lacked the required surplus or net profits. Furthermore, section 364 of the Civil Code, as it read when the dividend was paid to plaintiff and when he exchanged it for the note sued upon, provided that a corporation could recover an illegally paid dividend only if it had been declared insolvent or bankrupt. Since defendant could not recover the dividend that plaintiff exchanged for the note, the dividend was consideration for the note, even if it be assumed that the dividend was declared in violation of section 346.

The judgment is affirmed.

3. FUNDS FROM WHICH DIVIDENDS MAY BE PAID

(a) Cash Dividends

VERNER v. GENERAL & COMMERCIAL INVESTMENT TRUST.

Court of Appeal. [1894] 2 Ch. 239.

[The General & Commercial Investment Trust, a limited company, was formed in 1888 to invest in securities;[7] the income from these investments to be paid out as dividends to the stockholders. At the end of the fiscal year 1894 the company's investments had declined by at least £250,000.

A director, on behalf of himself and other stockholders, brought suit against the company and its directors to restrain the declaration and payment of any dividend for the year ending February 28, 1894. Injunction denied, and plaintiff appeals.]

LINDLEY, L. J. The judgment I am about to deliver is the joint judgment of the Lord Justice A. L. Smith and myself.

The broad question raised by this appeal is, whether a limited company which has lost part of its capital can lawfully declare or pay a dividend without first making good the capital which has been lost. I have no doubt it can—that is to say, there is no law which prevents it in all cases and under all circumstances. Such a proceeding may sometimes be very imprudent; but a proceeding may be perfectly legal and may yet be opposed to sound commercial principles. We, however, have only to consider the legality or illegality of what is complained of.

As was pointed out in Lee v. Neuchatel Asphalte Company, 41 Ch.D. 1, there are certain provisions in the Companies Acts relating to the capital of limited companies; but no provisions whatever as to the payment of dividends or the division of profits. Each company is left to make its own regulations as to such payment or division. The statutes do not even expressly and in plain language prohibit a payment of dividend out of capital. But the provisions as to capital, when carefully studied, are wholly inconsistent with the return of capital to the shareholders, whether in the shape of dividends or otherwise, except, of course, on a winding-up, and there can, in my opinion, be no doubt that even if a memorandum of association contained a provision for paying dividends out of capital such provision would be invalid. The fact is that the main condition of limited liability is that the capital of a limited company shall be applied for the purposes for which the company is formed, and that to return the capital to the shareholders either in the shape of dividend or otherwise is not such a purpose as the Legislature contemplated.

7 "Essentially, investment companies are large, liquid pools of public savings entrusted to the company management for investment in productive enterprise. Normally they invest for the yield, including capital appreciation, and not for the control of productive wealth—a feature which distinguishes them from holding companies. Shareholders are induced to purchase investment company securities by the prospect of obtaining a diversification and expert management of their investments which, as individuals, they could not afford to command. Frequently the sales and promotional literature of these companies, by stressing the necessity of providing for old age and emergencies, has analogized them to banks and insurance companies, except that they are not limited to so-called 'legal' investments. In organization and practise they have assumed an almost infinite variety of forms." Note, The Investment Company Act of 1940, 1941, 50 Yale L.J. 440, 440–441.

But there is a vast difference between paying dividends out of capital and paying dividends out of other money belonging to the company, and which is not part of the capital mentioned in the company's memorandum of association. The capital of a company is intended for use in some trade or business, and is necessarily exposed to risk of loss. As explained in Lee v. Neuchatel Asphalte Company, the capital even of a limited company is not a debt owing by it to its shareholders, and if the capital is lost, the company is under no legal obligation either to make it good, or, on that ground only, to wind up its affairs. If, therefore, the company has any assets which are not its capital within the meaning of the Companies Acts, there is no law which prohibits the division of such assets amongst the shareholders. Further, it was decided in that case, and, in my opinion, rightly decided, that a limited company formed to purchase and work a wasting property, such as a leasehold quarry, might lawfully declare and pay dividends out of the money produced by working such wasting property without setting aside part of that money to keep the capital up to its original amount.

There is no law which prevents a company from sinking its capital in the purchase or production of a money-making property or undertaking, and in dividing the money annually yielded by it, without preserving the capital sunk so as to be able to reproduce it intact either before or after the winding-up of the company.

A company may be formed upon the principle that no dividends shall be declared unless the capital is kept undiminished, or a company may contract with its creditors to keep its capital or assets up to a given value. But in the absence of some special article or contract, there is no law to this effect; and, in my opinion, for very good reasons. It would, in my judgment, be most inexpedient to lay down a hard and fast rule which would prevent a flourishing company, either not in debt or well able to pay its debts, from paying dividends so long as its capital sunk in creating the business was not represented by assets which would, if sold, reproduce in money the capital sunk. Even a sinking fund to replace lost capital by degrees is not required by law.

It is obvious that dividends cannot be paid out of capital which is lost; they can only be paid out of money which exists and can be divided. Moreover, when it is said, and said truly, that dividends are not to be paid out of capital, the word "capital" means the money subscribed pursuant to the memorandum of association, or what is represented by that money. Accretions to that capital may be realized and turned into money, which may be divided amongst the shareholders, as was decided in Lubbock v. British Bank of South America, [1892] 2 Ch. 198.

But, although there is nothing in the statutes requiring even a limited company to keep up its capital, and there is no prohibition against payment of dividends out of any other of the company's assets, it does not follow that dividends may be lawfully paid out of other assets regardless of the debts and liabilities of the company. A dividend presupposes a profit in some shape, and to divide as dividend the receipts, say, for a year, without deducting the expenses incurred in that year in producing the receipts, would be as unjustifiable in point of law as it would be reckless and blameworthy in the eyes of business men. The same observation applies to payment of dividends out of borrowed money. Further, if the income of any year arises from a consumption in that year of what may be called circulating capital, the division of such income as dividend without replacing the capital consumed in producing it will be a payment of a dividend out of capital within the meaning of the prohibition which I have endeavoured to explain.

It has been already said that dividends presuppose profits of some sort, and this is unquestionably true. But the word "profits" is by no means free from ambiguity. The law is much more accurately expressed by saying that dividends cannot be paid out of capital, than by saying that they can only be paid out of profits. The last expression leads to the inference that the capital must always be kept up and be represented by assets which, if sold, would produce it; and this is more than is required by law. Perhaps the shortest way of expressing the distinction which I am endeavouring to explain is to say that fixed capital may be sunk and lost, and yet that the excess of current receipts over current payments may be divided, but that floating or circulating capital must be kept up, as otherwise it will enter into and form part of such excess, in which case to divide such excess without deducting the capital which forms part of it will be contrary to law.

The Companies Acts do not require even limited companies to keep accounts, still less to keep them in any particular form. The only enactment on the subject is sect. 26 of the Companies Act, 1862, and Form E in the second schedule, and these relate solely to the nominal capital and calls. But, although this is so, yet, as a matter of business, accounts of some sort must be kept; and in order to shew the money so subscribed, and to shew the results of the company's trading or business, it is practically necessary to keep a capital account and what is called a profit and loss account, and as a matter of business these accounts ought to be kept as business men usually keep them. Accordingly, we find provisions for keeping such accounts in Table A in the Appendix to the Companies Act, 1862 (see articles 78-82), and in the articles of association of most, if not all, companies. But there is no law which compels limited companies in all cases to recoup losses shewn by the capital account out of the receipts shewn in the profit and loss account, although care must be taken not to treat capital as if it were profit. This is in accordance with Bolton v. Natal Land and Colonization Company, [1892] 2 Ch. 124, which is the latest reported case on the subject. Further, it is obvious that capital lost must not appear in the accounts as still existing intact. The accounts must shew the truth, and not be misleading or fraudulent.

The Acts of 1867 and of 1877 are in no way inconsistent with these observations. They provide for the reduction of the nominal capital mentioned in the memorandum of association. They do not render it obligatory on a company which has lost some of its capital to reduce the nominal amount mentioned in its memorandum. There are advantages in doing so, and the Acts were passed to enable limited companies to obtain these advantages, but there is nothing in these Acts, any more than in the Act of 1862, which prevents a company which has lost part of its capital from continuing to carry on business and declaring and paying dividends. A law forbidding this may well have been considered by the Legislature far too rigid, and in their desire to check dishonest and reckless trading Courts must be careful not to put tighter fetters on companies than the Legislature has authorized.

It follows from what has been said above that the proposed payment of dividend in this particular case cannot be restrained. Mr. Justice Stirling has, in his judgment, examined the memorandum and articles of association so fully that I do not think it necessary to examine them again. It is plain there is nothing in them which requires lost capital to be made good before dividends can be declared: on the contrary, they are so framed as to authorize the sinking of capital in the purchase of speculative stocks, funds, and securities, and the payment of dividends out of whatever interest, dividends, or other income such stocks, funds, and securities yield, although some of them are hopelessly bad, and the capital sunk in obtaining them is lost beyond recovery: (see the memorandum of association (i) and articles 84 and 85). There is no suggestion of any improper juggling with the accounts, and there is no payment of dividend out of capital. There is no insolvency, and we have not to deal with a petition to wind up. Some capital is lost, but that is all that can be truly said, and that is not enough to justify such an injunction as is sought. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

KAY, L. J.: I should be sorry if it were held that a joint stock trading company can properly estimate their profits in any way differing from that in which an individual or a partnership of individuals carrying on a similar business would do.

An ordinary trader takes a yearly account of all the capital employed in his business, allows for any loss or depreciation in value, and carries the balance to the profit and loss account from which he makes out the profit or loss of the year. In this mode a loss or depreciation of such capital affects directly the profit of the year, which is thereby diminished. But, if upon the whole capital account there is a gain, this goes to swell the year's profits.

In my opinion a joint stock trading company should do the same. The question in this case is whether the capital employed by this company in making investments is capital employed in the business for the purpose of this usual mode of taking the year's account.

If the company were formed for the purpose of buying stocks, shares, and the like to sell again, and their business was to make profit on such resale, it is obvious that any profit or loss on such transactions must be estimated in the way I have stated. But this is not their business. They buy stocks, shares, and the like, and they have power to sell and change them. But they buy as investments, and do not look to the sale as the source of their profit. They buy, we are told, all sorts of investments which nominally pay a large rate of interest—those, in short, in which a prudent man would not invest his own money, and the source of their profit is that having very large funds intrusted to them by the confiding public, they are able out of the income of these investments to pay in most years something more to their shareholders than the 3 or 4 per cent. which represents at present the utmost income that can be obtained from safe securities. The natural result of such a reckless dealing with the moneys intrusted to them has followed in this case. There has been an actual loss of invested capital to the amount of about £75,000. If the depreciation below the cost price of other investments be added to this, the loss is much greater. This company seems to have been courting the fate which has overtaken other similar companies which are now in liquidation. The company have power by their articles to form out of income a reserve fund before declaring any dividends, and if they were to do this in order to make good the loss they have sustained, the directors would be acting within their powers; so, if the capital had been increased by a rise in value of the investments, I conceive that they might have realized some part of that increase, and distributed it as dividend. The question is whether they were compellable to do either of these things.

It is argued that in the events that have happened, if they do not replace the lost capital out of income, they will in effect be paying dividends out of capital. This is only another mode of trying the same question. If they are not bound so to replace the lost capital, they may divide the whole income among the shareholders without devoting any of it to this purpose. I have not a very confident opinion in the matter, but on the whole I am not satisfied that there is any legal obligation on the directors to do this. The persons who have been so foolish as to take shares in this company seem to me, with their eyes open, to have entered upon a reckless and dangerous speculation, involving an almost certain loss and depreciation of capital. They seem to me to have authorized their trustees to make the investments which they have made. In the case of any ordinary trust it is not the right of any cestui que trust, where an authorized investment has failed, to require that it should be replaced out of the income of the remaining investments. That would be sacrificing the interest of a tenant for life to that of the remaindermen. In this company the effect would be to give the deferred shareholders a benefit out of the income of the preference shareholders. I do not think this was the intention. [His Lordship here read clause 3(i) of the memorandum of association, and clauses 84 and 85 of the article, and proceeded:—]

These provisions seem to me to mean that any income received may be divided, whether part of the capital is lost or not. At present I do not know of any law to prevent this, and it might be difficult to frame such a law without unduly interfering with the liberty of commercial proceedings. I have no sympathy whatever with those who have become shareholders in such an undertaking. The objects and the effect of the operations of such companies is to give a fictitious value to other speculations as unsound as their own, by keeping up the market price of the stocks and shares in which it is their business to invest, and the sooner it is generally understood what the probable result of such transactions may be, the better it will be for the commercial and investing classes in general.[8]

RANDALL v. BAILEY et al.

Supreme Court of New York, 1940. 23 N.Y.S.2d 173.

Action by C. Walter Randall, as trustee of the Bush Terminal Company, debtor, against Frank Bailey and others to recover on behalf of the debtor the amount of dividends declared and paid by defendants, former directors of the debtor. Defendants filed motions for judgment at the close of the whole case.

WALTER, JUSTICE. A trustee of Bush Terminal Company, appointed in a proceeding under Section 77B of the Bankruptcy Act, 11 U.S.C.A. § 207, here sues former directors of that company to recover on its behalf the amount of dividends declared and paid between November 22, 1928, and May 2, 1932, aggregating $3,639,058.06. At the times of the declarations and payments, the company's books concededly showed a surplus which ranged from not less than $4,378,554.83 on December 31, 1927, down to not less than $2,199,486.77 on April 30, 1932. The plaintiff claims, however, that in fact there was no surplus, that the capital was actually impaired to an amount greater than the amount of the dividends, and that the directors consequently are personally liable to the corporation for the amount thereof under Section 58 of the Stock Corporation Law. Defendants claim that there was no impairment of capital and that the surplus was actually greater than the amount which plaintiff concedes as the amount shown by the books.

The claims of the plaintiff, although branching out to a multitude of items, are basically reducible to four:

1. It was improper to "write-up" the land values above cost and thereby take unrealized appreciation into account.
2. It was improper not to "write-down" to actual value the cost of investments in and advances to subsidiaries and thereby fail to take unrealized depreciation into account.
3. It was improper to include as an asset an item of so-called good will, which the company carried at $3,000,000.
4. It was improper to include as an asset $492,958.30, being the cost of properties which had been demolished.

I discuss first the item of good will.

[8] Hatfield, Accounting, 1932, 268–269; Weiner and Bonbright, Anglo American Dividend Law: Surplus and Profits, 1930, 30 Col.L.Rev. 330, 343, 954, 966; Weiner, Book Review, 1927, 27 Col.L.Rev. 625, 626.

On March 6, 1902, shortly after its organization, the Bush Terminal Company entered into a contract with Irving T. Bush, who owned or controlled Bush Company, Ltd., which was then conducting a terminal enterprise in Brooklyn, and either under that contract or some arrangement constituting in effect a modification of it or a waiver of strict performance thereof, Bush Terminal Company issued $2,000,000 face amount of bonds and $3,000,000 par value of stock and received in addition to certain services of Irving T. Bush a large tract of land nearly contiguous to that owned by Bush Company, Ltd., and equipped with piers and warehouses, and other terminal facilities, and a lease by Bush Company, Ltd., of two of the piers. The $3,000,000 of stock was not entered upon the books of the company until December, 1905, and then under the same date, there was entered on the asset side of the ledger an item of good will in the same amount. It does not appear that that was done pursuant to any formal action of the board of directors fixing $3,000,000 as the value of any good will, but it does appear that the directors did in fact sanction the fixing of that value on such item.

Plaintiff stresses the fact that the company itself received the proceeds of the $2,000,000 of bonds and itself expended such proceeds in acquiring the land and erecting the piers and warehouses and other terminal facilities, and contends that it necessarily follows that the only possible asset which the company can be regarded as having received for the $3,000,000 of stock is the services of Mr. Bush for about two or three years. I think that is too narrow a view. Bush Company, Ltd., was an existing company which unquestionably had a good will of some value. Mr. Bush controlled that company. He also had an option to purchase the nearly contiguous land abovementioned. In 1904 Bush Terminal Company acquired the assets of Bush Company, Ltd. The result thus was that between the time of its organization in 1902 and the end of 1905 there had been assembled under the single ownership of Bush Terminal Company the existing plant and business of Bush Company, Ltd., and nearly contiguous land which Mr. Bush had permitted it to acquire at the price at which he had it under option, and additional piers and warehouses and other terminal facilities, and the whole thereof, at least so far as appears were being profitably operated. Such profitable operation then continued for a long period of years, and consecutively, year in and year out, for a period of over twenty years the item of $3,000,000 for good will was set forth upon the company's balance sheets and reported to stockholders with the approval of successive boards of directors.

Directors obviously cannot create assets by fiat, and I do not go so far as to say that, even as against the company and in favor of directors, assets can be created by laches, acquiescence, or estoppel, but whatever may now be thought of the wisdom or business judgment displayed in valuing at $3,000,000 in 1905 what the company received for the $3,000,000 of stock, I do not think that anything has been shown respecting the history of the company from its organization in 1902 to November 22, 1928, or to May 2, 1932, which warrants a finding that during the period here in question, 1928 to 1932, there did not inhere in the assembled and established plant and facilities and going business an element of value in addition to physical assets which the directors were justified in valuing at $3,000,000.

The term "good will" is generally used as indicating that element of value which inheres in the fixed and favorable consideration of customers arising from an established and well-known and well-conducted business, and in an enterprise of this sort, enjoying no legal monopoly, and not a public utility in a legal sense, that element of value indisputably is property for which stock may be issued, and in the absence of fraud the judgment of the directors as to its value is controlling. Washburn v. National Wall-Paper Co., 2 Cir., 81 F. 17; Thoms v. Sutherland, 3 Cir., 52 F.2d 592, 597; White, Corbin & Co. v. Jones, 79 App.Div. 373, 79 N.Y.S. 583; Brown v. Weeks, 195 Mich. 27, 38, 39, 161 N.W. 945; Stock Corporation Law, § 69; and see Des Moines Gas Co. v. City of Des Moines, 238 U.S. 153, 164, 165, 35 S.Ct. 811, 59 L.Ed. 1244. It also is recognized that, apart from good will in that sense, there is what in the public utility rate cases is called "going concern value", by which is meant that element of value which inheres in an assembled and established plant, doing business and earning money, over one not thus advanced, and such element of value is treated as property which must be considered in determining the base upon which the utility is entitled to earn a return (Des Moines Gas Co. v. City of Des Moines, supra; Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corp. v. Railroad Commission of California, 289 U.S. 287, 313, 53 S.Ct. 637, 77 L.Ed. 1180), and I can perceive no reason why such "going concern value" should not be recognized here as well as in a utility rate case. It is merely a recognition of the fact that there is a "difference between a dead plant and a live one" (City of Omaha v. Omaha Water Co., 218 U.S. 180, 202, 30 S.Ct. 615, 620, 54 L.Ed. 991, 48 L.R.A.,N.S., 1084), or between a "living organism" and "bare bones" (Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corp. v. Railroad Commission of California, 289 U.S. 287, 314, 53 S.Ct. 637, 77 L.Ed. 1180), and the evidence abundantly establishes that what happened here was that an unused waterfront and adjoining uplands aggregating over 200 acres were assembled and converted into a great terminal, with piers, warehouses, lofts, railroads, and other shipping and transportation facilities, to which both industry and shipping were attracted as a result of diligent and in some instances ingenious efforts, and which enjoyed an international reputation for the excellence of the services rendered through assembled facilities and a trained personnel. I consequently hold this item allowable.

I next turn to the subject of unrealized appreciation and depreciation.

Until 1915 the company's land was carried upon its books at cost. In 1915 the land was written up to 80% of the amount at which it was then assessed for taxation, and in 1918 it was written up to the exact amount at which it was then so assessed. Those two write-ups totalled $7,211,791.72, and the result was that during the period here in question the land was carried on the books at $8,737,949.02, whereas its actual cost was $1,526,157.30. Plaintiff claims that the entire $7,211,- 791.72 should be eliminated because it represents merely unrealized appreciation, and dividends cannot be declared or paid on the basis of mere unrealized appreciation in fixed assets irrespective of how sound the estimate thereof may be. That obviously and concededly is another way of saying that for dividend purposes fixed assets must be computed at cost, not value, and plaintiff here plants himself upon that position, even to the point of contending that evidence of value is immaterial and not admissible. If that contention be sound, the company indisputably had a deficit at all the times here involved in an amount exceeding the dividends here in question. The importance of the question so presented, both to this case and to corporations and corporate directors in general, is thus apparent, and it is, I think, surprising that upon a question so important to and so often occurring in the realm of business there is, not only no decision which can be said to be directly in point, but, also, no discussion in text-book or law magazine which does much more than pose the question without answering it. * * *

The question I have to decide is whether or not an existing statute has been violated. The problem is one of statutory construction. * * *

I hence prefer to base my decison upon the assumption that the controlling words of the statute are merely these: "No stock corporation shall declare or pay any dividend which shall impair its capital or capital stock, nor while its capital or capital stock is impaired."

Before one can determine whether or not capital or capital stock has been impaired, one must determine what is capital or capital stock. The words to be construed thus are words which have varied and different meanings and express radically different concepts in different connections. Capital means one thing to an economist, or perhaps more accurately, different things to different economists, and it has still different meanings to accountants and to business men. It even means different things in different statutes. To determine its meaning in this statute it thus is essential, I think, to consider the history of the statute and what our courts have said respecting the statute's predecessors. (This paragraph of the opinion is omitted.)

It thus appears that after using the surplus and surplus profits terminology for practically a hundred years the legislature completely abandoned it, and I think that is quite significant as indicating a conscious intent to get away from the idea of profits earned as a result of completed transactions as the sole source of dividends. I do not say that the legislature thereby changed the existing law. On the contrary, I think that the terms capital and capital stock as used in the earlier statutes had been construed by the courts in such a way that the terms surplus and surplus profits as used therein necessarily meant any accretion or accumulation over and above debts and the liability to stockholders, and that the legislature of 1923 recognized and adopted that construction and omitted any reference to surplus or surplus profits for the very reason that by some persons those words were believed to convey the idea of and to be confined to an accumulation of net earnings resulting from completed transactions and for the express purpose of so clarifying the statute as to prevent the precise claim which plaintiff now here presses. * * *

Those statements by our highest court seem to me to make it entirely plain that the terms capital and capital stock in these statutes mean an amount, i. e. a value, of property up to the limit of the number of dollars specified as the par value of paid-up issued shares (or as the stated value of no-par shares), and that when the amount, i. e. the value, of the company's property exceeds that number of dollars the excess, whether "contributed by the stockholders or otherwise obtained" is surplus or surplus profits and may be distributed as dividends until the point is reached where such dividends "deplete the assets," i. e. the value of the assets, "below the sum," i. e. below the number of dollars, specified as the par or stated value of the paid-up issued shares. In other words, the capital or capital stock referred to in these statutes is the sum of the liability to stockholders, and any value which the corporation's property has in addition to that sum is surplus. And I cannot doubt that the words "otherwise obtained" and "accumulated," as used by the court in the cases just mentioned, include an appreciation in the value of property purchased whether realized or unrealized.

Additional support for this view is found, I think, in the fact that where corporations have made distributions to stockholders on the basis of appreciation in value such distributions have been held taxable as dividends paid. People ex rel. Wedgewood Realty Co. v. Lynch, 262 N.Y. 202, 186 N.E. 673; Id., 262 N.Y. 644, 188 N.E. 102; People ex rel. Mercantile Safe Deposit Co. v. Sohmer, 158 App.Div. 110, 143 N.Y.S. 313, affirmed 217 N.Y. 605, 111 N.E. 1097. * * *

In summary, I think that it cannot be said that there is a single case in this State which actually decides that unrealized appreciation cannot be taken into consideration, or, stated in different words, that cost and not value must be used in determining whether or not there exists a surplus out of which dividends can be paid. I think, further, that such a holding would run directly counter to the meaning of the terms capital and capital stock as fixed by decisions of the Court of Appeals construing the earlier statutes, and that such construction of those terms must be deemed to have been adopted by the legislature in enacting the statute here involved. See Matter of Scheftel's Estate, 275 N.Y. 135, 141, 9 N.E.2d 809. I thus obviously cannot follow decisions to the contrary in other States or any contrary views of economists or accountants. If the policy of the law be bad it is for the legislature to change it.

Throughout the period in question the company carried upon its books as assets its investments in and advances to its subsidiaries at their face value, i. e. at the cost thereof, and despite his insistence that unrealized appreciation of one asset cannot be taken into consideration, the plaintiff yet insists that these investments and advances must be written down to the value thereof as shown by the books of the subsidiaries, even though the subsidiaries are still carrying on business, and, further, that those books shall be what he calls "property adjusted," so as to cause them to show the actual value of the stock of and claims against those subsidiaries. He thus, as it seems to me, takes the inconsistent position that while unrealized appreciation cannot be considered, unrealized depreciation nevertheless must be. Defendants, also, take the equally inconsistent position that while unrealized appreciation must be considered, unrealized depreciation need not be. I am of the opinion that the same reasons which show that unrealized appreciation must be considered are equally cogent in showing that unrealized depreciation likewise must be considered. In other words, the test being whether or not the value of the assets exceeds the debts and the liability to stockholders, all assets must be taken at their actual value.

I see no cause for alarm over the fact that this view requires directors to make a determination of the value of the assets at each dividend declaration. On the contrary, I think, that is exactly what the law always has contemplated that directors should do. That does not mean that the books themselves necessarily must be altered by write-ups or write-downs at each dividend period, or that formal appraisals must be obtained from professional appraisers or even made by the directors themselves. That is obviously impossible in the case of corporations of any considerable size. But it is not impossible nor unfeasible for directors to consider whether the cost of assets continues over a long period of years to reflect their fair value, and the law does require that directors should really direct in the very important matter of really determining at each dividend declaration whether or not the value of the assets is such as to justify a dividend, rather than do what one director here testified that he did, viz. "accept the company's figures." The directors are the ones who should determine the figures by carefully considering values, and it was for the very purpose of compelling them to perform that duty that the statute imposes upon them a personal responsibility for declaring and paying dividends when the value of the assets is not sufficient to justify them. What directors must do is to exercise an informed judgment of their own, and the amount of information which they should obtain, and the sources from which they should obtain it, will of course depend upon the circumstances of each particular case. What is said in Bourne v. Bourne, 240 N.Y. 172, 148 N. E. 180, with respect to courts reviewing the discretion and judgment of directors was not said with reference to the legality of the declaration of a dividend, and, furthermore, the statements there made are predicated upon the assumption that directors realize that they are under a duty to exercise an informed judgment with respect to the assets of the company of which they are directors and have performed that duty. If directors have blindly or complacently accepted either cost or any other arbitrary figures as indicative of value, they have not exercised either discretion or judgment and no court is required to act as if they had. When directors have in fact exercised an informed judgment with respect to the value of the company's assets, the courts obviously will be exceedingly slow to override that judgment, and clear and convincing evidence will be required to justify a finding that such judgment was not in accordance with the facts. In the last analysis, however, the issue, in any case in which it is claimed that dividends have been paid out of capital, is the value of the assets and the amount of the liabilities to creditors and stockholders at the times the dividends were declared and paid.

Upon the evidence in this case I find that the directors here did in fact exercise an informed judgment with respect to the value of the good will, the value of the land of the company, and the value of the improvements thereon, and also with respect to the value of the land and improvements thereon which were owned by the subsidiaries, Bush Terminal Buildings Company and Bush Terminal Railroad Company, and that they believed and determined that the good will was worth $3,000,000 and that such land and improvements were worth several millions of dollars more than the amounts at which they were carried on the books. At least one of the directors was thoroughly versed in real estate values by reason of long and extensive experience in buying and selling and in recommending mortgage loans on real estate and was personally and thoroughly familiar with the properties and business of all the companies just named, and of the development thereof, from the time of the organization of the company, and no one could criticise any other director for relying upon his knowledge and judgment as to the value thereof, or for basing a judgment thereon. His knowledge and judgment probably were as safe and sound a guide as any formal appraisal that could have been obtained. At least one other of the directors likewise had a thorough familiarity with these properties and business from the inception of their developments. * * *

In summary, therefore, after considering all the evidence, I find that at the times these dividends were declared and paid the value of the assets exceeded the total liabilities to creditors and stockholders by an amount in excess of the total dividends, and that there accordingly was no impairment of capital or capital stock.

The conclusion thus reached makes it unnecessary to consider the question whether directors not present when a dividend is declared may be held liable because of presence at a subsequent meeting at which the prior declaration may be said to have been ratified, or any of the other defenses pleaded by defendants.

Defendants' motions for judgment at the close of the whole case are granted, and I direct the entry of judgment for defendants, with separate bills of costs to those appearing by separate attorneys.

NOTE

The New York Court of Appeals affirmed the decision, 288 N.Y. 280, 43 N.E.2d 43 (1942) saying:

The Legislature having declared that dividends may be paid when there is no impairment of capital or capital stock caused thereby and when the value of the corporate assets remaining after the payment of such dividends is at least equal to the aggregate amount of its debts and liabilities including capital or capital stock as the case may be, Stock Corporation Law, § 58, in other words from its surplus, our inquiry turns to the question whether surplus may consist of increases resulting from a revaluation of fixed assets. Surplus has been well defined as follows in Ewards v. Douglas, 269 U.S. 204, 214, 46 S.Ct. 85, 88, 70 L.Ed. 235, Brandeis J.: "The word 'surplus' is a term commonly employed in corporate finance and accounting to designate an account on corporate books. * * * The surplus account represents the net assets of a corporation in excess of all liabilities including its capital stock. This surplus may be 'paid-in surplus,' as where the stock is issued at a price above par; it may be 'earned surplus,' as where it was derived wholly from undistributed profits; or it may, among other things, represent the increase in valuation of land or other assets made upon a revaluation of the company's fixed property. See La Belle Iron Works v. United States, 256 U.S. 377, 385, 41 S.Ct. 528, 65 L.Ed. 998."

The decision below was correct and the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

NOTE

Dividends From Paid-In Surplus

Paid-in surplus (now more usually called "Capital surplus") originally consisted of that amount of surplus occasioned by the sale of par value stock at a price above par. The excess of the price above the par value constituted a surplus in the balance sheet.

The possibilities of this item became apparent some years after the invention of non-par stock. Since there was no fixed capital value or par, the sale or issue price of the share of stock could be split into a capital amount and a surplus amount by agreement with the parties (quaere if this is true in New York). But why do it? The answer was that where a corporation had been financed by issuing preferred stock and also issuing common stock, and it desired to pay dividends on its preferred stock, there was almost always a period of organization within which time the corporation made no money. If all the consideration received for its stock was capital, it had no surplus and could not legally pay dividends. Consequently it was advisable to so arrange matters that part of the consideration received for stock was surplus payable as dividends to preferred shareholders, and this is the ordinary use of paid-in surplus. If preferred stock be considered as analogous to a bond or note, the resulting operation is much the same as though a part of the capital contributed by the common stock were used to pay interest on the corporation's bonds.

Surplus has other possibilities, however. The surplus may be carved out of the consideration received for preferred stock. If this is paid to the preferred stock as dividends, the preferred shareholder is merely getting his money back in driblets. But it may also be paid at the same time to common stock, and the preferred shareholder who thinks he has a preferred claim may actually be contributing his money to the payment of dividends to common stockholders who have either paid less or agreed to risk more.

At the moment capital surplus is exceedingly popular and frequently used. Certain students of the corporate problem feel that the system has inherent dangers as making it easy for a corporation to distribute its capital assets without standing the test of earnings; and as permitting the distribution of the contribution of one class of shareholders to other classes of shareholders in a manner not contemplated by the contributors of the paid-in surplus thus distributed.

Surplus requires further analysis: all such surplus is not alike. It may arise from segregation of a part of the original contributions of the shareholders of an organization. Or it may arise from payments by incoming shareholders to equalize an earned surplus previously built up. Or it may arise on reorganization, a new corporation taking over an existing business, and carrying forward in the new structure a surplus earned by the old. Or it may arise from upward revaluation of assets, as in Randall v. Bailey, supra. Do the same rules apply to all of these types of capital surplus?[9]

Most corporate balance sheets include an itemization of surplus account, distinguishing between "earned" and "capital" surplus.

NATIONAL LOCK COMPANY v. HOGLAND et al.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Seventh Circuit, 1938. 101 F.2d 576.

Suit by the National Lock Company against Frank G. Hogland and others to recoup the amount of funds which were alleged to have been unlawfully withdrawn from the plaintiff's treasury and appropriated to the personal use of the named defendant. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Reversed, with directions, as to the trial court's statement of a conclusion of law and affirmed in all other respects.

TREANOR, CIRCUIT JUDGE. * * * The plaintiff corporation is organized under and pursuant to the laws of the state of Delaware and the defendants are citizens of the state of Illinois. The defendant Hogland was president of the plaintiff corporation, a member of the Board of Directors and a stockholder during the period of the alleged illegal withdrawals of the corporation's funds. The defendants Grenberg and Strandquist were members of the Board of Directors and stockholders of the plaintiff corporation during the same period. The remaining defendant-appellant, Gust Anderson, was a member of the Board of Directors for a portion of such period and was a stockholder for the entire period. Also Anderson was for the entire period trustee of a trust created by defendant Hogland, the trust fund consisting of Hogland's personal assets to be utilized for the payment of Hogland's personal debts. Certain of the alleged unlawful withdrawals were traced into the Hogland trust assets.

It is undisputed in this cause that funds of the plaintiff corporation were withdrawn from its treasury and transferred to defendant Hogland in the form of loans. These funds were withdrawn with the knowledge of, assent thereto, and under the authorization of all of the defendants who were members of the Board of Trustees of plaintiff corporation. All such transactions were carried on in the state of Illinois and were in violation of the Delaware Corporation Act under which the plaintiff corporation was organized, and of a resolution of the Board of Directors of plaintiff corporation.

The trial court held that Delaware law was applicable and that the conduct of the defendants in respect to the withdrawal of funds of plaintiff corporation constituted a violation of their legal duty to the corporation. It is not contended by defendants that the trial court erred in holding that the Delaware law was applicable.

---

[9] See, Berle and Means, The Modern Corporation and Private Property, 1932, 162–172; Katz, Accounting Problems in Corporate Distributions, 1941, 89 U. of Pa. L.Rev. 764, 765–774; Mitchell, Capitalization of Corporations Issuing Shares without Par Value, 1925, 11 A.B.A.J. 377; Note, Declaration of Dividends from Paid-In Surplus, 1931, 31 Col.L.Rev. 844

The alleged illegal withdrawals of funds for the benefit of Hogland commenced on the 2nd day of January 1929, and continued through the year 1932. Defendants admit that as a result of the advances made to Hogland the amount of $169,129 is due the plaintiff from Hogland.

The trial court by its finding and decree fixed the principal sum due from defendant Hogland in the amount of $470,273.41. In fixing the foregoing sum the court refused to allow as credits three contested items consisting of the following: (1) Bonus credited to Frank G. Hogland on July 17, 1929,—$15,000; (2) bonus credited to Frank G. Hogland December 30, 1929,—$200,000; (3) common stock dividends credited on the account of Frank G. Hogland December 31, 1930,—$65,622. * * *

The dividend of $65,622 for which defendants claim credit was authorized at a meeting of the Board of Directors on December 30, 1930. In respect to defendants' claim the trial court's conclusion of law was that the declaration of the dividend was "ultra vires of the corporation and was unlawfully charged to the surplus account contrary to the provisions of the previous resolution of the Board of Directors." The conclusion of law is based upon (1) a finding that the Board of Directors passed a resolution in 1924 which provided "that thereafter no dividends should be charged to the permanent surplus fund created by the said resolution," and (2) the finding that "no further resolution of the Board of Directors of the plaintiff corporation appears authorizing the charging of any further dividends to the permanent corporate surplus account. * * *"

The resolution referred to was adopted in 1924 and contained the following provision: "* * * balance of the surplus fund * * * (shall) be transferred to a permanent surplus fund for plant and plant equipment and as a safety fund and from which no dividend shall be paid." The fund thus created was to be augmented by one-third of the balance of annual net profits after deductions for payment of dividends on outstanding preferred capital stock.

The creation of the "permanent surplus fund" for the purposes enumerated was a question of policy entirely within the discretion of the Board of Directors and could have been nullified by formal action of the board at any time. The prohibition of payment of dividends from the "permanent surplus fund" was discretionary with the Board, and the Board was not bound forever to refrain from charging dividends to such fund. The board being under no legal duty to continue to build up the permanent surplus fund, or to refrain indefinitely from charging dividends to it, had the power to revoke either the augmentation provision or the prohibition against payment of dividends. Instead of striking out or amending the dividend provision, the Board merely declared a dividend and ordered it charged to the surplus fund. This action was contrary to the unrevoked previous resolution and to that extent was irregular. But such action was not void. A Board of Directors cannot increase or decrease corporate powers; and no action of a Board of Directors which the corporation has the power to perform through its directors can be ultra vires of the corporation merely because the board previously has declared by resolution that such action will not be taken.

Assuming that the dividend validly could have been charged to the permanent surplus fund, if the Board of Directors first had nullified the prohibition of the resolution of 1924, we are of the opinion that the Board had the power to make it a valid charge on the "permanent surplus fund" without formally suspending or repealing the previous prohibition. The declaring of the dividend as a charge on the surplus fund was in law a suspension by the Board of Directors of the restriction which the Board previously had imposed upon its discretion.

Plaintiff's argument goes beyond the foregoing and necessarily implies that the Board of Directors was without power to declare a dividend as a charge upon the "permanent surplus fund" regardless of any previous suspension or revocation of the restriction by formal action of the Board. The plaintiff contends that the resolution of 1924 "dedicated to the capital of the corporation" the "permanent surplus fund"; and that "the surplus so dedicated immediately became vested as a part of the trust funds of appellee (plaintiff) to be maintained by appellee for the benefit of all those with whom it came in contact,—its creditors, its preferred stockholders and its common stockholders."

If the "permanent surplus fund" was impressed with the character ascribed to it by plaintiff it became in fact and in law corporate capital in the technical sense. But we cannot attach that consequence to the resolution of the Board of Directors. The resolution contains no express declaration of an intention to convert the "permanent surplus fund" into cash capital; no requirement that the surplus fund be transferred to capital account. On the contrary the "fund" is to continue "permanent surplus fund" and was carried in "earned surplus" account as a "liability". The annual statement at the close of the year 1929 shows $673,803.14 in the "earned surplus account". The resolution authorized the use of the surplus fund for investment in "plant and plant equipment"; but the "permanent surplus fund" was to be used also "as a safety fund". The resolution left to the Board's discretion the question of how much of the surplus fund should be invested in "plant and plant equipment" and how any balance should be utilized "as a safety fund". Plaintiff assumes that all the accumulated surplus fund was reflected partly in the fixed assets of the corporation and partly in a capital asset of patents and good will valued at some $894,000, as shown by the balance sheet for 1929. But the same balance sheet shows cash on hand in banks in the sum of $304,265.17, in addition to notes and accounts receivable in the sum of $543,829.79. In the absence of a showing that any definite portions of the "permanent surplus fund" had been invested in fixed or capital assets, there is no basis for plaintiff's assumption that none of the accumulated surplus was reflected in the cash or other liquid assets.

We are of the opinion that the resolution did not have the effect of converting the "permanent surplus" into corporate capital, but merely set it aside for use in the conduct of the business. Undoubtedly the general rule is that undistributed surplus, which has been retained for use in the corporate business, and which has been invested in physical assets, can be withdrawn and distributed as dividends. This rule was followed by the Supreme Court of Delaware in the case of Bryan v. Aiken, 1913, 10 Del.Ch. 446, 86 A. 674, 45 L.R.A.,N.S., 477, the reason and holding of which not only are pertinent to our question, but also constitute authority, since plaintiff is a Delaware corporation and the validity of its dividends must be determined by the law of its domicile.

In Bryan v. Aiken, supra, a dividend partly in cash and partly in stock was declared out of accumulated surplus which had been invested for a period of twelve years in "property or corpus" of the corporation in the form of permanent physical assets for use in the business of the corporation. The specific question decided was that a stock dividend declared out of such surplus belonged to a tenant for life; but the reasoning is applicable to our question. The Delaware Court's basic assumption is that undistributed surplus does not lose its character of corporate income, or earnings, merely by reason of its having been converted into corporate "property or corpus" in the form of physical assets which are permanently devoted to the business operations of the corporation.[10] And in the opinion of the Delaware Court a dividend "in cash, in stock, or in both, based upon such earnings" is a "distribution of profits", a "turning back to the stockholders" of "net earnings which had been temporarily used for improvements." [pages 679, 684].

Plaintiff cites Bryan v. Aiken, supra, as authority for the proposition that a "company had the right to withhold the earnings, and to permanently capitalize them if it deemed it necessary or proper in the conduct of its business to do so." But, as stated above, the Delaware Supreme Court held that investing surplus funds in permanent physical assets and treating them, for all practical purposes, as capital assets during a period of twelve years did not capitalize them nor destroy their availability for dividends as undivided profits.

In our opinion, under the authority of Bryan v. Aiken, supra, the "permanent surplus fund" of the instant case, whether invested in permanent physical assets of the corporation or retained in the form of cash or securities, continued to be undivided profits and available as the basis of dividends. We conclude that the trial court erred in stating its conclusion of law that the declaration of the dividend was "ultra vires of the corporation and unlawfully charged to the surplus account contrary to the previous resolution of the Board of Directors."

It follows that the defendant Hogland was entitled to credit for the amount of the dividend as of the date it was credited to his account. * * *

---

10 "It may be regarded as settled law, we think, that although a corporation has the right to set apart or reserve a portion of its net earnings for a period of years, and treat them as capital, retaining them in its treasury, or expending them in the purchase of securities or real estate for the company, yet if it subsequently divides such net earnings among the stockholders by declaring a dividend in cash, in stock, or in both, based upon such earnings, it is a distribution of profits. * * * In such case the accumulated income, as well as the securities and real estate purchased, are all assets of the corporation, but the earnings are not regarded as capital although they may have been treated by the corporation as such prior to the distribution."

Our conclusion is that the trial court erred only in stating its conclusion of law respecting the validity of the declaration of the dividend; and in that respect the judgment is reversed with directions to the trial court to restate its conclusion of law in harmony with this opinion and for proper adjustment in the amount of recovery. In all other respects the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

* * * Our conclusion is that the trial court erred only in stating as its conclusion of law that the dividend was ultra vires of the corporation and unlawfully charged to the surplus account of the corporation. To the extent that the decree rests upon that conclusion it is reversed and the cause remanded with directions to the trial court to modify conclusion of law No. 4 in its Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law to conform to the holding of this Court respecting the validity of the declaration of the dividend of December 30, 1930; and the District Court is directed further to make such proper adjustments in the amounts of recovery against the defendants as are made necessary by our holding that the defendant Hogland was entitled to credit for the amount of the dividend as of the date it was credited to his account with plaintiff corporation. In all other respects the decree of the District Court is affirmed.

The language of the decree heretofore entered is modified accordingly.

Petition for rehearing is denied.

WITTENBERG v. FEDERAL MINING & SMELTING COMPANY.

Court of Chancery of Delaware, 1926. 15 Del.Ch. 147, 133 A. 48.

[Federal Mining & Smelting Co. was organized in Delaware in 1903, with an invested capital of $18,750,000. It had outstanding capital stock of 120,000 preferred and 50,400 common $100 par shares. The preferred stock was entitled to a 7% cumulative dividend before any dividends were paid on the common stock, and, upon dissolution, was entitled to payment of par and accrued dividends, before anything was paid to the common stock.

Defendant's business was the mining, smelting, etc. of mineral ores and marketing the finished product. Defendant acquired numerous mines, many of which have become exhausted. Its principal mine had a probable life of six years at the time of the present action; other mines had a life expectancy ranging from a few months to five years.

The corporate deficit as shown by the balance sheet in 1924 was $7,624,661.95. In 1924 it was more than $1,000,000 less than this sum. The balance sheet of December 31, 1924, showed that the capital assets were so depleted that they were then insufficient to pay the preferred stock, upon liquidation, the par value thereof.

Since 1906, the company had set up on its books amounts for depreciation of plants and equipment, but nothing for depletion of mines.

From 1904 to 1908, dividends were paid to the common stock aggregating 47½% of par; since then, the common stock had received no dividends. In 1926 there were unpaid back dividends accumulated on the preferred stock of $19.25 per share. At that time, the directors stated that the company's net profits for 1925 ($3,440,000 after all charges except depletion) were available for dividends to all stockholders, though the company's books showed a deficit; that, after preferred stock dividends were provided for, the company might distribute remaining net profits as dividends to the common stock without first deducting anything for depletion or establishing a sufficient reserve to pay off the preferred stock at par and unpaid dividends, in the event of the company's liquidation.

The directors then authorized the payment of accrued dividends ($19.25 per share) and the current quarterly dividend of 1¾% on the preferred stock and a special dividend of $10 per share on the common stock out of earnings prior to 1926. They announced a future policy of paying to the common stock half the current profits remaining after all charges except depletion, and after payment of all accrued and unpaid dividends to the preferred stock.

The present bill was brought by preferred stockholders for an injunction to restrain the payment of the declared dividend of $10 a share on the common stock; to enjoin payment of dividends to the common stock until a reserve fund be set up equal to the amount by which the invested capital had been impaired by depletion of the mines; and to restrain payment of any dividends on the common stock when such payment would impair the invested capital. In the alternative, an injunction restraining the payment of dividends on the common stock until a reserve fund be set up equal to the difference between the net value of the present assets and the par value of all outstanding preferred stock, was sought; thereafter, no dividends to be paid on the common stock if, as a result, net assets would be reduced below the par of all outstanding preferred stock. Defendant demurred.]

THE CHANCELLOR. * * * The general rule is that corporations cannot declare dividends except out of profits. This rule requires that the invested capital shall be kept intact. 1 Morawetz on Private Corporations, 2d Ed., § 435; 6 Fletcher's Cyclopedia of Corporations, §§ 3660, 3685; 5 Thompson on Corporations, 2d Ed., § 5305; 2 Machen on Modern Law of Corporations, § 1313; 2 Cook on Corporations, 8th Ed., § 546. As I read the briefs there is no dispute between the solicitors for the respective parties upon the proposition that this is the rule for corporations generally. But the defendant contends that if the corporation be a mining company, or an oil company, or a concern that is exploiting a patent or a leasehold, profits may exist notwithstanding there be a depletion of the corporate capital. Companies of this kind are said to be wasting asset corporations. It is understood by everybody that such concerns live on themselves; they thrive by consuming their capital. Every ton of ore taken from a mining company's mine and every barrel of oil taken from an oil company's wells depletes the capital pro tanto. So does the mere passage of time deplete the assets of a company organized to exploit a patent or a leasehold. In this respect wasting asset corporations are distinguishable from the ordinary mercantile or manufacturing concern. Stockholders are entitled to expect the latter, unlike the former, to employ their capital in the acquisition of profits and not to dissipate it in driblets in the form of dividends. There being this difference in the nature of the two types of corporations, it is argued that while profits cannot be said to have been earned in the case of the ordinary industrial enterprise so long as an unrecouped portion of the capital has been lost, yet in the case of the wasting asset corporation profits as the term is understood may exist even though the capital has been and is being depleted. If capital assets consisting of ore are taken out of the ground, their transmutation into the form of a pure metal does not destroy their character as capital. If it be conceded that the proceeds from their sale, less only the cost of mining, milling, marketing and overhead, may be regarded as available for dividends, the result nevertheless remains, that dividends are being paid in part at least from capital, there being no charge-off for the value of the removed ore. To describe earnings so derived as profits is totally unjustified in reason, so far I mean as the same are contributed to by the value of the ore taken out. If, therefore, the defendant can be permitted to regard the value of its ore taken out as available for dividends, it must be on the theory, not that its value has ceased to represent a capital asset and may properly be regarded as contributing to "profits," but on the theory that with mining companies the general rule which forbids the making of dividends out of capital is not applicable. The use of the word "profits" in connection with this aspect of the subject is a misnomer. A dividend, when made from proceeds constituted as were those in this case, is made in part at least from capital invested and not from profits.

Now, aside from all statutory provisions, Is there any authority to the effect that proceeds derived in reality from capital assets, in the form of ore, may be regarded as available for dividends? If so, it is apparent that in the case of a mine the day is sure to arrive when the continued operation of the mine will have exhausted it, and the stockholders will find that all their capital has been paid out to them in installments in the form of dividends. If there is only one class of stock, so far as stockholders are concerned no harm can be done by such a course of conduct, beyond the possibility that some of them may perhaps have not appreciated the fact that dividends so received really constitute a partial distribution of capital and so may have been deluded into losing their investment by spending all the dividends upon the theory that they represented earnings or profits as generally understood. Certain it is, however, that where this is done, each stockholder (there being but one class) will have ultimately received his pro rata share of the capital assets. Instead of receiving such share in a lump sum as upon liquidation, he will have received it by bits in the course of what might be called a liquidation of capital by installments.

If, therefore, there is no statute to interfere, and creditors are not involved, it may with some reason be argued that a so-called wasting asset corporation ought to be permitted to write off nothing for its depleted capital assets when there are no preferences among stockholders, because unless this be so the only alternative would be for it to accumulate great cash reserves simply to abide the approach of a distant day for final distribution. Why not, reason suggests, permit the cash equivalent of consumed capital to be distributed to its ultimate owners pari passu with its accumulation, instead of compelling the mining or oil producing corporation to turn itself into what the solicitors for the defendant describe as a huge investment trust for the investment of accumulated cash reserves—an activity entirely unrelated to the sort of enterprise which the corporation and its officers are supposed to be especially equipped for?

In line with this reasoning the defendant cites the English case of Lee v. Neuchatel Asphalt Co., 1889, 41 Ch.Div. 1, 58 L.J.Chan.Div. 408, 1889, as authority for the proposition that value of the ore in place and removed need not be charged off against receipts from which dividends may be declared. That case does so hold. It appears to be the leading authority on the subject. As I read that case, however, it has no persuasiveness as an authority in the instant one. This is for two principal reasons. First, the facts of that case show that the capital was not only not depleted, but on the contrary had increased. Here there is a large depletion. And second, though there were two classes of shares, viz., preference and ordinary, yet with respect to capital all the shares were on the same footing. The preference shares were entitled to be preferred only in the matter of dividends, the article as to dividends being that the preference shares should first receive seven pounds per annum, then the ordinary shares should receive a like sum, and thereafter both classes should receive dividends without preference or distinction. In the instant case, however, a highly important distinction exists in the fact that the preferred shares are upon liquidation preferred over the common in the distribution of the capital. In the English case, if dividends had been made out of capital, the result would have been simply that each shareholder would have received, in bits to be sure, but nevertheless in its entirety, all that portion of the capital which each under the articles was entitled to. Now that is a very different case from this one. Here the preferred stockholders have a first claim not only on profits, but as well on the capital. The result will be that if the policy disclosed by the resolution which has already been acted upon and is proposed to be continued, is allowed to go on, the inevitable end will be that the mines will eventually become exhausted, the capital value represented by them will have become lost to the preferred stockholders who have a first claim thereon, and appropriated to the junior common stockholders in the shape of dividends. This thought is especially emphasized in the instant case because, unless new mines are found (a thing becoming increasingly difficult of realization), the present mines will, according to the facts before me, probably be exhausted within only six years from this date, and in the interval most of the remaining capital assets may be paid out in dividends to the common stockholders. The injustice of this result is the more glaring when it is remembered that the preferred stockholders have invested about twice as much money in the corporation's assets as have the common stockholders. The defendant frankly concedes that if its contention is sustained, all that a preferred stockholder, who has a senior charge on capital as well as dividends, is assured of from the corporation is a right to a series of dividends while the assets last and that the common stockholders may be paid all proceeds from the sale of the transformed capital without any deduction for its value in the raw state. If this be true, such preferred stock of a wasting asset corporation as we are concerned with in the instant case is grossly misnamed. The common stock is the real preferred, for in the end it may receive not only so much of the capital as equals its par, but all that there is in excess of its par, leaving possibly not so much as a crumb for its supposedly more favored companion. And this situation is aggravated in the case of a corporation where as in this one the preferred stockholders are denied either the right to vote at stockholders' meetings or to have notice of the same. * * * It seems clear to me that on fundamental principles of right and justice, the complainants as preferred stockholders possessing a prior claim on capital assets have an equity which entitles them to protection against the proposed whittling away of those assets for the benefit of the less favored common stockholders.

To the suggestion that the contentions of the complainants, if sustained, might result in the creation of what the defendant, as before stated, describes as an investment trust for the investment of large reserves, two things are to be said. They are, first, that cash or securities need not be hoarded if other mines are desired to be purchased, or if not and it is undesirable for any reason that the directors should invest the cash, preferred stock may be purchased on the open market or the capital stock may from time to time be reduced in accordance with the provisions of the act in that behalf.

There being no right under general principles for the corporation to pay out dividends to the common stockholders under the present financial condition of the company, is there anything in our statute authorizing the proposed dividends? This is the next question to be answered.

Our pertinent statutory provisions are found in the General Corporation Law. They are as follows:

"Sec. 13. [After authorizing the issuance of preferred stock and the payment of preferred dividends thereon, the section proceeds in this language:] And when any such quarterly, half yearly or yearly preferred dividend shall have been paid or set aside as herein provided, a dividend upon the common stock may then be paid out of the remaining surplus or net profits of the company." 29 Del.Laws, c. 113, § 7.

"Sec. 34. Dividends; Reserves:—The directors of every corporation created under this chapter shall have power, after reserving over and above its capital stock paid in, such sum, if any, as shall have been fixed by the stockholders, to declare a dividend among its stockholders of the whole of its accumulated profits, in excess of the amount so reserved, and pay the same to such stockholders on demand; provided, that the corporation may, in its certificate of incorporation, [or] in its by-laws, give the Directors power to fix the amount to be reserved." Rev. Code 1915, § 1948.

"Sec. 35. * * * No corporation created under the provisions of this chapter, nor the directors thereof, shall make dividends except from the surplus or net profits. * * *" Rev.Code 1915, § 1949. * * *

Now, what do our statutory provisions touching dividends mean? Sections 34 and 35 are the most important sections bearing on this question. Whatever meaning is given to the words "accumulated profits" in section 34 and "surplus or net profits" in section 35, will give color and complexion to the phrase "remaining surplus or net profits" as it appears in section 13. I, therefore, address my attention to sections 34 and 35 as controlling. In examining these sections their meaning with respect to corporations generally will be sought to be extracted without regard to whether the corporation is an ordinary industrial one or one known as a wasting asset corporation.

If section 34 stood alone, I suppose there could be no doubt that if a corporation found its capital assets reduced below their paid in value, no matter what may have been the profits in the last current year out of which dividends could be made, no dividend could be declared without first bringing the capital up to its paid in value. But the defendant argues that section 34 is simply a permissive section, it does not assume to lay down a rule of prohibition, and it is not permissible in view of section 35 which follows with its inhibition, to infer that section 34 on the principle of expressio unius est exclusio alterius is designed to say when dividends may not be declared. Therefore, says the defendant, we are to look to section 35 to see if a proposed dividend falls under the ban of any of its prohibitions. If it does not, then that section being the only one of inhibition, there is no statutory rule anywhere forbidding the dividend. Furthermore, it is contended that though section 35 is negative in its provision, yet it is also positive and affirmative by reason of the exception contained in it. In other words, it is as though it should read "corporations may make dividends out of surplus or net profits."

Now the word "or" being in the disjunctive, it is contended that the section points out two sources from which dividends may be declared, viz., surplus if any, or even though there is no surplus, yet from net profits in any current year in case such are earned. The force of this argument is particularly pointed out in this case, for it is contended that though the company's balance sheet shows a capital deficit, its profit and loss account for 1925 shows net profits in the sum of $3,440,000. To what extent the value of extracted ore which is not charged off against earnings contributes to this sum does not appear. But even if none were attributable to extracted ore, still a deficit exists.

Section 35 was taken from the New Jersey act (P.L.1896, p. 277). Its counterpart in that act is section 30, N.J.S.A. 14:8–19. It is interesting to note that the New Jersey act has been amended since our act was adopted by making the language read "except from its surplus, or from its net profits." The introduction of that word "from" after the disjunctive conjunction has the evident effect of pointing out two funds from which dividends may be made. Goodnow v. American Writing Paper Co., 69 A. 1014, 73 N.J.Eq. 692. Our section, however, remains as originally drawn. Evidently the New Jersey amendatory legislation was regarded as necessary to make it clear that two such funds were created. The Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey in the Goodnow Case took occasion to say that when this section 30 was in the same condition as our section 35 is in, there was room to contend that the words "net profits" were intended to be synonymous with the word "surplus." And even after the amendment was adopted, which clearly indicated two funds from which dividends might be made, the court refused to define "net profits" as profits made in any one year. Its language on this point was as follows:

"Although the change in language indicates that the Legislature made a distinction between surplus and net profits, it does not necessarily follow that net profits mean the difference between gross earnings and what may be called operating expenses. Such profits may be called annual profits, and it may be that by net profits the Legislature meant the net profits upon the whole of the company's business from its organization. If either of these meanings is adopted, the declaration of the present dividend is justified."

And so here, when the advantage to the dividend lacks the aid of those words "or from," it may with more reason be said that by net profits is meant the net profits upon the business from its organization. Taking section 35 in connection with section 34 with which it of course must be construed, my conclusion is that the net profits are such as appear from the entire business of the company from its inception, and are not to be confined to one period and made synonymous with annual profits. This being the construction adopted, there are no net profits because the capital is heavily depleted.

Whether "net profits" is synonymous with surplus I shall not pause to discuss. It may be argued that it is not, and if not, then two funds exist from either of which dividends could be made and the paid in capital left undisturbed. In other words it may be argued that surplus can be created from a source other than profits, as for instance from sale of stock at a premium. In that event, though there are no net profits or accumulated profits from which to make a dividend, yet another fund, viz., the surplus, might be argued to exist to which resort may be had for a dividend. And so on this argument, the statute may be construed as referring to two distinct dividend funds the existence of both of which is not inconsistent with the statutory conception that the paid in capital must always be maintained.

But whatever might be the correct view upon the question of whether "surplus" and "net profits" are synonymous, I am of the opinion that in this case there are no "net profits" within the meaning of the statute and certainly there is no "surplus."

In this view of our statute there is thus nothing therein which against the preferred stockholders authorizes the dividend already declared or permits similar common stock dividends in the future so long as the capital is impaired. * * *

All that has hereinbefore been said should of course be understood as being confined solely to controversies intra the corporation. If creditors' rights are involved, an entirely different situation would be presented for consideration.

The demurrer will be overruled.[11]

(b) Dividends Other Than Cash

(1) STOCK DIVIDENDS

Stockholders not infrequently receive as a distribution, additional shares of stock in the corporation. Such distribution may be

(a) A true "stock dividend." Here, the directors have by resolution transferred a portion of surplus to capital; and such transfer is treated as consideration for the issue of new shares, which are then directed to be distributed, pro rata, as a dividend to shareholders.

(b) A "split-up". Here the directors, without adding to capital amend the certificate by dividing the existing outstanding shares into a greater number; and issuing by exchange or otherwise, a suitable number of additional shares.

It will be noted that under (a) surplus equal to the par values of the added shares must be transferred to capital. Quære: how much surplus must be transferred in respect of stock dividends of non-par stock? Must the same amount of surplus per share, be transferred to capital as was paid in when the original shares on which the dividend is to be paid were issued? If not, may not the old shares be diluted by the so-called "dividend" ?

WILLIAMS v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1883. 93 N.Y. 162.

EARL, J. * * * The main contention[12] was, that the stock dividend distributing upwards of $15,000,000 of stock among the stockholders of the Western Union Telegraph Company, was unauthorized and in violation of law, and whether it was or not is the principal matter for our determination upon this appeal.

The stock dividend was claimed to be in violation of chapter 18, part 1, title 4, section 2 of the Revised Statutes [1829, Vol. 2][13] * * *

This dividend was condemned by the General Term of the Superior Court as a violation of that section. Our attention has been called to

---

[11] Aff'd, 15 Del.Ch. 409, 138 A. 347, 55 A.L.R. 1, 1927; after trial, bill dismissed, 15 Del.Ch. 351, 138 A. 352, 1927. Compare Delaware General Corporation Law, § 34, supra p. 385.

Weiner, Theory of Anglo American Dividend Law: American Statutes and Cases, 1929, 29 Col.L.Rev. 461, 479; Notes, 1926, 12 Corn.L.Q. 79; 1927, 5 N.Y.U.L.Q.Rev. 40; 1927, 75 U. of Pa.L.Rev. 350; 1926, 40 Harv.L.Rev. 318; 1928, 26 Mich.L.Rev. 448; 1928, 12 Minn.L.Rev. 178; 1926, 75 U. of Pa.L.Rev. 89.

The problems created by the "wasting asset" doctrine are discussed: Ballantine and Hills, Corporate Capital and Restrictions upon Dividends under Modern Corporation Laws, 1935, 23 Calif.L.Rev. 229, 248–252; Frey, The Distribution of Corporate Dividends 1941, 89 U. of Pa.L.Rev. 735, 749; Weiner, Theory of Anglo American Dividend Law: American Statutes and Cases, 1929, 29 Col.L.Rev. 461, 477; Williams, Dividends from Wasting Asset Corporations, 1936, 43 W.Va. L.Q. 53.

[12] Statement of facts appears supra, p. 212.

[13] See f. n. 1, supra, p. 212.

Cf. N.Y.Stock Corporation Law, § 58, supra, p. 384.

no other law forbidding or condemning a stock dividend, and in their allegations against it the counsel for the plaintiff rely mainly upon that section. After reading the numerous opinions that have been submitted to us and giving careful attention to all that has been said upon the subject, we are unable to perceive that that section has any bearing whatever upon the question we are to determine. The section was taken from the act chapter 325 of the Laws of 1825, which was entitled, "An act to prevent fraudulent bankruptcies of incorporated companies, to facilitate proceedings against them, and for other purposes." It was not part of the original revision, but was incorporated into the Revised Statutes by Chapter 20 of the Laws of 1828. A careful reading of the section shows that it has reference only to the property capital of a corporation, and not to its share capital. The first clause prohibits dividends of property except from surplus profits. It is further provided that the directors of any corporation shall not divide, withdraw or in any way pay to the stockholders, or any of them, any part of the capital stock of such company, or to reduce the capital stock without the consent of the legislature. These provisions were intended to prevent the division, distribution, withdrawal and reduction of the property of a corporation below the sum limited in its charter or articles of association for its capital, but not to prevent its increase above that sum. The purpose was to prevent the depletion of the property of the corporation thereby endangering its solvency. * * * By loss or misfortune, or misconduct of the managing officers of a corporation, its capital stock may be reduced below the amount limited by its charter; but whatever property it has up to that limit must be regarded as its capital stock. When its property exceeds that limit, then the excess is surplus. Such surplus belongs to the corporation and is a portion of its property, and, in a general sense, may be regarded as a portion of its capital, but in a strictly legal sense it is not a portion of its capital, and is always regarded as surplus profits. The very section we are considering contemplates that there may be a surplus, and that such surplus may be divided. The surplus may be in cash, and then it may be divided in cash; it may be in property, and if the property is so situated that a division thereof among the stockholders is practicable, a dividend in property may be declared, and that may be distributed among stockholders. All such dividends diminish and deplete the property of the corporation, and that section was designed to prevent dividends of property which tended to deplete the assets of the company below the sum limited in its charter as the amount of its capital stock. But stock dividends never diminish or interfere with the property of a corporation, and hence are not within the purview of that section. After a stock dividend a corporation has just as much property as it had before. It is just as solvent and just as capable of meeting all demands upon it. After such a dividend the aggregate of the stockholders own no more interest in the corporation than before. The whole number of shares before the stock dividend represented the whole property of the corporation, and after the dividend they represent that and no more. A stock dividend does not distribute property, but simply dilutes the shares as they existed before; and hence that section in no way prevented or related to a stock dividend. Such a dividend could be declared by a corporation without violating its letter, its spirit or its purpose. It is, therefore, clear that the directors of the Western Union Telegraph Company did not violate that section by the stock dividend which they declared; and if that dividend was illegal it must be because it was condemned by some other statute, or by some general principle of law or by public policy.

Our attention has been called to no statute, and we know of none in this State which prohibits a corporation from making a stock dividend. The legislatures in some of the States have, we believe, passed laws prohibiting such dividends; but in this State no such law has been enacted.

There is no public policy which in all cases, condemns such dividends. Shares having been legally brought into existence may be distributed among the stockholders of a company. By such distribution no harm is done to any person, provided the dividend is not a mere inflation of the stock of the company, with no corresponding values to answer to the stock distributed. It may be that a distribution of stock gratuitously to the stockholders of a company based upon no values, a mere inflation, or, to use a phrase much in vogue, a watering of stock, would be condemned by the law. But when stock has been lawfully created and is held by a corporation, which it has a right to issue for value, then a stock dividend may be made, provided that the stock always represents property. It is conceded that the directors of the Western Union Telegraph Company could have issued this stock for money to be paid into its treasury. It could have issued it for property to be received by it for the purposes of its legitimate business. But here it is found that over and above its capital it possessed property actually worth upwards of $15,000,000, and we know of no law that is violated, and no public policy that is invaded by issuing to the stockholders stock to represent that amount of property rather than in any mode to divide it up and distribute it among them. If it can issue stock in payment of property to be obtained by it as part of its capital for its legitimate uses, why may it not issue stock to its stockholders in payment for property in effect purchased of them and added to its permanent capital, and which they relinquish the right to have divided? So long as every dollar of stock issued by a corporation is represented by a dollar of property, no harm can result to individuals or the public from distributing the stock to the stockholders. Here there was no fraud, no conspiracy, no unlawful combination, and we are bound, under the findings of the court at Special Term, to assume that all this was done in good faith; and we know of no principle of law, no public policy, and no statute that condemns a stock dividend under such circumstances. * * * [Citations omitted.]

It is true that this dividend largely increases the capital stock of the company, but that is not against the policy of our laws. That cannot be against the policy of the law which the law expressly permits. There is no limit to the capital which business corporations in this State may have, and there is no limit in the law beyond which they may not increase their capital. All that can be required in any case is that there shall be an actual capital in property representing the amount of share capital issued. Indeed, so far as the solvency and responsibility of a corporation is concerned, they are increased by a stock dividend where it has a surplus of property to correspond to the amount of shares issued. In such case the surplus property is secured and impounded for the benefit of the creditors of the corporation and for the public, so that thereafter it can never be legally divided, withdrawn or dissipated in any way.

But if it can be conceived that this was a dividend of property within the meaning of the section of the Revised Statutes above set out, then what property did it divide? Not any portion of the capital of the company; that remained intact. After subtracting the dividend there remained to the company the full amount of its prior stock, to-wit: Property to the value of $41,073,410. Such is the finding of the trial court, and that cannot here be disputed. The company had made surplus earnings which it could have divided, but instead of dividing them it had invested them in property to facilitate and enlarge its business; and such property was found to be worth $15,526,590. That sum constituted its surplus. It was commingled with the other property of the company and used for corporate purposes. But it was not beyond the reach of the dividend-making power of the directors. They could reclaim it for division among the stockholders, and, if practicable, convert it into cash for that purpose. They could borrow money on the faith of it and divide that. They could issue to the stockholders certificates of indebtedness, redeemable in the future, representing their respective interests in such surplus, thus, in effect, borrowing the same of the stockholders. Desiring to use the surplus and add it to the permanent capital of the company, and having lawfully created shares of stock, they could issue to the stockholders such shares to represent their respective interests in such surplus. In doing these things no law would be violated, the capital would be kept intact, and no stockholders or creditors would have any legal right to complain. All this, however, depends upon the findings of the trial court that the surplus is equal to the dividend. That finding is not open to criticism here. It was not disturbed at the General Term and therefore concludes us.

When a corporation has a surplus, whether a dividend shall be made, and if made, how much it shall be, and when and where it shall be payable, rest in the fair and honest discretion of the directors uncontrollable by the courts. Brown v. Monmouthshire R'y & C. Co., 4 Eng.L. & Eq. 118; Rex v. Bank of England, 2 Barn. & Ald. 620; Jackson's Adm'rs v. Newark Plank Road Co., 31 N.J.L. 277; Ely v. Sprague, Clark's Ch. 351. There is no statute which requires dividends in telegraph companies or in companies generally to be made in cash. Whether they shall be made in cash or property must also rest in the discretion of the directors. There is no rule or law or reason founded upon public policy which condemns a property dividend. The directors could convert the property into cash before a dividend and divide that. So the stockholders can take the property divided to them and sell it and thus realize the cash. Within the domain of law, it can make no material difference which course is pursued. If, however, a dividend be made payable in cash or payable generally, the corporation becomes a debtor, and must discharge such debt, as it is bound to discharge all its other debts, in lawful currency. It is true that a stockholder cannot be compelled to receive property divided to him. So he cannot be compelled to take a cash dividend. In case of his refusal to take a cash dividend, the corporation may retain it for him until he shall demand it. In case he shall refuse to take a property dividend, the corporation may retain it and hold it in trust for him, or possibly sell it for his benefit. If such a case shall ever arise, the courts will find some way to dispose of it. So this plaintiff cannot be compelled to accept the stock divided to him, and thus incur the possible liability which it may impose upon him as a stockholder. In case of his refusal, the corporation will find some way to deal with the stock which the law will sanction, but which need not now be pointed out.

We have no occasion to scrutinize the motives of the defendants. The trial judge refused to find the alleged fraud and conspiracy, and his finding concludes us. In his opinion he said: "I have also found that the other allegations of fraud and conspiracy made in the complaint against the defendants and others were not proved on the trial. One of the very able counsel for the plaintiff, in his argument at the close of the trial in this case, said that he was not going to lament the fact that he had failed to show such combination, that he had not been able to prove certain things by the defendants;" and the opinion of the court at the General Term is to the same effect; "The complaint, among other things, charges that the corporate action complained of was the result of a fraudulent conspiracy on the part of the individual defendants, but the allegations in that respect were not sustained by the proof at the trial, nor has there been an argument made in their support upon the present appeal."

We are therefore, of opinion upon the facts, found at Special Term, that the stock dividend was authorized by law and, therefore, valid. * * *

Order of General Term reversed and judgment accordingly.[14]

NOTES

(A) "To maintain that a share dividend is merely a bookkeeping transaction is to ignore realities; it is demonstrable that, all other factors remaining the same, the declaration of a share dividend normally results in an appreciation of the shares outstanding; furthermore, the payment of a share dividend at once alters

---

[14] On the nature of a stock dividend, see: Berle and Means, The Modern Corporation and Private Property, 1932, 197–199; Reiter, Profits, Dividends and the Law, 1926, 203–206; Seligman, Studies in Public Finance, 1925, c. 5, esp. 115 et seq.; Ballantine and Hills, Corporate Capital and Restrictions upon Dividends under Modern Corporation Laws, 1935, 23 Calif.L.Rev. 229, 255; Hills, Model Corporation Act, 1935, 48 Harv.L.Rev. 1334, 1368–1370; Sparger, Profits, Surplus and the Payment of Dividends, 1929, 8 N.C.L.Rev. 14, 24–27.

See, Katz, Accounting Problems in Corporate Distributions, 1941, 89 U. of Pa.L. Rev. 764, 774–776.

the shareholder's position by reducing the corporate funds available for cash distribution, and in order to realize the cash which he might formerly have received by way of a cash dividend, the shareholder must sell some of his shares and thus decrease his proportionate interest in voting control and in assets and net earnings." Note, 1930, 39 Yale L.J. 1163, 1169–1170.

(B) If a stockholder is entitled only to a fractional part of a share of dividend stock, he may be given, (1) a cash payment representing the fractional share; (2) scrip exchangeable for shares; [15] or (3) a credit toward a full share. See, Waring, Fractional Shares under Stock Dividend Declarations, 1931, 44 Harv.L.Rev. 404.

POWELL et al. v. MARYLAND TRUST COMPANY.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Fourth Circuit, 1942.[16] 125 F.2d 260.

Action between Legh R. Powell, Jr., and another, as receivers of the properties of Seaboard Air Line Railway Company, the New York Trust Company, and another as trustees of the Seaboard Air Line Railway refunding mortgage and the Maryland Trust Company, as successor trustee under the first mortgage of Seaboard Air Line Railway dated April 14, 1900. From the decree, Legh R. Powell, Jr., and another, as receivers of the properties of the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company and the New York Trust Company and another, as trustees of Seaboard Air Line Railway refunding mortgage, appeal, and Maryland Trust Company, as successor trustee, cross-appeals.

Decree modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

PARKER, CIRCUIT JUDGE. These are appeals in a three-sided controversy which has arisen in the receivership of the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company, with relation to a stock dividend and certain cash dividends on stock owned by the Seaboard in the Richmond-Washington company and pledged with the predecessor of the Maryland Trust Company, as trustee. This stock, 4,450 shares in amount, was pledged in 1901 by the corporation to whose rights the Seaboard succeeded with the Continental Trust Company, predecessor of the Maryland Trust Company, as trustee under a first mortgage executed to secure a bond issue. On October 18, 1930 a 50% stock dividend was declared on this stock; and on October 31, 1930, certificates for 2,225 shares were delivered to the Seaboard as the stock dividend on its shares. On December 23, 1930, receivers were appointed for the Seaboard, and the certificates representing the stock dividend passed into their possession. The receivers collected cash dividends on the original shares of stock up to January 4, 1932, and on the stock dividend shares up to the time of the decree of the court below.

The Maryland Trust Company, the trustee under the first mortgage, claims both the stock dividend and the total of the cash dividends by virtue of the rights vested in it by the pledge of the original shares of stock under the first mortgage. The receivers deny the right of the first mortgage trustee to either the stock dividend or the cash dividends, claim a lien on both under the order appointing receivers and also under the orders authorizing issuance of receivers' certificates and assert that any rights of the first mortgage trustee have been lost by waiver and estoppel. The New York Trust Company joins the receivers in denying the right of the first mortgage trustee to the shares of stock represented by the stock dividend and also to the cash dividends paid thereon, but claims for itself these shares of stock and cash dividends under the terms of a refunding mortgage executed by the Seaboard.

[15] Some states make express statutory provision for the issuance of scrip to represent ownership of a fractional share of stock. E. g., Ill.Business Corporation Act, § 22, Smith-Hurd Stats. c. 32, § 157.22; Ohio Gen.Code, § 8623–30. Conn.Gen. Stat. 1930, § 3417, expressly prohibits the issue of any certificates representing fractional shares. Whenever fractional rights result from an increase or reduction of capital stock, and these rights are not bought or sold by the stockholders, the directors must sell such rights to the highest bidder and issue proper certificates therefor.

[16] Cert. denied 316 U.S. 671, 62 S.Ct. 1041 (1942).

The controversy was referred by the court below to the late J. E. Heath, as special master, who in an able and comprehensive report found for the first mortgage trustee both as to the stock dividend and the total of the cash dividends claimed. This report was affirmed by the judge in all respects, except as to a cash dividend of $20,025 paid December 31, 1930, which he held to belong to the receivers. From this decree all parties have appealed; and in the view which we take of the case four questions are presented for our determination, viz: (1) Did the stock dividend on the Richmond-Washington stock belong to the first mortgage trustee? (2) Was the first mortgage trustee entitled to the cash dividends mentioned, including the $20,025 paid December 31, 1930? (3) Were the receivers vested with a lien upon either the stock dividend or the cash dividends by the order appointing receivers or the orders authorizing issuance of receivers' certificates? (4) Have the rights of the first mortgage trustee with respect either to the stock or the cash dividends been lost by waiver or estoppel? We think that the first two of these questions should be answered in the affirmative and the last two in the negative. We shall consider them separately and in the order named. The answers to the first two questions render it unnecessary to consider a number of subsidiary questions arising in connection with the contentions of the New York Trust Company.

1. The Stock Dividend.

The Seaboard Air Line was one of six railroads which owned in equal shares the stock of the Richmond-Washington Company, a holding company which owned the Richmond Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad, over which the trains of the Seaboard are operated between Richmond and Washington. It originally held 4,450 shares of this Richmond-Washington stock, which in the year 1901 it pledged with the Continental Trust Company, predecessor of the Maryland Trust Company, as trustee under a first mortgage to secure a bond issue. The stock is not expressly mentioned in the mortgage, which provides, however, for the pledging of stocks, bonds and other property to the trustee to be held subject to the terms of the mortgage. Section 1 of article III of the mortgage contains the following provision: "Unless (a) the 'Railroad Company' shall be in default in the payment of some interest upon any of the bonds secured by this indenture, or on any of said outstanding divisional bonds (other than bonds held by the 'Trustee' hereunder), and such default shall have continued for a period of six months; or unless (b) the 'Railroad Company' shall be in default in the due and punctual payment of the principal of any bond secured hereby, or of any of said outstanding divisional bonds hereinbefore mentioned; or unless (c) the 'Railroad Company' shall be in default in the payment of any tax, assessment or other governmental charge lawfully imposed or levied upon any part of the property and premises hereby mortgaged, or the income and profits thereof, and such default shall have continued for a period of six months, after written notice thereof from the 'Trustee,' or from the holders of five per cent in amount of the bonds secured hereby; or unless (d) the 'Railroad Company' shall be in default in the due performance and observance of any covenant or condition of this indenture, and such default shall have continued beyond the period of grace, if any, herein provided for, in respect of such default, and the 'Trustee' shall have entered, or shall have elected to enter, into possession under the power of entry hereinafter conferred; or unless (e) the 'Railroad Company' voluntarily shall have surrendered to the 'Trustee' possession of the mortgaged premises as hereinafter authorized—the 'Trustee' (except with the assent of the 'Railroad Company') shall not collect or be entitled to collect the interest of any of the bonds or claims or indebtedness now or hereafter pledged with or assigned to the 'Trustee' under this indenture, and the 'Railroad Company' shall be entitled to receive all interest paid or dividends declared in respect of any bonds or stocks transferred to or pledged with the 'Trustee' pursuant to any of the provisions of this indenture, * * *."

On September 18, 1930 the Board of Directors of the Richmond-Washington Company voted a stock dividend of 50%, payable in stock October 31, 1930; and on the last named date certificates evidencing 2,225 shares of the capital stock of the company were delivered to the Seaboard as stock dividend on the 4,450 shares which it held and which it had pledged with the first mortgage trustee. Receivers were appointed for the Seaboard on December 23, 1930, and these certificates, of which the first mortgage trustee had no notice or knowledge until some time later, passed into their possession. The evidence shows that the earnings of the Richmond-Washington Company which justified the declaration of the stock dividend accrued subsequent to the pledge of the stock with the first mortgage trustee. It shows, also, what is to be expected in such cases, that immediately following the stock dividend the total book value of the original shares plus the shares issued as stock dividend was precisely the same as the book value of the original shares immediately prior to the dividend. The book value of each of the shares of stock immediately prior to the stock dividend was $263.75, immediately after the dividend, $175.83.

The mortgage was delivered to the first mortgage trustee and accepted by it in Baltimore, Md., and the shares of stock which were pledged were delivered to it there; and there is no serious question but that the law of Maryland is the law properly applicable in determining the rights of the parties with respect to the stock dividend.

In the absence of the provision of the mortgage quoted above, there could be no question but that the shares of stock issued as stock dividend would go to the first mortgage trustee, as pledgee of the original shares of stock, to be held by it under the terms of the pledge. Gemmell v. Davis, 75 Md. 543, 23 A. 1032, 32 Am.St.Rep. 412; Railroad Credit Corp. v. Hawkins, 4 Cir., 80 F.2d 818; Jones on Collateral Securities, 3d Ed., sec. 298. The question involved, therefore, is the interpretation of the word "dividends" as contained in the provision under which "dividends" were reserved to the Seaboard, i.e. was the reservation to the Seaboard of the right to "dividends" until default under the mortgage intended to reserve to it the right to stock dividends? We think the answer to this must be in the negative, both because a contrary interpretation would be unreasonable in the light of surrounding circumstances, and because, even in the absence of such circumstances, a stock dividend is not ordinarily included in the term "dividends" as contained in a contract relating to dividends, in the absence of a clear indication that it was intended that they should be so included.

It must be remembered that the Richmond-Washington stock pledged by the Seaboard with the first mortgage trustee represented a one-sixth interest in the railroad over which the trains of the Seaboard between Richmond and Washington were operated; and the fair inference is that it was intended that this interest in the road was to remain pledged with the trustee as security for the bonds. Cash dividends on the stock i. e. amounts paid in cash to stockholders from the earnings of the corporation, were to be enjoyed by the Seaboard so long as it was not in default; but it is hardly to be supposed that the parties could have intended that the Seaboard should have free of the pledge a stock dividend representing a mere capital readjustment, and that the proportionate interest of the first mortgage trustee in the property represented by the stock which had been pledged with it should be thus reduced. The fact that the mortgage contained specific provision that "consolidation, merger, sale or lease" of any company whose stock was pledged with the first mortgage trustee might be made only "upon such terms as shall not in any manner impair the value of the security hereunder" (art. III sec. 6) shows a clear intention that the value of the security pledged should not be impaired by corporate manipulation. And nothing to the contrary is to be inferred from the anti-dilution clause of article II section 8 of the mortgage. Provision was made therein for the preservation of rights in the properties of constituent companies, the majority of whose stock had been assigned to the trustee; but this does not in any way indicate an intention that the rights of the trustee in properties represented by other stocks pledged might be decreased by allowing the Seaboard to have free of pledge stock dividends which might be declared with respect thereto. If any inference is to be drawn from this anti-dilution clause, it is favorable to the position of the first mortgage trustee rather than otherwise.

And quite apart from the peculiar circumstances of the case, which show very clearly, we think, that stock dividends were not intended to be included among the "dividends" reserved to the Seaboard by the terms of the mortgage, the rule is well settled that the word "dividends" in contracts relating to the sale or transfer of stocks is not ordinarily to be construed as embracing stock dividends, which are not true dividends at all but a mere certified expression of an undivided surplus and its capitalization. Eisner v. Macomber, 252 U.S. 189, 210, 211, 40 S.Ct. 189, 64 L.Ed. 521, 9 A.L.R. 1570. The precise question is not covered by any Maryland decision; but it is worthy of note that in the case of Smith v. Hooper, 95 Md. 16, 51 A. 844, 846, 54 A. 95, Chief Judge McSherry quotes with approval from Spooner v. Phillips, 62 Conn. 62, 24 A. 524, 16 L.R.A. 461, that "the word 'dividend,' if unqualified * * * signifies dividends payable in money." Mr. Justice Gray, speaking for the Supreme Court in Gibbons v. Mahon, 136 U.S. 549, 10 S.Ct. 1057, 1059, 34 L.Ed. 525, thus states the essential nature of a stock dividend: "A stock dividend really takes nothing from the property of the corporation, and adds nothing to the interests of the shareholders. Its property is not diminished, and their interests are not increased. After such a dividend, as before, the corporation has the title in all the corporate property; the aggregate interests therein of all the shareholders are represented by the whole number of shares; and the proportional interest of each shareholder remains the same. The only change is in the evidence which represents that interest, the new shares and the original shares together representing the same proportional interest that the original shares represented before the issue of new ones."

And the distinction between the essential character of an ordinary dividend and a stock dividend is thus drawn in the opinion of the lower court in Gibbons v. Mahon, 4 Mackey 130, 136, 54 Am.Rep. 262, quoted with approval by Mr. Justice Gray in the Supreme Court: "Certificates of stock are simply the representative of the interest which the stockholder has in the capital of the corporation. Before the issue of these two hundred and eighty new shares, this trustee held precisely the same interest in this increased plant in the capital of the corporation, that she held afterwards. She merely had a new representative of an interest that she already owned, and which was not increased by the issue of the new shares. A dividend is something with which the corporation parts, but it parted with nothing in issuing this new stock. It simply gave a new evidence of ownership which already existed. They were not in any sense, therefore, dividends for which this trustee had to account to the cestui que trust. She stood, after the issue of the new shares, just as she had stood before; and the trustee was obliged to treat them just as she did, namely, as a part of the original, and to pay the dividends to the cestui que trust." (Italics supplied).

A stock dividend is not a true dividend because not involving a severance of corporate assets for distribution to stockholders, but is in its last analysis a mere incident or process of corporate bookkeeping. 18 C.J.S., Corporations, § 466, p. 1110. The word "dividend," when used without qualification or explanation, ordinarily signifies dividends paid in money. 13 A.J. p. 640. It involves a severance from corporate assets of an amount distributed to stockholders, but the stock dividend involves no such severance or distribution of assets. As said by the Supreme Court in Eisner v. Macomber,[17] supra, 252 U.S. 189, 211, 40 S.Ct. 189, 194, 64 L.Ed. 521, 9 A.L.R. 1570: "A 'stock dividend' shows that the company's accumulated profits have been capitalized, instead of distributed to the stockholders or retained as surplus available for distribution in money or in kind should opportunity offer. Far from being a realization of profits of the stockholder, it tends rather to postpone such realization, in that the fund represented by the new stock has been transferred from surplus to capital, and no longer is available for actual distribution."

In McDonald v. Maxwell, 274 U.S. 91, 47 S.Ct. 497, 499, 71 L.Ed. 942, the Supreme Court refused to allow executors in the District of Columbia commissions on stock dividends, on the ground that such dividends represented no increase in the principal of the estate in their hands, saying: "It is apparent, in the light of these decisions, that the stock dividends received by the executors represented no real increase in the principal of the estate during the accounting period. They merely changed the form of the estate's investment in the corporate stocks by increasing the number of its shares, but left the aggregate value of all its shares the same as that before the dividend shares were issued. After their issuance, which necessarily 'diluted' the value of the original shares, the dividend shares and the original shares together represented the same proportional interest in the corporate properties that had previously been represented by the original shares alone; no more and no less."

In a controversy arising between a life tenant and remainderman as to the right to a stock dividend, the Supreme Court of Missouri, in Hayes v. St. Louis Union Trust Co., 317 Mo. 1028, 298 S.W. 91, 98, 56 A.L.R. 1276, 1285, a well considered decision, puts the matter thus: "A stock dividend is not in any true sense a dividend at all. The latter implies a division, a severance from the corporate assets of the subject of the dividend, and a distribution thereof among the stockholders. McLaran v. Crescent Planing Mill Co., 117 Mo.App. 40, 93 S.W. 819; 14 C.J. p. 798; 5 Thompson on Corporations 2d Ed. p. 84, § 5270. The issuance of a stock dividend is, in its last analysis, nothing more than an incident or process in corporation bookkeeping. The important step is the increasing of the fixed capital of the corporation. The outstanding shares of stock are increased to balance, either by adding to their number or raising their par value. When the stock has no par value, it seems even this is unnecessary. Nothing is taken from the corporation. Nothing is given to the stockholders, rather the contrary, for corporate profits theretofore available for distribution in dividends are permanently appropriated to its fixed capital. The title to all corporate property remains in the corporation as before. The proportional interest of each stockholder continues the same; the only change is in the evidence of his interest in the corporation—that is, the number of his shares of stock is increased and the book value of each share correspondingly decreased, or the face value of his shares of stock is raised to or toward what their intrinsic value was before."

---

17 There is nothing to the contrary in such cases as Koshland v. Helvering, 298 U.S. 441, 56 S.Ct. 767, 80 L.Ed. 1268, 105 A.L.R. 756, and United States v. Phellis, 257 U.S. 156, 42 S.Ct. 63, 66 L.Ed. 180, which hold that, for purposes of taxation, distinction must be drawn between a stock dividend which, like the one here involved, works no change in the corporate entity, the same interest in the same corporation being represented after the distribution by more shares of precisely the same character, and a stock dividend which involves changes of corporate identity or a change in the nature of shares issued, whereby the proportional interest of the stockholder after distribution is essentially different from his former interest.

A case directly in point here, because dealing with a reservation of dividends, is Lancaster Trust Co. v. Mason, 152 N.C. 660, 68 S.E. 235, 236, 136 Am.St.Rep. 851. In that case an offer to sell corporate stock, which was accepted, contained the following expression, "allowing the January dividend to us". A stock dividend of 50% and a regular cash dividend of 4% and an extra cash dividend of 6% were declared in January. The Supreme Court of North Carolina held that both cash dividends were retained by the seller under this provision of the contract, but that the stock dividend went to the purchaser with the stock purchased. The court, citing the Maryland case of Smith v. Hooper, supra, said: "Upon a careful review of the correspondence between the parties and a further consideration of the case we are led to the conclusion that the words 'allowing the January dividend to us,' used in plaintiff's letter of December 23, 1907, were intended to refer to dividends payable in cash only, and do not embrace the so-called 'stock dividend' of 50 per cent. That was not strictly or in the usual sense of the word a dividend. It was simply an increase in the capital stock by dividing the capital of the corporation into a larger number of shares and allotting them to each stockholder in proportion to the number of shares he owned before the increase. This is not infrequent in these days when 'watering stock' is no uncommon occurrence; not that we mean to intimate that such has been the case here. Therefore it has been held that where the word 'dividend' is used without qualification or explanation, it signifies dividends payable in money: 14 Cyc. 554, and cases cited; Black, Law Dict.; 3 Words & Phrases [First Series] pp. 2143, 2144; Smith v. Hooper, 95 Md. 16, 51 A. 844, 54 A. 95." (Italics supplied.)

Kaufman v. Charlottesville Woolen Mills Co., 93 Va. 673, 25 S.E. 1003, 1004, was another case in which dividends on stock sold were retained by the seller. In holding that the word dividends did not include a stock dividend, the court said: "In the case at bar it is clear, on reason and authority, that the proper construction of the contract between the parties is that Kaufman retained to himself whatever dividend was declared in January, 1896, as the ordinary and usual fruit of the investment he was parting with. This he received when the cash dividend of 10 per cent. declared for the stockholders was paid to him. The stock dividend of 27 per cent. represented part of the corporate property sold to Hotopp, in which Kaufman reserved no interest, and was therefore not entitled to the whole or any part thereof." * * *

In the light of these authorities as well as of the circumstances surrounding the transaction, we think there can be no doubt but that the reservation of dividends on the stock pledged should be construed not to include the stock dividend, and that this should go, under the general principles of the law relating to pledges, as recognized in Maryland, to the first mortgage trustee as an essential part of the thing pledged with it. As was well said by the able special master in his report to the court below: "I think that, upon principle, and in view of the meaning of the word dividend in Maryland, where the first mortgage became effective, as well as generally elsewhere, and especially in the States of Virginia and North Carolina, under the laws of which Seaboard No. 1 was incorporated, the first mortgage trustee's position is sound. It will not do to say that this stock dividend represents only profits. It represents profits automatically turned into stock—stock which is not only capable of earnings far in excess of the ordinary return on investments, but which depletes to the extent of one-third the trustee's original holding. * * * By consenting to waive its dividends, it (the trustee) did not consent that the principal of its security should be impaired, save to the extent that the payment of cash dividends would necessarily reduce the assets of the R-W Co. It has never consented that the one-sixth stock interest pledged to it should be reduced, which reduction would automatically result from giving the stock dividend in question to the railway, or to its successors, the receivers, or to the refunding mortgage trustee." * * *

For the reasons stated, the decree appealed from will be modified by adding the amount of the dividend of December 31, 1930, $20,025, to the amount of the dividends which the receivers are ordered to pay over and deliver to the first mortgage trustee, * * * Modified and affirmed.

SOPER, CIRCUIT JUDGE (dissenting). * * * We are told that the stock dividend does not fall within the terms of the contract because a stock dividend is not a true dividend. The leading authorities cited for the rule in the opinion of the court in the pending case are the well known decisions of Gibbons v. Mahon, 136 U.S. 549, 10 S.Ct. 1057, 34 L.Ed. 525, and Eisner v. Macomber, 252 U.S. 189, 40 S.Ct. 189, 64 L.Ed. 521, 9 A.L.R. 1570. These decisions are based upon the logical theory that a stock dividend really takes nothing from the property of the corporation and adds nothing to the interest of the stockholders; that it is not a realization of profits by the stockholders but a transfer of surplus to capital so as to be no longer distributable; while an ordinary dividend is a distribution of profits which the corporation makes and the stockholder realizes. Moreover, it is said that the stock dividend in the pending case cannot fairly be described as a dividend payable to the Railroad Company within the meaning of the contract, because otherwise the interest of the Railroad Company in the Richmond-Washington Company, that originally amounted to a one-sixth interest, would be reduced to a one-ninth interest, and the security of the bondholders would be impaired.

These authorities and others like them, present the reasoning upon which is founded the so-called Massachusetts rule governing the apportionment of dividends between life tenant and remainderman under a trust set up by a will or deed. This rule is that stock dividends, regardless of their source, are invariably treated as corpus, and cash dividends are classified as income. If it is applied by analogy to the facts of the pending case, we must hold that the stock dividend in question belongs to the trustee under the mortgage. But the Massachusetts rule, although favored in the federal courts and in other jurisdictions, is not recognized in the law of Maryland. By a long line of decisions of the Court of Appeals of Maryland, a different theory known as the Pennsylvania rule was firmly embedded in the law of the State when the mortgage under consideration was executed in 1900 and there remained until it was repealed by Chapter 580 of the Laws of Maryland of 1939. [Citing cases.] * * *

The Pennsylvania rule formerly prevailed in New York. It was analyzed by Cardozo, C. J. in Equitable Trust Co. v. Prentice, 250 N.Y. 1, 7, 164 N.E. 723, 63 A.L.R. 263, as follows: "The rule in this state was settled, until changed in 1926 as to subsequent trusts by an amendment of the statute * * * that as between life beneficiary and remainderman a stock dividend would be reckoned as principal or income according to the origin of the surplus out of which it was declared. To the extent that it distributed a surplus existing at the creation of the trust, it would be allocated to principal; to the extent that it distributed a surplus earned thereafter, it would be allocated to income. * * * The search in all these cases was to find the intention of the founder of the trust and then to give effect to it. What is income for a corporation may not be income for a shareholder. * * * What is principal for a shareholder, when taken in his own right, may be income, when held in trust to be divided among others. So, at least, the cases hold. The thought back of them is this: A surplus in the treasury of a corporation, even though not income for the shareholder, is potentially a fund that may be converted into income. The declaration of a stock dividend destroys this potential income, and turns the surplus into capital. The effect may be at times to thwart the plan of apportionment between life tenant and remainderman, as conceived at the foundation. A founder of a trust has conveyed shares to a trustee, to pay the income to wife or child for life, with remainder upon death to others. Did he mean in thus apportioning his estate that potential income might be cut down through the vote of the corporate managers, so that the beneficiary never could resort to it, and principal increased to the profit of remaindermen, perhaps unknown or unborn? We have thought that intention would be best promoted if the fund thus permanently diverted were included in a gift of income. Very likely the word 'dividend' has had a part in shaping the conclusion, for in their typical or common form dividends are income, like other recurrent gains (Lynch v. Hornby, 247 U.S. 339, 344, 38 S.Ct. 543, 62 L.Ed. 1149), and one steps readily into the assumption that the equivalence is absolute." * * *

If this rule is applied in the pending controversy, the stock dividend will go to the Railroad Company, for the source of the dividend was income of the Richmond-Washington Company that had accumulated after the pledge of the stock was made, and the result will be that the Railroad Company will have the benefit of this income while the pledged stock remaining in the hands of the mortgage trustee will still be maintained at its original value. * * *

It is true that an award of the stock divided to the Railroad Company in this case would reduce the proportionate control held by the pledgee in the Richmond-Washington Company. But exactly the same impairment of the principal of a trust estate occurs when a stock dividend is given to the life tenant, and it cannot be that the rights of a pledgee are more sacred than those of a remainderman. The latter is sufficiently protected in the eye of the Maryland law if the value of the capital and accumulated surplus at the beginning of the trust is preserved in the principal of the trust estate. The same line of reasoning should govern us in our decision upon the pending appeal.

(2) PROPERTY DIVIDENDS

VENNER v. SOUTHERN PACIFIC CO.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Second Circuit, 1922. 279 F. 832.

Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Suit in equity by Clarence H. Venner against the Southern Pacific Company and others. Decree for defendants, and complainant appeals.

The plaintiff is a citizen and resident of the city and state of New York. The defendant, the Southern Pacific Company, hereinafter called the Southern Company, is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Kentucky. The plaintiff is the owner and holder of 200 shares of the capital stock of the Southern Company, of the par value of $100 each. The outstanding capital stock of the Southern Company is approximately $302,000,000, all common stock. The company also has outstanding approximately $45,539,000 of 5 per cent. bonds, which are convertible into stock at par.

The Pacific Oil Company, hereinafter called the Oil Company, also named as a defendant, is a corporation organized under the general corporation laws of the State of Delaware, with a capital stock of 3,500,000 shares, of no par value. The individual defendants are directors of one or both of the defendant corporations.

* * * Plaintiff commenced this action * * * on behalf of himself as a stockholder of the Southern Pacific Company, and on behalf of all other stockholders thereof, similarly situated, who may join with the plaintiff. * * * No other stockholder, however, has joined him in the suit. The suit grows out of the separation of the Southern Company's oil properties from its railroad properties, and the distribution of the former to its stockholders; such separation being necessary to enable the Southern Company to conform with the commodities clause (section 1) of the Hepburn Act, 34 Stat. 585,[18] and which makes it

---

18 34 Stat. 585, 1906, § 1: "* * * From and after May first, nineteen hundred and eight, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company to transport from any unlawful for any railroad company to transport in interstate commerce any article or commodity manufactured, mined, or produced by it, or under its authority, or which it may own in whole or in part, or in which it may have any interest, direct or indirect, except such articles or commodities as may be necessary and intended for its use in the conduct of its business as a common carrier.

The complaint attempts to set forth two causes of action—one by Venner directly against the two defendant corporations, to enjoin or rescind the separation and distribution above mentioned, depending upon whether or not the separation and distribution had been consummated; and the other a derivative suit by Venner, through the Southern Company, seeking to hold the other defendants liable to the Southern Company for any loss which it may have sustained by reason of the consummation of the plan for the separation and distribution of its oil properties. It appears that the Oil Company purchased the oil properties from the Southern Pacific Land Company, one of the Southern Company's subsidiaries, and that the consideration for the sale of the oil properties was paid in cash. The true facts are fully set forth in the circular letters sent by the Southern Company to the holders of its stock and convertible bonds.

Letters stated that the Oil Company would be organized under the laws of the state of Delaware with a capital stock of 3,500,000 shares, of no par value, for which the Southern Company would subscribe at $15 per share; that from the amount so realized, namely, $52,500,000, the Oil Company would purchase from the Southern Pacific Land Company for $43,750,000 about 259,000 acres of oil lands in California and 200,690 shares of the capital stock of the Associated Oil Company; that the entire capital stock of the Land Company is owned by the Southern Company, and that by the sale of these properties the Land Company would thus receive $43,750,000 in cash and the Oil Company would retain $8,750,000 as working capital; that the holders of the capital stock of the Southern Company, registered as such at the close of business on January 14, 1921, would be given the right to purchase at $15 per share, payment to be made therefor on or before March 1, 1921, one share of stock of the Oil Company for each share of the Southern Company's stock so held; that the stock of the Oil Company was fixed at 3,500,000 shares, to correspond as nearly as might be to the total number of shares of Southern Company's stock outstanding, together with the shares reserved for the conversion of its convertible bonds; that warrants would be issued to the stockholders as soon as possible after the closing of the books on January 14, 1921, specifying the amount of stock of the Oil Company which each stockholder was entitled to purchase; that on the back of the warrants would be two forms, one to be filled out and signed by the stockholder, if he desired to purchase the stock, and the other to be filled out and signed by the stockholder in case it was desired to dispose of the privilege of purchase; and, finally that all of the state * * * to any other state * * * any article or commodity, other than timber and the manufactured products thereof, manufactured, mined, or produced by it * * * or in which it may have any interest * * * except such articles or commodities as may be necessary and intended for its use in the conduct of its business as a common carrier. * * *" warrants not returned to the treasurer of the Southern Company on or before March 1, 1921, with payment in full for the stock represented thereby, would be void and of no value.

---

The complaint also alleges that no stockholders' meeting of defendant Southern Company had been held or called for the purpose of authorizing or ratifying the plan, and that the plaintiff had not in any wise consented thereto, but, on the contrary, shortly after its promulgation, and after informing himself of the meaning and effect of same, he sent to the defendant company and its directors on the 10th day of December, 1920, a letter duly protesting against said plan and the action taken by the board of directors of the Southern Company in respect thereof, but the defendants refused to abandon said plan and insisted upon carrying the same into effect.

The complaint also alleges that the plaintiff is unwilling to subscribe to the stock of the said new corporation, to wit, the Oil Company, and unless he does so subscribe, in case the said proposed plan is carried into effect as intended, he will be deprived, as a stockholder of the defendant Southern Company, of all right and interest in or to certain property in which he is now a part owner as a stockholder of the Southern Company, and which property and the title to the same is to be wrongfully and illegally transferred from the said Southern Company, or its subsidiary, the Southern Pacific Land Company, to the Oil Company and to the stockholders thereof, and that the completion of the said proposed plan will deprive the plaintiff and other stockholders, who are unwilling to subscribe to the stock of the said new corporation, of his and their interest as stockholders in the Southern Company, in and to said property, by force against his and their will, without due process of law, and without adequate compensation therefor. It is alleged that the plan which the defendants have decided to consummate is unjust, illegal, and ultra vires.

An injunction is asked to restrain defendants from carrying their plan into effect, and that, in the event of the plan being consummated during the pendency of the action, a judgment may be entered, setting aside and declaring null and void all deeds of conveyance * * * of the property involved, and that the Oil Company be ordered to reconvey to the Southern Company * * * the said properties. * * *

ROGERS, Circuit Judge (after stating the facts as above). * * * This brings us to a consideration of the merits and whether the bill of complaint was properly dismissed on the ground that it fails to disclose a cause of action. The plaintiff asserts that the plan devised by the defendants is ultra vires, illegal, and void and on that ground he has brought this suit for rescission.

The plaintiff owns 200 shares, par value $100 each, of the capital stock of the Southern Company, which stock he acquired in 1916, and it is fully paid and nonassessable. He sues as such stockholder upon his own behalf, and on behalf of all other stockholders similarly situated, who may join with him and contribute to the expenses of the suit. No other stockholder, however, has joined in the suit. The fact that the plaintiff owns a relatively small amount of the stock and is the only stockholder bringing the suit constitutes no reason why his rights should not be protected, if they are being illegally violated.

The Southern Company was not obliged by its charter or by any law to continue to hold and operate its oil properties. Its continued ownership or possession of those properties was not essential to its corporate life and business. Its disposal of them was not equivalent to a dissolution of the corporation, and did not work a frustration of the corporate enterprise. At the time the directors adopted "the plan to dispose of the oil properties, the Supreme Court had rendered its decision in United States v. Reading Co., 253 U.S. 26, 40 S.Ct. 425, 64 L.Ed. 760, and there was pending in that court the case of United States v. Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., 254 U.S. 255, 41 S.Ct. 104, 65 L.Ed. 253, the decision in which was handed down five days after the plan was adopted. Congress had adopted on June 29, 1906, the Hepburn Act (34 Stat. pt. 1, p. 585), containing the commodities clause, and it seemed to the directors to be a wise step to divorce its transportation business from its other enterprises, and that, as it could not develop its oil properties so long as it directly or indirectly owned them, it should dispose of them. It was therefore determined that they should be distributed to the stockholders.

But it was not feasible to distribute them in kind. It was thought best to organize the Oil Company as a means of facilitating the distribution. The plan was accordingly devised of fixing the capitalization of the new company at a figure which would give the stockholders of the Southern Company stock in the new company share for share. But it was concluded not to distribute to the stockholders the entire value of the oil properties, but that a portion of the value should be retained by the Southern Company and that only the excess over $43,750,000 should be distributed to the stockholders. As it was, however, desirable to separate entirely the oil properties from the transportation properties, it was decided that the Southern Company should not itself retain any portion of the Oil Company's stock, but should instead distribute all of the stock and charge the stockholders a portion of its value. They proposed, therefore, to offer the stock to their stockholders at $15 per share. The question of whether the plan decided was ultra vires does not depend upon whether it was wise or unwise, but in passing we may point out that, out of more than 3,000,000 shares, the plaintiff, holding 200 shares, is the sole dissenter who objects or assails the validity of what the directors adopted.

When a business corporation possesses a surplus in excess of the amount of its capital, the directors in their discretion may distribute it among the stockholders in proportion to their shares, and the fund so distributed is a "dividend." This discretion of the directors is subject to certain restrictions, so that no discrimination can be made between the stockholders in the mode of distribution agreed upon. But the discretion is unrestricted as to whether the distribution shall be made in cash, or in bonds, or in property, and under some circumstances in stock. Whether the directors shall sell the property, thereby converting it into cash, and make the dividend payable in cash, is a matter solely within their discretion; and in the particular case now before the court they decided not to sell the property. If the corporation has stock in reserve, which it has not yet disposed of, or if it has the right under its charter to increase its capital stock, it is clear that the distribution may be made by means of a stock dividend.

In this case the charter gave the corporation, as already stated, the power to acquire stock in any then existing corporation, or in one thereafter formed, and to deal in all kinds of stock "in such manner as may * * * be determined by the directors of said corporation." In the exercise of that discretion it was decided that a new corporation should be formed to hold the oil properties, which should be transferred to it, and that the shares of its stock, representing the property transferred should be distributed among the stockholders of the Southern Company. We are unable to see why, under the broad powers expressly conferred upon the directors of that company, that method of distribution of the property among the stockholders was not within the discretion of the governing body, the directors.

When the directors came to the conclusion that the best interests of the Southern Company required that its oil properties should be segregated and disposed of, they were at liberty to accomplish that result by a sale of the properties to third persons; but there certainly was nothing in the company's charter which made procedure by way of sale compulsory. It was for the directors, under the powers which the charter gave them to determine whether it was desirable to adopt that method or some other. They might very well have concluded that a sufficient number of potential purchasers could not be found to make it probable that the company would receive full value for the properties which the plaintiff claims were worth at least $143,750,000. For that or some other reason which seemed to them sufficient they chose not to proceed by way of sale.

So they might have decided to accomplish the segregation and disposal of the properties by making an absolute gift of the whole of them to the stockholders. But for reasons which it is not within the province of this court to review they did not decide to adopt that method. But they concluded that it would promote the best interests of the Southern Company that it should receive something for the properties which it was proposed to turn over to the stockholders in the manner finally decided upon. The properties to be parted with not being divisible in kind, they decided to keep them together by a transfer to a corporation organized for the purpose and distributed through the stock of such corporation and that the stock should be offered to all the stockholders of the Southern Company pro rata, and on such terms as not to operate oppressively or unequally.

The directors therefore gave to holders of stock of the Southern Company the right to purchase at $15 per share, one share of stock of the new company for each share of Southern Company stock held at the close of business on January 14, 1921, and registered on the books of the company at that time. It placed the stockholder in a position where it was necessary for him to do one of two things to benefit himself or avoid a loss: (1) Buy the stock of the new company at $15 a share, the stock being worth much more than the price at which it was offered; or (2) sell his right to buy such stock. If the stockholder should refuse either to buy or to sell his right to buy, and should consequently suffer a loss in the lessened value of his Southern Company's stock, the loss would be self-imposed, and would not properly be attributable to the action of the directors.

To say that this plan practically amounted to selling a man what already belonged to him is, of course, quite unwarranted, and is based on a misconception of the law. That a stockholder as such is not the owner of any part of the corporate property is so well established in the law as to need no citation of authorities to support it.

The complaint alleged that no stockholders' meeting of the Southern Company was held or called for the purpose of authorizing or ratifying the plan which the directors adopted for the transfer of the properties. But no action by the stockholders was necessary. It is quite true that the directors of a corporation cannot as a rule unless authorized to do so by the shareholders, sell out en masse all its property, and thus put an end to its business and defeat the objects of its creation. Geddes v. Anaconda Copper Mining Co., 254 U.S. 590, 596, 41 S.Ct. 209, 65 L.Ed. 425; Chicago City Railway Co. v. Allerton, 18 Wall. 233, 21 L.Ed. 902; Rollins v. Clay, 33 Me. 132. But they have, of course, even such power where it is conferred upon them by the charter or by statute. St. Louis v. St. Louis Gaslight Co., 70 Mo. 69. In the charter of the Southern Company it was expressly provided that the corporation might sell "all kinds of personal and real property to such amount as the directors * * * may determine." We need not inquire whether this would have justified the directors, without authority from the shareholders, in selling out all property of the Southern Company, or such properties as were essential to its corporate life and business. It is enough that the authority conferred was certainly broad enough to warrant the sale of its oil properties, which were not essential to its corporate life and would not bring about an abandonment of the corporate enterprise.

It cannot be claimed that the Southern Company could not lawfully acquire the stock of the Oil Company. The right of one corporation to acquire the stock of another corporation is a question about which a difference of opinion has existed in the courts; but there is no difference of opinion on the question when the charter of the corporation itself expressly authorized it to do so, and such authority is found in the charter of the Southern Company which declares that it may acquire by purchase or otherwise the stocks and securities of that corporation.

Then it is said that the Southern Company could not transfer the oil properties for stock which it purposed to distribute among the stockholders but that the transfer should have been made for money only, for the reason that a stockholder may not lawfully be compelled to accept a change of investment made for him by others or to elect between losing his interest or entering a new company. This question is discussed in Geddes v. Anaconda Copper Mining Co., supra, in a case where all the property of the corporation was sold for the stock without the approval of the stockholders. It did not appear in that case, as it does in this, that the company was expressly authorized to acquire the stock of other corporations. In referring to the rule that the sale of all the assets should be for money only, and that stockholders should not be compelled to accept a change of investment made for them by others, the Supreme Court said:

"But it has been suggested that this rule, also, should be subject to the exception that, when stock which has an established market value is taken in exchange for corporation property, it should be treated as the equivalent of money, and that a sale otherwise valid should be sustained. Noyes, Incorporate Relations, § 120, and cases cited. We approve the soundness of such an exception. It would be a reproach to the law to invalidate a sale otherwise valid, because not made for money, when it is made for stock which a stockholder receiving it may at once, in the New York or other general market, convert into an adequate cash consideration for what his holdings were in the corporate property." 254 U.S. 598, 41 S.Ct. 209, 212, 65 L.Ed. 425.

Courts may take judicial notice of facts of common knowledge and of well-known financial conditions. We are entitled to take notice of the marketability of certain stocks and the practical equivalence of such stocks to cash; and after the action taken by directors of the Southern Company, giving to its stockholders the right to acquire one share of the new stock for each share of the Southern Company stock held by him upon payment of $15, or, if he preferred, the right to assign to another his privilege of purchase, those rights to the public knowledge have been dealt with on the New York Stock Exchange and the New York curb, and have enjoyed a broad and active market. If a stockholder did not desire to take advantage of his right to acquire the new stock, he had a market where he could realize upon his right and in effect receive his proportionate distributive share of the assets transferred to the Oil Company.

The suit shows that a difference of opinion exists between the single stockholder, who brings this suit, and the directors, as to whether the oil properties of the Southern Company should have been segregated together and disposed of at all, or as to whether the entire value of those properties should have been given outright to the stockholders, without anything in the way of compensation to the Southern Company for the loss by it of the revenues consequent upon the transfer of the properties. The judgment of the complaining stockholder is not to be substituted for the judgment of the directors in respect to any such matters, which rested exclusively in the discretion of the directors. It does not seem to us that the directors in anything they have done have violated any legal right possessed by the complaining stockholder.

In Ellerman v. Chicago Junction Railways & Union Stockyards Co., 49 N.J.Eq. 217, 23 A. 287, which was a suit by stockholders to enjoin as ultra vires the execution of an agreement entered into by directors, the court said:

"Individual stockholders cannot question, in judicial proceedings, the corporate acts of directors, if the same are within the powers of the corporation, and, in furtherance of its purposes, are not unlawful or against good morals, and are done in good faith and in the exercise of an honest judgment. Questions of policy of management, of expediency of contracts or action, of adequacy of consideration not grossly disproportionate, of lawful appropriation of corporate funds to advance corporate interests, are left solely to the honest decision of the directors, if their powers are without limitation or free from restraint. To hold otherwise would be to substitute the judgment and discretion of others in the place of those determined on by the scheme of incorporation."

We may also add that it is well settled that, in the absence of usurpation, of fraud, or of gross negligence, courts of equity do not interfere, at the suit of a dissatisfied stockholder merely to overrule or control the discretion of the directors on questions of corporate management or policy. 14 A.C.J. 84; Burden v. Burden, 159 N.Y. 287, 54 N.E. 17; Figge v. Bergenthal, 130 Wis. 594, 109 N.W. 581, 110 N.W. 798. Within the limits of their authority the directors possess full discretionary power. Post v. Buck's Stove & Range Co., 200 F. 918, 119 C.C.A. 214, 43 L.R.A.,N.S., 498.

We do not find in the action complained of that the directors have acted in excess of the powers given them in the charter, or that they have committed any breach of their trust.

Decree affirmed.[19]

BENAS v. TITLE GUARANTY TRUST COMPANY.

St. Louis Court of Appeals of Missouri, 1924. 216 Mo.App. 53, 267 S.W. 28.

Action by George Benas against the Title Guaranty Trust Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

SUTTON, C. This is an action at law. A jury was waived and trial was had before the court, resulting in a judgment in favor of defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

Appellant, a stockholder in respondent company, sued to recover a money judgment for $3,200 against respondent for that it had failed and refused to distribute to him his share of a dividend declared by the respondent.

On March 17, 1915, the board of directors of respondent passed the following resolution, to wit:

"Whereas, a meeting of the stockholders of the Title Guaranty Company is to be held April 13, 1915, for the purpose of reducing the capital stock from $2,500,000 to $1,000,000; and

"Whereas, it is deemed best to declare a dividend of American Trust Company stock to holders of Title Guaranty Trust Company stock, provided the capital stock is reduced as proposed from $2,500,000 to $1,000,000:

"Now, therefore, it is resolved, that a dividend consisting of the shares of the American Trust Company stock be declared and be distributed after the 13th day of April, 1915, provided the stock of said Title Guaranty Trust Company has been reduced from $2,500,000 to $1,000,000."

[19] Certiorari denied, 258 U.S. 628, 42 S.Ct. 461, 66 L.Ed. 799, 1921.

Thereafter, on April 13, 1915, the stockholders passed an appropriate resolution for reducing the capital stock from $2,500,000 to $1,000,-000. This reduction in capital stock became effective under the Missouri statute on the 20th day of April, 1915, being the date upon which a duly certified copy of a statement of the proceedings for such reduction was filed in the office of the bank commissioner of the state of Missouri.

Prior to the reduction of the capital stock, the actual value of the total assets of the respondent did not exceed the sum of $2,196,534.69. Among these assets was all the outstanding stock of the American Trust Company of the actual value of $1,147,000. The total liabilities of respondent were $2,887,182.94, consisting of capital stock liability of $2,500,000 and indebtedness of $387,182.94. Respondent had no surplus, but there existed a deficit of at least $690,648.25. After the reduction of the capital stock, the surplus did not exceed the sum of $809,351.75, and the distribution of the American Trust Company stock as a dividend to respondent's stockholders would have impaired its capital in at least the sum of $337,648.25.

On April 14, 1915, which was six days before the reduction in capital stock became effective, the board of directors of the respondent company passed the following resolution:

"Whereas, a resolution was adopted at the meeting of the board of date March 17, 1915, looking to a distribution of the stock of the American Trust Company after April 13, 1915; and

"Whereas, it is the sense of the board that the time is not now propitious for such distribution, and that it will not be to the interest of the company or its stockholders that such distribution be made:

"Therefore, be it resolved, that no action be taken upon said resolution, that no stock dividend be declared at this time, and said resolution be and the same is hereby rescinded."

None of the stock of the American Trust Company was distributed to respondent's stockholders.

Appellant, as one of the stockholders, made demand upon respondent to deliver to him 26 shares of the American Trust Company stock, which it is conceded was his share of the dividend as declared by the board; but said demand was refused, and appellant brought this suit to recover the value of said 26 shares.

The appellant contends that the declaration of the dividend made on the 13th day of March, 1915, was valid and conclusive, and that its subsequent rescission by the board of directors was unauthorized, and that he is entitled as a matter of law to recover the value of his share of the dividend declared; whereas, the respondent contends that the declaration was ultra vires and void because it undertook to distribute capital in the guise of a dividend, and that the subsequent rescission of the declaration by the board was proper and removed any possible basis of a valid claim by appellant against respondent on account of said declaration.

That under the statutes of this state, it is beyond the power of a corporation such as respondent to declare and distribute dividends out of its capital cannot be questioned. Sections 1132, 1137, 1138, and 1139, R. S. 1909; sections 11825, 11826, 11827, and 11828, R. S. 1919.

Independent of statutory provision, however, it is a fundamental rule that a corporation has no power to make dividends out of capital, but may lawfully declare dividends only out of surplus or profits over and above its capital. It is a corollary to this rule that if a dividend is declared the distribution of which would impair the capital of the corporation, such ultra vires declaration may be subsequently reconsidered and rescinded. [Citing cases] * * *

All this in no way contravenes the familiar rule that a lawful declaration of a dividend out of existing surplus or profits available for that purpose creates a debt against the corporation and in favor of each stockholder for his share of the dividend, and that such declaration may not be rescinded by any subsequent action of the corporation without the consent of the stockholder concerned, as a debtor may not rescind his debt without the consent of his creditor. McLaran v. Planing Mill Co., 117 Mo.App. 40, 93 S.W. 819; Ball v. Cotton Press Co., 141 Mo.App. 26, loc.cit. 42, 121 S.W. 798; Hope Lumber Co. v. Stewart (Mo.App.) 241 S.W. 675. Nor is the rule questioned that a surplus arising from a lawful reduction of the capital stock is available for dividend purposes and may be lawfully distributed as such. [Citing cases.] * * *

In this case the court found upon very substantial evidence that prior to the reduction of its capital stock the actual value of the total assets of the respondent was not more than $2,196,534.69, and that its total liabilities, including its stock liability, amounted to $2,887,182.94, resulting in a deficit or impairment of its capital stock in at least the sum of $690,648.25. Hence the reduction of the capital stock created an actual surplus of only $809,351.75. The evidence further showed, and the court found that the shares of the American Trust Company stock proposed to be distributed as a dividend were of the actual value of $1,147,000. So that the distribution of these shares as a dividend, pursuant to the declaration of the board, would have resulted in the impairment of respondent's capital stock, as reduced, to the amount of $337,648.25. The subsequent rescission of such declaration was therefore not only within the power of the board, but was eminently proper.

The value of respondent's assets, however, as carried on the books of the company and set forth in its statement of the proceedings for the reduction of its capital stock, was such as to show a surplus amply sufficient for the distribution of the dividend declared by the board without any impairment of the capital stock as reduced. The appellant's counsel insist that the books of respondent and its statement of proceedings for the reduction of its capital stock are conclusively determinative of the value of its assets and may not be contradicted or impeached by parol evidence, and assigns as error the admission of parol evidence over his objection to show the actual value of the assets.

Respondent's counsel take the contrary view, which they express in the following language:

"If appellant's theory is correct, namely, that on the question of the validity of dividends the corporation is conclusively bound by the value of its assets as shown upon the books of the company or by documents prepared by its officers, then the law against the declaration of a dividend when there is no surplus or profits might just as well be stricken from the books, because, if appellant's theory is correct, the directors, while they have no power to declare dividends except out of surplus or profits, could easily give themselves power of declaring dividends in the absence of profits, by placing on the books of the company or in documents signed by its officers, either by mistake or otherwise, false values of its assets. The mere statement of the consequences of such a rule is sufficient to show that the rule cannot and does not exist."

This view, we think, is supported upon both principle and authority. [Citing cases.] * * *

In the Siegman Case it is said by the court, speaking through Pitney, J., that while it is a function of the directors of a corporation to determine whether net earnings or surplus exist applicable to the payment of dividends, they cannot, by an erroneous determination of this point, confer either upon themselves or upon the corporation the power to make dividends out of capital. Just this the directors of a corporation may do, if the courts are not permitted to go behind the values of its assets, as written, or caused to be written, by such directors themselves, in the books and documents of the corporation.

Appellant cites and relies on a number of cases wherein corporations were denied the right to contradict or impeach their own records. [Citing cases.] * * *

These cases are clearly distinguishable from the instant case upon their facts and the principles involved in them, and it is obvious without discussion that they lend no sanction to the proposition that the directors of a corporation may confer upon themselves or the corporation power to do that which the law forbids, that is, to declare and distribute a dividend out of its capital, by the very simple and easy process of writing into its books and documents fictitious values of its assets.

The Commissioner recommends that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of SUTTON, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court.

The judgment of the circuit court is, accordingly, affirmed.

4. LIABILITY FOR WRONGFUL DECLARATION

NEW YORK PENAL LAW

§ 664. Misconduct of officers and directors of stock corporations. A director of a stock corporation, who concurs in any vote or act of the directors of such corporation, or any of them, by which it is intended:

1. To make a dividend, except from surplus, and in the cases and manner allowed by law; or,

2. To divide, withdraw, or in any manner pay to the stockholders, or any of them, except as provided or permitted by law, any part of the capital stock of the corporation; or to reduce such capital stock without the consent of the legislature; or, * * *

5. To apply any portion of the funds of such corporation, except surplus, directly or indirectly, to the purchase of shares of its own stock, except as provided or permitted by law.

Is guilty of a misdemeanor.

CORNELL v. SEDDINGER et al.

Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1912. 237 Pa. 389, 85 A. 446.

Suit by Howard E. Cornell, as receiver of the Neafie & Levy Ship & Engine Building Company, and others, against Mathias Seddinger and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

POTTER, J. This was a bill in equity filed by Howard E. Cornell, receiver of the Neafie & Levy Ship & Engine Building Company, Penn Works, Philadelphia, against Mathias Seddinger, John H. Watt, Eli Kirk Price, Somers N. Smith, and Laurence B. Levy, administrator of Edmund L. Levy, deceased. The purpose of the bill was to compel the defendants to repay to the company certain sums which it was alleged the defendants, as directors had wrongfully declared as dividends, when as a matter of fact there were no profits to divide, and the so-called dividends were paid out of capital. * * *

The dividends which are here in question were declared by the directors as follows: On November 25, 1901, one of 3½ per cent., $28,000. On April 2, 1902, one of 6 per cent., $48,000. On March 30, 1903, one of 6 per cent., $48,000. These dividends were in each case paid shortly after they were declared. During the period from 1900 to 1904, the company was engaged in building three torpedo boat destroyers, and a cruiser for the United States government, and the business was carried on at a loss. The original capital of $800,000 was largely impaired, being depleted by a sum in excess of $760,000, leaving only a nominal amount. The dividends above referred to were paid, not out of profits, but out of capital. In placing the responsibility for this action upon the directors, the trial judge distinguished between the directors Seddinger and Smith, who were executive officers of the company, and the other three directors, Price, Levy, and Watt, and held that the former were liable for the amount of the dividends improperly declared and paid, but the other three he relieved from responsibility, and directed that as to them the bill be dismissed. Whether or not he was correct in making this distinction is the important question raised by this appeal. * * *

It may be regarded as settled law that directors of a corporation are trustees or quasi trustees of the capital of the company, and liable as trustees for any breach of duty with respect to the application of it. The capital of a company may not lawfully be used for the payment of dividends. It was so used in the present case. At whose instance and direction was this done? Obviously by the board of directors. But, says the learned chancellor, three of the members of the board were not practical shipbuilders, or were not personally familiar with the processes of construction, and therefore they were excusable for accepting the reports at their face value, without further inquiry.

We are not able to accept this theory as applicable to the facts of the present case. No special knowledge of the details of shipbuilding was required in order to determine whether or not a dividend might properly be declared. Certain reports of the treasurer were presented to the directors at the meeting of the board. These reports were made up by the treasurer partly from the books and partly from information from the executive officers as to the inventories of stock on hand, work in progress, etc. These items included very large amounts which were not available as assets in any proper sense of the word, as a basis for the declaration of dividends. * * *

Inflations of various kinds which were in existence, of so glaring a nature that any fairly competent man, who paid any attention to the make-up of the items appearing upon the face of the reports, would have found that, instead of apparent profits there was in reality an impairment of the capital.

The defense of Directors Price, Watt, and Levy was that they relied upon the face of the reports of the treasurer, as showing profits, without making any inquiry as to the nature of the items reported as available assets. Directors can hardly be regarded as discharging their duty, and protecting the trust imposed upon them, when they accept a report which upon its face calls for explanation and analysis, and after a glance at it, to see that it purports to show profits, proceed without further investigation to declare dividends. Yet it is admitted that this is practically what was done. Nor was the general condition of the company such as to blunt the senses of the directors to the need of scrutinizing the reports. The minutes show that, at the time these various dividends were declared, there was a shortage of working capital, and the directors were considering the necessity of borrowing money, both upon notes and by mortgaging the real estate.

It is admitted that two of the directors had personal knowledge of the real condition of the company, and, after a careful examination of the evidence, we cannot avoid the conclusion that the other directors might, by the exercise of common prudence, have readily ascertained the worthless character of much that was carried upon the reports of the treasurer as assets. As well might a board include the expense account of a corporation as a basis for dividends, as that which was reckoned by this board as part of the assets of the company. As a matter of course, any such account must be deducted from the apparent profits before a basis for considering the declaration of a dividend can be reached. The failure of the directors to investigate the character of the items of the report led them to declare dividends when there was no surplus or profits to divide. This action was not merely an error of judgment, but was the result of lack of attention to the real condition of the company. Mere ignorance of facts which they could easily have ascertained cannot excuse them for the performance of illegal acts, in declaring dividends out of capital. It was the duty of the directors to inform themselves as to the actual condition of the company before declaring dividends. If they had made full inquiry and reasonable examination, and had been misled by erroneous information on which they had the right to rely, that might have served as an excuse for distributing capital instead of profits. But nothing of the kind appears from the evidence.

The bill in this case was not filed to secure payment by the directors of the debts of the corporation, but its purpose was to compel the directors to replace funds of the company which they wrongfully paid out as dividends. It is suggested in the argument of counsel for appellee Price that the report of the receiver showed that the assets exceeded the liabilities when the company passed into the hands of the receiver. An inspection of this report shows, however, that in making it up the capital stock was not taken into consideration as a liability.

The first assignment of error is sustained, and the decree of the court below is reversed, in so far as it directs the dismissal of the bill of complaint against John H. Watt and Eli Kirk Price and Laurence B. Levy, as administrator of the estate of E. L. Levy, deceased. It is adjudged that all the directors by their conduct rendered themselves jointly and severally liable under the terms of the bill, and the plaintiff is entitled to the same relief with respect to all of the defendants as was extended to him with respect to the defendants Seddinger and Smith. It is further ordered that the record be remitted to the court below, in order that a decree may be entered in accordance with this opinion.

APPLETON et al. v. AMERICAN MALTING COMPANY et al.

Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, 1903. 65 N.J.Eq. 375, 54 A. 454.

Suit by Aaron Appleton and another against the American Malting Company and others. From a decree sustaining demurrers to and dismissing the bill, complainants appeal. Reversed.

GUMMERE, C. J. The appellants, who are stockholders of the defendant company, filed their bill to compel the directors of the company, who held office as such from the time of the organization of the company in September, 1897, up to and including the year 1899, to pay back into the treasury of the company certain dividends paid out by them during the period named from the capital stock of the company, in violation of the provisions of section 30 of the corporation act. The bill was filed by the complainants, not in the assertion of any individual right, but on behalf of the company. Each of the defendants filed a demurrer to the bill, and upon a hearing in the court below a decree was entered sustaining the demurrers and dismissing the bill. From that decree this appeal was taken.

Two questions are raised by the demurrers: First. Do the facts exhibited in the bill justify the complainants in instituting this suit without first making demand upon the directors to do so? Second. Does the thirtieth section of the corporation act impose any liability upon directors who have paid dividends out of capital, except in the event of the dissolution or the insolvency of the company? * * *

Concluding that the facts stated in the bill sufficiently show the right of the complainants to maintain this suit upon behalf of the corporation, we reach the meritorious question raised by the demurrer, and that is whether, by virtue of the provisions of the thirtieth section of the corporation act, the directors who have participated in the declaration and payment of a dividend out of capital are liable to the corporation for so doing, except in case of the dissolution or insolvency of the company. The language of the statute is as follows: "No corporation shall make dividends, except from the surplus or net profits arising from its business, nor divide, withdraw, or in any way pay to the stockholders, or any of them, any part of its capital stock, or reduce its capital stock, except according to this act, and in case of any violation of the provisions of this section, the directors under whose administration the same may happen shall be jointly and severally liable, at any time within six years after paying such dividend, to the corporation and to its creditors, in the event of its dissolution or insolvency, to the full amount of the dividend made or capital stock so divided, withdrawn, paid out or reduced, with interest on the same from the time such liability accrued: provided, that any director who may have been absent when the same was done or who may have dissented from the act or resolution by which the same was done, may exonerate himself from such liability by causing his dissent to be entered at large on the minutes of the directors, at the time the same was done, or forthwith after he shall have notice of the same, and by causing a true copy of said dissent to be published, within two weeks after the same shall have been so entered, in a newspaper published in the county where the corporation has its principal office." The contention of the demurrants, which was sustained by the Court of Chancery, is that the remedy provided by the statute is solely for the benefit of creditors; and that it can only be availed of in case of the insolvency of the corporation. The argument is that the punctuation (the insertion of a comma, after the word "creditors") shows clearly that this was intended by the Legislature to be a winding-up provision, creating a fund for the payment of debts; and that, even if the location of the comma is not to be accepted as controlling, nevertheless a construction which would enable the corporation to compel the directors, for the benefit of its stockholders, to make good a deficit in the capital stock, when the stockholders themselves already had in their pockets the whole amount of that deficit, is so unreasonable and inequitable as to require its rejection. Punctuation, although usually considered in discovering the purpose of a statute, is never decisive in determining it; on the contrary, it will be entirely disregarded if it be necessary to do so in order to arrive at the real meaning and intent of the lawmakers. * * *

Reading the statute without regard to punctuation, the Legislature has declared that for the impairment of the capital of the company "the directors shall be jointly and severally liable at any time within six years to the corporation and to its creditors in the event of its dissolution or insolvency to the full amount of the capital stock so divided withdrawn paid out or reduced." The apparent object of the provision is to afford protection equally to the corporation and to its creditors against loss by reason of the illegal act. But the creditors can suffer no injury from it unless the capital is so impaired as to render the company insolvent. Not so with the corporation. Any impairment of its capital is harmful to it in some degree; the seriousness of the injury depending upon the extent of the impairment. For the full protection of the company the liability of the directors must be absolute. No liability on the part of the directors is required for the full protection of creditors, except in case of the insolvency of the corporation, or possibly in the event of its voluntary liquidation. The words of the statute give this full measure of protection. For disobedience of its mandate "the directors shall be jointly and severally liable to the corporation, and to its creditors in the event of its dissolution or insolvency"; to the corporation in any event, to the creditors in the event expressed in the statute. In our judgment, the Legislature intended by this provision to afford the full measure of protection which the words provide.

It is argued by the demurrants, as has been already stated, that the statute, so construed, is grossly unjust and inequitable, in that it requires the directors to pay into the treasury of the corporation, for the benefit of the stockholders, the amount of the deficit, although the stockholders, not the directors, have in their pockets the portion of the capital which has been withdrawn. The argument assumes that there will be no transfer of the stock of the company during the period of the liability of the directors. The assumption is unwarranted. The very declaration of the dividend, evidencing as it does the apparent prosperity of the company, creates a desire on the part of outsiders to become holders of the stock. It at the same time decreases the actual, while increasing the apparent, value of the stock. The result is to afford unscrupulous directors, and stockholders who are cognizant of the illegal action of the board, an opportunity to unload their holdings upon innocent purchasers at fraudulently inflated prices. It is eminently just that the persons whose wrongful act has caused loss to those who have been induced by it to become stockholders should make good that loss. Nor is it inequitable that stockholders who have innocently participated in the distribution of the illegal dividends should have their stock restored to its normal value by contribution from the directors who have impaired the capital without being first required to pay back the dividend so paid to them. The ordinary purchaser of corporate stock holds it as an investment. He rightly considers and treats the dividends paid upon it as income. In many instances the income is required to meet the expenses of living, and is entirely expended for that purpose. To say that a person who has been unwittingly induced to exhaust his principal by the mistaken or fraudulent representation of those to whom he has intrusted it that what has been paid to him is income suffers no injury is absurd. To refuse him redress except upon condition that he return the moneys which he has expended in the belief that his capital was intact, notwithstanding that by such expenditure he is rendered penniless, is to put a premium upon fraud in corporate management.

The learned vice chancellor, who heard the case in the court below, considered that, if the statute fixed liability upon the directors without regard to the financial condition or needs of the corporation, then it was highly penal in its character, and that for this reason a court of equity should refuse to entertain a suit for its enforcement. In our opinion, the liability imposed by the statute is not penal in its character. Its sole purpose is, not to punish, but to provide for the making of compensation by wrongdoers for the injury sustained by their wrongful act.

The decree appealed from should be reversed.

BRANCH v. KAISER et al.

Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1928. 291 Pa. 543, 140 A. 498.

Bill in equity by Clayton G. Branch, trustee in bankruptcy of the Girard Grocery Company, against Albert Kaiser and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

FRAZER, J. Defendants appealed from a decree entered by the court below on a bill in equity, filed by a trustee in bankruptcy, to compel repayment by respondents of moneys paid out as dividends alleged to have been wrongfully declared by the directors of the bankrupt corporation. Hearing was had in the court below by the court in banc on bill and answer.

The corporation in question, known as the Girard Grocery Company, was incorporated in 1908 under the laws of this commonwealth, for the purpose of carrying on a wholesale business principally in groceries and food products. The stockholders were confined to retail grocers to whom the company sold goods, the business accordingly being carried on in the nature of a co-operative organization. The original capital was $175,000, later increased to $1,000,000, divided into 10,000 shares of $100 each, of which there was issued and outstanding at the time of the bankrupt proceedings, stock to the aggregate value of $441,800. The business was prosperous from the start and by the year 1920 the corporation had accumulated a surplus of assets over liabilities of approximately $171,000, and for a number of years, up to 1920, had declared and paid dividends. In that year, however, it met with financial disaster, suffering a loss of $1,000,000, due, as claimed by respondents and admitted by the trustee, not to mismanagement, neglect, or wrongful practices on the part of the directors, but to a condition in the market for certain commodities, chiefly sugar and food products, which to supply the demands of customers, it had bought outright and contracted for future deliveries, at the then prevalent high prices, but these suddenly enormously slumped, particularly sugar, large quantities of which the company had bargained for, in addition to immediate purchases, at prices ranging from 26 to 28 cents a pound, and which suddenly dropped to as low as 5½ cents a pound, entailing in this one item a loss of $500,000. A similar amount was lost on purchases of food products. This occurrence culminated during the fiscal year of the company between July 1, 1920, and June 30, 1921. It was a post war condition in the market which the directors could neither foresee nor prevent.

From inception of the corporation to its bankruptcy in 1926, the respondents were continuously directors of the corporation, Kaiser being also president and Schoch holding the office of secretary.

It is averred in the bill of complaint, and not denied in the answer of defendants, that as a result of the $1,000,000 loss in 1920 the corporation became in fact insolvent and the capital wholly or in part impaired and dissipated. Up to 1920 the affairs of the company had been carried on prosperously, and the heavy loss of that year was in nowise attributable to neglect, mismanagement, or illegal practices on the part of the directors. At this point respondents who had the active management and control of the business, committed error disastrous to them in every respect. Instead of acquainting the stockholders with the actual unstable financial condition of the corporation, for which they were blameless, facing the publicity of the unquestioned insolvency, of which they certainly had knowledge, and setting about for a legal adjustment of affairs, they deliberately adopted and put into practice a bold and reprehensible system of deception, designed to conceal the insolvency from the stockholders and the public with the expectation of recouping, by means of future business, the loss of the $1,000,000, and thereby again place the company upon a sound financial standing. The situation was desperate, of course. There was practically no longer a surplus and a manifest impairment of capital existed.

Respondents exercised practically exclusive supervision over and management of the company's business and financial transactions, and in this situation appear to have experienced no difficulty in putting into effect their plans for an effective concealment of the loss of 1920 and to enable the company, as they hoped, to emerge financially rehabilitated from its troubles. These plans included false overvaluation of assets, refraining from notice of the $1,000,000 loss in their reports, a presentation of false annual statements, and a diversion into dividends of profits that should have been applied to lessening the capital's impairment. A summary of these practices will show the extent and method of their operations. Beginning with the close of the fiscal year of 1921, they made no record in the company's books of the $1,000,000 loss, gave no notice of it in their annual report, and merely noted in that report a deficit of $22,756.87. In addition, they presented inflated inventory sheets, giving to the actual merchandise the company had on hand a cost valuation, when in fact the value had enormously decreased. The same methods of concealment, misrepresentation, and fictitious inventories were continued during the years down to and including 1925.

These methods and practices, as set forth in detail in the bill, are frankly admitted in respondents' answer, with the explanation, or excuse, that "the increase in the item of inventory was made with the intent and purpose of carrying on the business of the said Girard Grocery Company for the benefit of its stockholders." It is doubtless true that such was the actuating motive impelling respondents to resort to their fraudulent misrepresentations and concealments; it was, however, a practice which safe and honest business methods will not support and which the law will not tolerate. Where acts of directors are of such nature that they directly and primarily affect the interests of stockholders in their shares of stock, by diminishing their value or otherwise injuring their rights, then the stockholders may sue to redress the wrong. Thompson on Corporations, § 1313.

Respondents in the present case, did not stop with these deceiving representations and false inventories; a situation additional to these was necessary to sustain appearance of solvency. Something of a more tangible and satisfying nature was necessary to hold down suspicion and prevent possible investigation. There still remained unused an exceptionally effective proceeding for that purpose—that of declaring and paying dividends. The expectation of respondents that there would be profits made by the company after the loss in 1920 was not unfounded. Profits were realized, and in 1922 while still concealing the corporation's loss, and continuing the inflating of inventories and furnishing falsifying statements, with the organization in actual insolvency, a meeting of the directors was held, attended by respondents, at which a dividend was declared, followed by similar action in the succeeding years, down to and including 1925, the total amount thus paid out in dividends being in excess of $132,000. The payments of these annual allotments, out of current profits, is admitted by respondents and justified by them on the ground that in the years of the payments, profits were realized from the business of the company and that the distributions were made out of profits accruing after the insolvency of 1920.

Nowhere in the record does it appear that the total of these profits, which respondents claim was in excess of the total of the dividends paid out, would have materially lessened the existing impairment of the capital had they been so applied. Nevertheless, the only proper and rightful use of these several amounts was to apply them, so far as they went, to the reduction of that deficit, and hence their application to the payment of dividends was under the situation, clearly unjustifiable and illegal. There were in fact no profits or surplus, out of which alone dividends could be declared, available to these respondents for use as distribution payments. "Surplus" or "profits" denote an excess in the aggregate value of all assets of a corporation over the sum of its entire liabilities, including capital stock. Edwards v. Douglas, 269 U.S. 204, 46 S.Ct. 85, 70 L.Ed. 235. Clearly, in the present case the profits made, totaling over $132,000, were not sufficient to constitute a surplus over the sum of all aggregate liabilities of the Girard Grocery Company. The insolvency brought about by the million dollar loss in 1920 had not been lifted, and the reduced capital was never replenished. These profits should have been applied to the depleted capital, and so appropriated, there would have then remained no funds out of which to legally pay dividends. With the exception of distributions made in liquidation, dividends can be declared and paid out of net profits only, or, conversely stated, when the payment does not impair the capital stock of the corporation. Nor can an insolvent corporation declare and pay a dividend; and if the capital stock has been impaired by the payment of the dividend, it is nevertheless unlawful, although the corporation is solvent at the time. 14 C.J. p. 800. Hence the absolute and legal duty of respondents, knowing a serious impairment of the capital existed, was to devote the profits here mentioned to the betterment of the company's shattered financial condition, instead of suppressing their wrongful management of its affairs and lulling suspicion on the part of stockholders by doling the accumulations out in the shape of dividend payments. In this connection we may adopt the conclusions of the learned court below, as follows:

"It is argued by counsel for the respondents that the impairment of the capital occurred prior to the declaration of the dividends in question, and all that the directors did was to fail to reduce an impairment that existed. This argument overlooks the fact, however, that by declaring the dividends each year out of current profits, the directors illegally diverted funds which properly were applicable to a reduction of the capital deficit. The earned profits, therefore, reduced the impairment, and the declaration of the dividend again impaired the capital to the extent of the dividends declared."

In our opinion, we need not enter further into this discussion. It is undisputed that respondents by illegal methods made and continued concealment, from both the stockholders of the company and the public, of the precarious financial standing of the corporation, repeatedly inflating inventories of goods on hand, thus presenting a fraudulent overvaluation of assets, and lastly, declared dividends, at the time the corporation was insolvent and its capital seriously depleted and impaired, out of profits that should have been used for its stabilization. The court below found the disbursements were illegal, under the Act of May 23, 1913 (P.L. 336; Pa.St.1920, § 5786), and that the directors are personally liable for the dividends so declared. We concur in that judgment.

The decree of the court below is affirmed, at appellants' costs.

OTTINGER v. BENNETT.

Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Division, First Department, 1911.
144 App.Div. 525, 129 N.Y.S. 819.

Action by Marx Ottinger and others against John R. Bennett, impleaded, etc. From a judgment sustaining plaintiff's demurrer to a partial defense, defendant appeals. Reversed, and demurrer overruled, with leave to complainant to amend his complaint.

INGRAHAM, P. J. Upon an appeal from a judgment sustaining a demurrer to a separate defense set up in the answer, the defendant attacks the sufficiency of the complaint, and, as I do not think the complaint alleges a cause of action, the judgment should not be affirmed.

The complaint alleges that the American Ice Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of New Jersey, had issued preferred and common stock, and on January 23, 1902, the board of directors of said company declared a dividend of $1 per share upon the common stock of the American Ice Company payable to stockholders of record at the close of business on February 1, 1902, which dividend was subsequently paid to the stockholders; that this dividend was not made or declared from the surplus or net profits arising from the business of the said American Ice Company, and the said dividend was never earned by the said American Ice Company; that at the time of the declaration of this dividend the statutes of the state of New Jersey provided that no corporation should make a dividend except from the surplus or net profits arising from its business, nor divide, withdraw, or in any way pay to the stockholders or any of them any part of its capital stock except according to the act, and, in case of any violation of its provisions, the directors under whose administration the same may happen should be jointly and severally liable, at any time within six years after paying such dividend, to the corporation and to its creditors, in the event of its dissolution or insolvency, to the full amount of the dividend made or capital stock so divided, withdrawn, paid out, or reduced, with interest on the same from the time such liability accrued, provided that any director who may have been absent when the same was done, or who may have dissented from the act or resolution by which the same was done, may exonerate himself from such liability by causing his dissent to be entered at large on the minutes of the directors at the time the same was done, or forthwith after he shall have notice of the same and by causing a copy of such dissent to be published in certain newspapers. The complaint further alleges that the defendant John R. Bennett was a director of the American Ice Company between January 1, 1902, and March 1, 1902, and well knew that at the time the said dividend was declared the same had not been earned and was not declared from the surplus or net profits arising from the business of the said corporation; that the said defendants caused the fact of the declaration of the dividend to be published in the newspapers and to be disseminated among the public; and that none of the directors caused his dissent to be entered at large or otherwise on the minutes of the directors of the American Ice Company. There was no allegation that this defendant Bennett was present at the time the dividend was declared, voted for the dividend, or took any part in the action of the corporation in declaring a dividend.

It is alleged that each of the directors intended that the said declaration of the said dividend should be regarded by the general public as a representation that the said dividend had been earned and declared from the surplus or net profits arising from the business of the said American Ice Company, and it is then alleged that, at the time of the declaration of the said dividend, each of the said directors well knew that the aforesaid representations were wholly false, and that said representations were made with intent on the part of each of said directors to deceive the public and to induce the public to purchase shares of the capital stock of the American Ice Company, and that said directors conspired together for that purpose. It is also alleged: That the plaintiff, relying upon the said representations, and believing them to be true, purchased on February 13, 1902, 100 shares of the common stock of the American Ice Company; on or about March 5th, purchased 200 shares of the common stock of the American Ice Company; on or about April 28, 1902, purchased an additional 100 shares of said common stock; and on August 25, 1902, purchased a further 200 shares of the said common stock, and paid therefor the sum of $12,675. That if the dividend mentioned in paragraph 5 of the complaint had been declared out of the surplus or net profits of the said American Ice Company, each share of the common stock would have been worth $50 per share at the time of the declaration of the said dividend mentioned. The common stock of the American Ice Company was intrinsically worthless and practically of no value. And that the market price of the said common stock subsequently "declined to a point where said market price, as well as said intrinsic value of the said stock, is practically nothing." Thus the basis of the plaintiff's cause of action is that the directors of the American Ice Company, by declaring a dividend on its common stock which was paid by the company, represented that such dividend was to be paid out of its earnings and net profits, and, without alleging that the defendant voted for such dividend or took any part in declaring it or made any representations about it, plaintiff seeks to hold this defendant for his loss in a speculation in the stock, because the defendants knew that the dividend was not paid out of earnings or profits, but intended that it should be understood by the public that it was paid out of earnings and profits.

The corporation being organized under the laws of the state of New Jersey, the legality of the acts of the directors must be determined by the laws of that state. The laws of that state prohibited the declaration of a dividend except from surplus or net profits arising from its business, and provided a penalty for a violation of this prohibition by making the directors under whose administration the same may happen jointly and severally liable to the corporation and to its creditors in the event of its dissolution or insolvency to the full amount of the dividend made or capital stock so divided. It is not alleged that this company has ever become insolvent, and the plaintiff is not a creditor. Nor does the plaintiff seek to compel the directors to pay back to the company the amount of the dividend that they distributed to the stockholders in violation of the statute. He alleges that the declaration of this dividend was a representation that it was paid out of net earnings or profits, but it is not alleged that the dividend was declared to be paid out of profits or earnings; that there was any direct representation by either the company or its directors that it was so paid; nothing but the bare allegation that a dividend was declared and paid by the company —how is not stated—and that therefore the plaintiff is entitled to recover, not the amount of the dividend or the loss that the company sustained in consequence of the dividend having been declared, but what he lost in an unfortunate speculation in the stock because he believed that the dividends had been paid out of earnings or profits.

To sustain this action there must first be a representation by the person sought to be charged of a fact which was false and upon which the plaintiff relied. If no representation was made, there can certainly be no action based upon the falsity of a representation.

The statute prohibiting the declaration of such a dividend provided the penalty that should follow, but that was only a liability to the corporation itself or to a creditor, and then only in the event of the dissolution or insolvency of the corporation. Nothing else could happen to these directors because of their disobedience to this statute except such a liability to the corporation or its directors.

In speaking of a domestic corporation which had declared a dividend in violation of the statutes of this state, the Court of Appeals, in People ex rel. E. G. E. Co. v. Barker, 141 N. Y. 254, 36 N.E. 196, said:

"That penalty, and the only one imposed, is that the trustees shall become liable for all debts existing and contracted during their term of office, * * * and the practical effect follows that for the security of creditors the liability of the trustees is put in the place of the impairment of capital effected by the dividends. If the trustees choose to bear that responsibility, they have power to declare and pay the dividend, though no surplus exists beyond the capital, at least until some judicial restraint intervenes to prevent."

If the directors thus had power to declare a dividend out of capital subject only to the penalty provided by the New Jersey statute for a violation of its prohibition, it certainly could be no representation that the dividend was declared payable out of anything but capital by the mere declaration of the dividend. It is not alleged that this defendant or any of the directors had any stock to sell or declared this dividend for the purpose of creating a market for their stock; that they sold any stock based upon the declaration of this dividend; or that the plaintiff purchased any stock belonging to the defendants or any of them. The plaintiff saw that the dividend was declared, he assumed that it was payable out of profits, and he went into the general market and bought the stock. What he assumed to be the fact was not the fact.

If, by the declaration of this dividend, there was no representation as to whether it was paid-out earnings or capital, then it seems to me the intention of the defendants was entirely immaterial.

This defendant owed no duty to the plaintiff; he was not in a position whereby he was bound to inform the plaintiff or any one else that this dividend was not paid out of earnings but was paid out of capital; no duty devolved upon him to speak; and his mere silence in the face of the declaration of a dividend paid out of capital and not of earnings was not, as I look at it, a declaration or representation of any fact except that a dividend would be paid by the corporation at the time and place named. Certainly as to a defendant who had taken no part in the declaration of the dividend—and it is not alleged that this defendant did take such a part—there can be no representation upon which to base a recovery.

The plaintiff relies upon Keeler v. Seaman, 47 Misc.Rep. 292, 95 N.Y.Supp. 920, decided by Mr. Justice Scott, now a member of this court, at Special Term. That action was against an officer of the company, not a director. In that case the directors had declared a dividend which was payable out of the earnings, not, as in this case, a dividend which was merely payable out of the money of the company. But it is quite clear that the mere declaration of that dividend would not have charged the defendant, who was not a director, and the allegations of the complaint which made him liable were that he was instrumental in causing notice of the declaration of the dividend to be advertised, and that he knew that certain statements contained in the advertisement were false. It was also alleged that this defendant authorized a firm of stock brokers to state to intending purchasers of the said stock that the net earnings of the corporation amounted to more than 1 per cent. a month upon its capital stock, and that such statement was false to the knowledge of the defendant and was made with intent to deceive intending purchasers. There were also other allegations in the complaint charging, in effect, that the demurring defendant actively co-operated with the defendants and directors of the corporation to perpetrate a fraud upon possible purchasers of the company's stock by circulating, and causing to be circulated, false and misleading statements as to the financial condition of the corporation, and the decision was based upon these false representations and his belief in the truth thereof that the complaint was sustained. There were direct representations by the demurring defendant made to stock brokers for the purpose of influencing the public to purchase stock of this corporation, and the decision was not at all based upon the fact of the mere declaration of the dividend by the corporation. It also appeared in that case that the dividend was declared to have been paid out of earnings, when in fact it was paid out of capital. These facts show that that case presents features which established that the demurring defendant had made a direct representation that the dividend was payable out of earnings, and not out of capital, and that seems to me to be the controlling difference between that case and the one now under consideration. Here there was a simple declaration of a dividend without stating out of what funds it was to be payable, except that it was payable by the corporation, and it seems to me that such a declaration of a dividend is not a declaration of any fact upon which can be predicated a claim of a false and fraudulent representation as to the method by which the corporation had acquired the money to pay the dividend, and certainly not against a director who had taken no part in declaring the dividend. As the complaint does not state a cause of action, it is not necessary to determine whether the defense demurred to is sufficient.

I think, therefore, this judgment should be reversed, with costs, and the demurrer overruled, with costs, with leave, however, to plaintiff to amend his complaint upon payment of costs in this court and in the court below.

MCLAUGHLIN and SCOTT, JJ., concur.

MILLER, J. (dissenting). The appellant challenges the sufficiency of the complaint. The action is for fraud and deceit in inducing the plaintiff to purchase shares of the capital stock of the American Ice Company. The defendants were directors of said company. It is alleged that the directors declared a dividend on the common stock and caused it to be paid out of capital, there being no surplus or earnings, in violation of the statute of New Jersey, in which state said company was incorporated; that they caused the fact of the declaration of said dividend to be published in the newspapers and disseminated among the public; that well knowing the falsity thereof, and intending thereby to deceive the public and to induce them to purchase the shares of stock of said company, each of said defendants intended said declaration of dividend to be regarded as a representation that it had been earned and was declared from surplus and net profits; that in reliance thereon, and in the belief that said representation was true, the plaintiff purchased 600 shares of the said stock and was thereby damaged in a sum stated.

The plaintiff pleaded the New Jersey statute; but the action is not brought thereon. It may be assumed that the remedy given by the statute is exclusive; but an action for fraud and deceit can hardly be said to be statutory. The fact that it was unlawful to declare dividends except from surplus or the net profits arising from the conduct of the business is an element to be considered, in determining the quality of the defendants' act as a representation, and the reliance which the public might naturally be expected to place upon it as such.

It is familiar law that a fraudulent representation may be effected by conduct, by acts as well as by words, by silence when there is a duty to speak, by half-truths calculated to mislead, or by reckless statements made without knowledge. * * * It is equally well settled that the representation need not be made directly to the party injured by it (Brackett v. Griswold, 112 N.Y. 454, 20 N.E. 376), and that one who is induced to enter into a contract by the false representations of a third party may have a right of action against the latter for the wrong (Kujek v. Goldman, 150 N.Y. 176, 44 N.E. 773, 34 L.R.A. 156, 55 Am.St.Rep. 670). The principle of the decisions is that a party is answerable for what he intends to accomplish; that one who intentionally deceives another to his injury, no matter how, is accountable for the wrong; that a party is liable for misrepresentations, either by conduct or by words, made for another to act upon, if they were calculated to deceive, and if in fact they do deceive such other person into acting in reliance upon them to his injury. It is quite as easy to deceive by acts as by words, and the deed is often more effectual than the word. But the law is not so blind or so absurd as to judge an act by the means regardless of the motive.

Tested by the application of those principles, the complaint in the case at bar alleges all the essentials of an action for fraud and deceit, i. e., a representation by acts for the public, and therefore for the plaintiff, to act upon—falsity, scienter, deception, and injury. A declaration of a dividend by a going concern implies earnings from which to pay it, and the publication of the fact of such declaration is certainly calculated to induce the public to believe that the dividend has been earned and that the corporation is prosperous. If, intending the public to act thereon, the defendants had made and published a report expressly stating that the dividend declared had been earned, there would be no doubt of their liability to a person thereby deceived to his injury. The familiar cases of false prospectuses need not be cited. Why distinguish between a false affirmation and an act calculated to have the like effect; the motive and the result in each case being the same? Certainly the law makes no such distinction. We have had many illustrations in cases before us of the devices to deceive the public employed by managing directors, who misuse their positions to promote stock speculation, and the payment of dividends out of capital is a familiar one. When that is done to induce the public to purchase shares of the company and thereby to create a fictitious value, upon which the wrongdoers may trade, they should be held accountable precisely as though the like deception had been practiced by actual misstatements.

The novelty of the action need not deter us from applying settled principles of law; but the case is not entirely without precedent. Keeler v. Seaman, 47 Misc. 292, 95 N.Y.S. 920; Stainback v. Fernley, 8 L.J. Ch. 142, 3 Jur. 262. The latter case was decided in 1839. It should be said that those cases involved misstatements; but it was considered in each that the very act of declaring a dividend was a representation to the public that it had been earned. Perhaps Bedford v. Bagshaw, 29 L.J. (N.S.) Com.Law, 59, is more nearly analogous to this case. In that case directors procured the shares of their company to be inserted in the official list of the Stock Exchange, by a misrepresentation that two-thirds of the scrip had been paid upon; and it was held that the directors were liable to third persons who were induced to purchase shares in reliance upon the fact that they were listed.

It is not expressly alleged, though it may fairly be inferred from the facts stated, that the appellant was present at the meeting of directors when the dividend was declared. Moreover, his actual participation in the fraudulent scheme to deceive the public is alleged.

Of course, there was no representation to the plaintiff as to the condition of the company, unless the dividend was declared and the fact of its declaration published for the purpose of inducing the public to purchase the shares of the company in the belief that the dividend had been earned. The act itself, though in violation of the statute, would not give third parties a cause of action for fraud and deceit, unless done for them to act upon. To establish that the act was a representation to the plaintiff, he will have to prove the act and the fraudulent purpose as independent elements. It would be premature now to decide what proof would suffice to establish the latter element. It is sufficient for the present appeal that the complaint contains the necessary averments.

As a partial defense, the appellant alleged that a plan was devised by certain of the stockholders of the American Ice Company to reduce the losses incurred by the holders of stock through the decline in its market price, which was the organization of a holding company and the exchange of its stock for the common stock of the American Ice Company in the ratio of one to five; that the plaintiffs could have effected such an exchange and sold the stock received in exchange for a sum stated, and thereby could have reduced their loss. Of course, the stockholders did not have to take stock in a new company, and the matter pleaded is not a defense, partial or otherwise, to the plaintiff's cause of action. It may have a legitimate bearing on the value of the stock, which they were induced to purchase. If so, it can be proved, without being pleaded, as a fact relevant to the question of damages.

The interlocutory judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

DOWLING, J., concurs.[20]

AIKEN et al. v. INSULL et al.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Seventh Circuit, 1941.
122 F.2d 746.

Action by Thomas D. Aiken and others, on their own behalf as owners and holders of corporate debentures and on behalf of all other owners and holders of such debentures and all other creditors who desired to join in the suit and share the costs thereof, against Samuel Insull, Jr., and others, for an accounting and for other relief. From judgment for the defendants, the plaintiffs appeal.

Judgment affirmed in part and in part reversed and case remanded, with directions to proceed in accordance with opinion.

KERNER, CIRCUIT JUDGE. In this case plaintiffs, on their own behalf as owners and holders of corporate debentures and on behalf of all other owners and holders of such debentures and all other creditors who desired to join in the suit and share the costs thereof, sought an accounting from the defendants, directors of the Insull Utility Investments, Inc., for the wrongful pledging of assets in violation of certain debenture covenants and for the improper declaration of dividends. The defendants interposed an affirmative defense and moved for summary judgment against the plaintiffs, filed under Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U.S.C.A. following section 723c. The District Court sustained the motion, dismissed the complaint and entered a decree in favor of the defendants. From that decree this appeal is prosecuted.[21]

The complaint filed on February 3, 1933 alleged that I.U.I. was incorporated under the laws of Illinois to acquire, dispose of, underwrite and deal in securities and to do a general investment business; the election of the defendants as directors; the composition of the Executive & Finance Committees; the issuance of certain debentures aggregating approximately $66,000,000 and the sale thereof. The debentures were long term, interest bearing obligations of $1,000 each, unsecured except for restrictive covenants on the power of I.U.I. to borrow and pledge.

The complaint further alleged that the defendant directors of the I.U.I. induced and caused I.U.I. to borrow about $45,000,000 from certain Chicago and New York banks, and induced and caused I.U.I. to pledge with said banks substantially all its assets as collateral to said loans without securing the outstanding debentures equally and ratably with such loans and without securing them whatsoever, and that neither all nor any of said loans was made for a period not exceeding one year.

---

[20] Order reversed and interlocutory judgment affirmed on dissenting opinion of Miller, J., below, Ottinger v. Bennett, 203 N.Y. 554, 96 N.E. 1123 (1911).

[21] In this opinion Insull Utility Investments, Inc., will be designated as I.U.I.

The complaint also alleged that on April 16, 1932 an involuntary petition in bankruptcy was filed against the I.U.I., that it was on September 22, 1932 adjudicated a bankrupt, and on March 7, 1937 Harry A. Bigelow was appointed trustee of I.U.I. * * *

The complaint also charged the defendants with the violation of § 23 of the Corporation Act (1919).[22] It alleged that on December 13, 1931 the liabilities of I.U.I. exceeded the fair market value of its assets and that I.U.I. was insolvent; that during 1929, 1930, 1931 and 1932 it had no surplus, but nevertheless paid cash dividends during each of these years on all classes of its preferred stock; that certain of the defendants served as members of the Executive Committee, and that all of the defendants constituted the Board of Directors continuously during the period in question; that the Executive Committee first authorized and directed the payment of the cash dividends above mentioned and that the Board of Directors then authorized or ratified this action. For instance, on January 9, 1932, at a meeting of the Board of Directors, at which all of the directors were present except two specifically named, a resolution was unanimously adopted approving the action of the Executive Committee in declaring a cash dividend payable as of January 2, 1932. The District Court, in his memoranda of holdings, indicated that he did not consider the allegations concerning the improper payment of dividends sufficient in detail. Thereupon the plaintiffs asked leave to file amendments to the complaint, but leave to amend was denied because of the lapse of time between the filing of the original complaint and the offering of the amendment.

The proposed amendments show in complete detail the part played by each defendant with respect to the authorization, declaration, approval, or ratification of each dividend. They show the details of the dividends declared, the dates of the directors' meetings at which they were declared, the names of the directors present at each meeting and the voting therefor, the amount of the dividends so declared, and that at all of the times at which the dividends were paid, I.U.I. was wholly and irretrievably insolvent and that the dividends impaired the capital of the company.

In considering the question presently discussed, it is not, we believe, unreasonable to suppose that directors of a corporation ought to know whether the actual earnings authorize the withdrawal of the corporate assets to pay a dividend, since they alone are responsible for the declaration of dividends even though they may have delegated the power to a committee of their own.

---

22 Laws of Illinois, 1919, p. 321: "The directors shall jointly and severally be liable for the debts and contracts of the corporation in the following cases:

"(1) * * *;

"(2) For declaring or assenting to a dividend if the corporation is, or is thereby, rendered insolvent, or its capital is thereby impaired, to the extent of such dividend;

"(3) * * *.

"Unless a director was absent from the meeting at which such dividend was declared or loan made, or unless his dissent therefrom shall be entered on the corporate records, he shall be conclusively presumed to have assented thereto." Smith-Hurd Stats.Ill. c. 32, § 157.42 note.

The statutory liability is conditioned upon the presence of two essential elements, namely, (1) the "declaring or assenting to a dividend" on the part of the corporate directors, accompanied by (2) the insolvency of the corporation or the impairment of its capital. This liability exists only if the directors voluntarily and affirmatively participate or co-operate in the wrongful payment of dividends. See Lewis v. Montgomery, 145 Ill. 30, 33 N.E. 880; Slater v. Taylor, 241 Ill. 102, 89 N.E. 271; McCutcheon-Gerson Service v. Tire & R. Co., 236 Ill.App. 261. Manifestly, this would occur if the directors played a voluntary part in the declaration or creation of the dividend, or if they approved of or assented to its creation. * * *

It is true that the liability under § 23 of the Corporation Act of 1919 is personal to the creditors, and a suit to enforce the liability must be brought by one or more creditors on behalf of all creditors. Ryerson & Son v. Peden, 303 Ill. 171, 184, 135 N.E. 423, 24 A.L.R. 1273, Seegmiller v. Day, 7 Cir., 249 F. 177, 179. See also Low v. Buchanan, 94 Ill. 76, and Woolverton v. Taylor, 132 Ill. 197, 23 N.E. 1007, 22 Am. St.Rep. 521. This suit was brought on behalf of all creditors.

It is argued that the statutory liability is penal in character and hence a suit can not be maintained in equity to enforce such liability. Loverin v. McLaughlin, 161 Ill. 417, 435, 44 N.E. 99, is the authority relied upon by the defendants. The liability imposed by the statute is definitely not penal in character. It is, both in form and substance, a private obligation, similar, in many respects, to that of sureties, and it was intended to afford additional security to the creditors. See Low, Taylor and Lewis cases, supra; Vestal Co. v. Robertson, 277 Ill. 425, 431, 115 N.E. 629 and In re Beachy & Co., D.C., 170 F. 825, 828. * * * The debentures in question contained a clause which provided that "No recourse shall be had for the payment of the whole or any part of the principal or interest of this debenture to or against the * * * directors of the Company * * *." The District Court concluded that the "no recourse" clause did not operate as a bar to this action. In addition, plaintiffs negotiated a settlement with four of the defendants, and concededly this settlement assumed the form of a covenant not to sue. The District Court held that the effect of the settlement was a covenant not to sue, and therefore was not a bar to this action. In our opinion the conclusions of the District Court on these two points were correct.

The judgment relating to the wrongful pledges is affirmed. The judgment relating to the wrongful payment of dividends is reversed. The case is remanded with directions to proceed in accordance with this opinion.[23]

DE MET'S INCORPORATED v. INSULL.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Seventh Circuit, 1941.
122 F.2d 755.

Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division; Charles G. Briggle, Judge.

Representative action by De Met's Incorporated against Samuel

---

23 Cert. den., 315 U.S. 806, 62 S.Ct. 638, 1942.

Insull and others for improper pledging of corporate assets and for improper payment of dividends in violation of Illinois law. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Judgement affirmed in part and in part reversed and case remanded, with directions to proceed in accordance with opinion.

KERNER, CIRCUIT JUDGE. This is a representative suit brought by De Met's Incorporated, a holder of corporate notes, against the directors of the Corporation Securities Co. of Chicago, a bankrupt corporation, for the improper pledging of the corporate assets, and for the improper payment of dividends in violation of § 23 of the Illinois Corporation Act of 1919, Laws of Illinois, 1919, p. 321, Smith-Hurd Stats.Ill. c. 32, § 157.42 note. * * *

In this case defendant Field contends he stands on a basis distinct from the other defendants in that his participation in the affairs of the Securities Co. was considered by the Superior Court of Cook County, Illinois, in an action brought by Howard, Trustee in Bankruptcy of Corporation Securities Co.; that all charges directed against him in that case were identical to those here made and that they were adjudicated in his favor. Howard v. Insull, 294 Ill.App. 20, 13 N.E.2d 506. As before noted, the Howard case was brought by Howard as trustee. It involved the charge that the assets of the Securities Co. were unlawfully expended and that dividends had been improperly and illegally declared. In the Howard case Field contended that if there be a cause of action as to dividends, it belonged to the creditors, not to Howard as trustee, in bankruptcy. The nisi prius court sustained the contention and dismissed the complaint. The appellate court affirmed. * * * The statutory cause of action against the directors for improper dividends is personal to the creditors and that suit to enforce the liability lies in one or more of the creditors acting in representative capacity. Seegmiller v. Day, 7 Cir., 249 F. 177 holds that although the statutory cause of action is personal to the creditors, the trustee may nevertheless maintain a suit against the defendant directors of an insolvent corporation to recover unearned dividends illegally paid to the defendants themselves as stockholders. The court in the Howard opinion concluded that its result was consistent with the Ryerson and Seegmiller decisions. We assume that the Court's conclusion is sound, otherwise there would be no choice but to add that the Howard result is not the law. * * * In the instant case the board of directors empowered an executive committee to declare dividends, which of course did not operate to relieve them of the responsibility. We believe that a corporate director participates in a dividend, that is, declares or assents to a dividend, under the statute, if he votes to give such an executive committee the power to declare a dividend and this is done, if he himself is an active member of the executive committee which declares a dividend, or if he approves, ratifies or assents to a declaration of the executive committee. We think that the pleadings in this case, as in No. 7430, sufficiently charge the defendants with participation. Perhaps the evidence will not show this. Perhaps the evidence will show, as to one or more of the defendants, a want of control or command, an attitude of gross negligence, an irregular attendance plus perfunctory exercise of the voting power, see Lewis v. Montgomery, 145 Ill. 30, 48, 33 N.E. 880, and Slater v. Taylor, 241 Ill. 102, 89 N.E. 271. Perhaps the evidence will not show this, but that is not important now.

The judgment as to the cause of action relating to the pledges, is affirmed. The judgment as to the cause of action relating to the dividends, is reversed. That portion of the opinion rendered in case No. 7430 which is applicable here, is incorporated by reference. The case is remanded with directions to proceed in accordance with this opinion.

It is so ordered.[24]

WOOD v. NATIONAL CITY BANK.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Second Circuit, 1928. 24 F.2d 661.

Suit by Howard O. Wood, as ancillary receiver of the Stanton Oil Company, against the National City Bank and others. Decree dismissing the bill on motion, for insufficiency on its face, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed, without prejudice to grant an amendment.

The amended bill set forth the following facts: At some undisclosed time the District Court for the Eastern District of Kentucky appointed a receiver for the Stanton Oil Company a Delaware corporation, and later the plaintiff was appointed ancillary receiver "by an order entered in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York." The nature of neither suit was disclosed. From July 16, 1917, to April 1, 1919, the defendants were stockholders of the corporation, between which dates they had received certain dividends from its assets. At the time when all these dividends were paid, the corporation "was in debt, and was in fact insolvent and unable to pay its debts, and had not then, nor had it ever had, any reserve over and above its capital stock, or any surplus or net profits of any kind, and each and all of the said dividends were paid wholly from and out of the capital of said corporation." Claims had been "filed" against the corporation, amounting to more than $100,000, and receiver's certificates issued in the sum of $25,000.

L. HAND, CIRCUIT JUDGE (after stating the facts as above). It is impossible from the bill to learn just what the plaintiff meant to allege. On the one hand, he may have meant only that, when the dividends were paid, the corporate assets did not equal its debts together with the aggregate amount of its corporate shares, considered as a liability, and that the payments left the assets insufficient to pay the shares in full. On the other hand, he may have meant that the assets were not at those times enough to pay the debts; that is, that the corporation was insolvent, as that word is used in the Bankruptcy Act (11 U.S.C.A.). Considering the liberal attitude which courts now take towards pleadings, we think that some of the language is susceptible of being understood in the second sense. "Unable to pay its debts" certainly says more than that the corporation has failed to pay them in due course. It more naturally means that the assets were not enough for that purpose. We must, it is true, confess to a complete inability to understand the relevancy of the remainder of the third article of the bill, in which these words appear. They strongly suggest that the gist of the suit was the receipt of dividends paid in depletion of capital, without regard to whether the corporation was solvent or insolvent. However that may be, if there is a sufficient allegation of insolvency, as we think, the bill is at worst only indefinite and ambiguous, and the proper remedy was to move under rule 20 for a better statement, not to dismiss it under rule 29.

---

[24] Cert. den., 315 U.S. 806, 62 S.Ct. 638, 1942.

Such being a permissible construction of the complaint, the question of its sufficiency depends upon the law of stockholders' liability. We have not to do with the liability commonly imposed by statute, because, whatever that may be in Delaware, the plaintiff does not invoke it here. He depends upon the fact that the directors have paid, and the defendants received, dividends when the corporation was insolvent. Merely because this impairs the capital stock, it is commonly regarded as a wrong to creditors on the directors' part, and it is often made such by statute. We may, without discussion, assume that it would be a wrong in the case at bar. Even so, it is primarily only the wrong of those who commit it, like any other tort, and innocent participants are not accomplices to its commission. Hence it has been settled, at least for us, that, when the liability is based merely on the depletion of the capital, a stockholder must be charged with notice of that fact. McDonald v. Williams, 174 U.S. 397, 19 S.Ct. 743, 43 L.Ed. 1022. This has become a thoroughly fixed principle in the federal courts. Lawrence v. Greenup (C.C.A.6) 97 F. 906; New Hampshire Savings Bank v. Richey (C.C.A.8) 121 F. 956; Great Western, etc., Co. v. Harris (C.C.A.2) 128 F. 321; Ratcliff v. Clendenin (C.C.A.8) 232 F. 61; Atherton v. Beaman (C.C.A.1) 264 F. 878.

It is apparent that this result could not have been reached if the capital of the corporation were regarded as a trust fund for its creditors, because a stockholder is not a purchaser, but a donee, and his bona fides would not protect him, in the absence of some further equity, in retaining the proceeds of a trust. So it became necessary to decide that the capital was not such a fund, and McDonald v. Williams did expressly so decide. The so-called "trust fund" doctrine had, indeed, earlier been repudiated by the Supreme Court, especially in Hollins v. Brierfield, etc., Co., 150 U.S. 371, 14 S.Ct. 127, 37 L.Ed. 1113; but it was a hardy weed and would not die at the first uprooting. It is apparent, therefore, that the bill does not set forth a cause of suit based upon the impairment of the capital, because the stockholders are not alleged to have been privy to the directors' tort. This is not a defense which must be pleaded, like that of bona fide purchaser; it is necessary positively to allege the stockholders' complicity in the wrong to set forth any case at all.

However, there is quite another theory, and quite another liability, if the payments not only impair the capital, but are taken out of assets already too small to pay the existing debts. The situation then strictly is not peculiar to corporation law, but merely an instance of a payment from an insolvent estate. Since, as we have said, a stockholder is a donee, he receives such payments charged with whatever trust they were subject to in the hands of the corporation. In that situation it can indeed be said with some truth that the corporate assets have become a "trust fund." Wabash, etc., Ry. v. Ham, 114 U.S. 587, 594, 5 S.Ct. 1081, 29 L.Ed. 235. Hence it has never been doubted, so far as we can find, at least in any federal court, that if the dividends are paid in fraud of creditors the stockholder is so liable. Hayden v. Thompson (C.C.A.8) 71 F. 60; Hayden v. Williams (C.C.A.2) 96 F. 279. The defendants, who suppose that there has been an inconsistency in the decisions of the Eighth Circuit (and they might have added in our own), have failed to distinguish the quite independent bases of the two liabilities.

If the bill be regarded as presenting only an instance of a payment in fraud of creditors, the question arises whether it is enough merely to allege that the payment was made while the corporation was insolvent. It is agreed with substantial unanimity that, when an insolvent makes a voluntary payment out of his assets, it is regarded as at least presumptively in fraud of his creditors. [Citing cases.] * * *

We shall assume, for argument, in accordance with the language of some of the foregoing decisions, that such a transfer is fraudulent per se. In Hayden v. Williams no more is mentioned than that the corporation was insolvent, and apparently no more was thought necessary. Even so, the bill is bad, because, when the invalidity of the gift depends only upon the fact of the donor's insolvency, regardless of his intent, it is voidable only at the demand of creditors existing when it is made. [Citing cases.] * * *

In the case at bar the bill does not allege that any of the creditors in existence when the receiver was appointed were creditors when the dividends were declared. Only in case the bill had alleged this, would the question arise whether insolvency per se avoids the gift. For this reason, and this alone, the decree was right.

Our mandate will contain a provision that the affirmance is without prejudice to the power of the District Court to grant a second amendment. * * *

The plaintiff will then have an opportunity to allege, if he deems it necessary, that the dividends were paid in fraud of creditors, and that some of the creditors existing when the receiver was appointed existed also when the dividends were paid. * * *

Decree affirmed.

NOTE

(A) Where dividends are paid from capital to stockholders who receive them in good faith, neither a receiver nor a trustee in bankruptcy may recover the dividend or its value. McDonald v. Williams, 174 U.S. 397, 19 S.Ct. 743, 43 L.Ed. 1022, 1899, 1915, 15 Col.L.Rev. 547; Bates v. Brooks, 222 Iowa 1128, 270 N.W. 867, 109 A.L.R. 1371, 1937; but cf., 1930, 28 Mich.L.Rev. 337. But, if dividends are paid when the corporation is insolvent, the stockholders may be held liable on the theory that the corporate assets at that time have become a trust fund for creditors. Hayden v. Williams, 96 F. 279, C.C.A.N.Y.1899, 1911, 11 Col.L.Rev. 477; Wood v.

National City Bank, 24 F.2d 661, C.C.A.N.Y.1928, 1929, 38 Yale L.J. 542; Bartlett v. Smith, 162 Md. 478, 161 A. 509, 1932, Note, 1933, 18 Iowa L.Rev. 516, 1932, 16 Minn.L.Rev. 706. See, also, Briggs, Stockholders' Liability for Unlawful Dividends, 1933, 8 Temp.L.Q. 145; Jennings, The Minnesota Business Corporation Act, 1937, 12 Wis.L.Rev. 419, 450; Notes, 1928, 55 A.L.R. 8, 73–133; 1932, 76 A.L.R. 885, 892–895; 1939, 109 A.L.R. 1381, 1388–1400; Recovery of Illegal Dividends from Stockholders, 1932, 2 Brooklyn L.Rev. 82; 1933, 33 Col.L.Rev. 481; 1932, 30 Mich. L.Rev. 1070; Shareholders' Responsibility for Improper Dividends, 1938, 81 U. of Pa.L.Rev. 314; 1933, 3 Brooklyn L.Rev. 141; 1930, 28 Mich.L.Rev. 337.

(B) In an action against corporate directors to recover dividends alleged to have been illegally declared, the court will not upset the directors' valuation of the corporate assets in the absence of a showing of bad faith. Where directors declare a dividend, there is a presumption that this is done in good faith and that net profits are available from which to meet the dividend payments. Gallagher v. New York Dock Co. et al., 19 N.Y.S.2d 789, Sup.1940, aff'd 263 App.Div. 878, 32 N.Y. S.2d 348, 1942.

UNITED LIGHT & POWER COMPANY v. GRAND RAPIDS TRUST COMPANY.
GRAND RAPIDS TRUST COMPANY v. UNITED LIGHT & POWER COMPANY.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Sixth Circuit, 1936. 85 F.2d 331.

Suit by the Grand Rapids Trust Company, receiver of the Grand Rapids, Grand Haven & Muskegon Railway Company, against the United Light & Power Company. From the decree (7 F.Supp. 511), the defendant appeals, and the receiver cross-appeals.

Affirmed as modified.

HICKS, CIRCUIT JUDGE. This suit is ancillary to one brought by the Guaranty Trust Company of New York, trustee, to foreclose a mortgage executed by Grand Rapids, Grand Haven & Muskegon Railway Company (hereinafter called the railway). * * * The receiver sued to recover a total of $579,000 paid to appellant and its predecessor in stock dividends, * * *

The District Judge allowed a recovery of dividends paid after December, 1922, at which time he ruled the railway to have become insolvent; * * *

Cross-appellant, the receiver, contends principally: That dividends from 1912 to 1921, inclusive, were not paid out of surplus or profits but out of capital, and that such payments were in impairment of capital and hence unlawful; that the payments of dividends under such circumstances was an evidence of bad faith on the part of the stockholder (United) in receiving them; that the court erred in not holding that reserves should have been set up to offset depreciation in the property; * * *

It is urged that the bill of complaint is insufficient, in that the receiver sued as the representative of creditors without alleging that any of the payments complained of were made after insolvency. It is perhaps enough to say that there was no motion to dismiss the bill for insufficiency as provided by Equity Rule 29, 28 U.S.C.A. following section 723; but, aside from this, we think its allegations carry a fair inference of insolvency. * * *

Giving due regard to the findings of the court, we find no reason to disagree with its conclusion that the railway was insolvent in December, 1922. Its assets were then substantially less than its bonds, notes, and current indebtedness. However skillfully and economically it might have been operated, its hope of success had faded with its loss of patronage. It could not reasonably expect to meet its obligations out of earnings. It might have anticipated some such denouement as that of April, 1925. There was no error therefore in adjudging that the dividends of $72,000 on December 22, 1922, and $30,000 on December 10, 1923, were unlawful. Upon those dates these dividends represented a trust fund for the benefit of creditors.

Appellant urges that these dividends were never really paid, but were included in a note for $417,700 executed by the railway to United on November 1, 1924, which remains unpaid. We cannot accede to this view. The United Companies, both appellant and its predecessor, handled the railway's financial affairs. They collected and disbursed the interest on its bonds and borrowed money which they reloaned to the railway and for which they took the railway's notes in return. They ofttimes loaned money to the railway with which to pay dividends. This usage enabled them to show the receipt of regular dividends on their books, the better to maintain their own credit, which, judging from correspondence, was in a more or less strained condition. As it was able, the railway would pay off these notes, but "dividend" notes and others accumulated faster than they were paid, until finally, on November 1, 1924, appellant canceled them all and the railway substituted a single note for $417,700. The District Court held, and we think rightly, that these transactions embodied and were intended to embody actual obligations of the railway. Appellant collected interest on the notes. The total dividends were $579,000, and the high total of promissory indebtedness never exceeded $417,700. A large portion of the dividends was paid in cash, and we think it was expected the remainder would be. Moreover, appellant sold the note for $417,700 in 1925 to the United Motors Products Company, the present holder, to which the railway has since made payments both of interest and principal.

Cross-appellant urges that the railway was insolvent from its organization, that its assets, the railway property, never at any time exceeded its debts and the par value of its capital stock, and that therefore all the dividends were unlawfully declared. But, as indicated above, the stock issue of $1,200,000 was not paid for. It in no sense represented actual capital. We do not understand that under such circumstances the railway was required to maintain assets at a level with its debts and the par value of its outstanding stock. The law was complied with if the assets equaled its debts and the amount for which it was actually liable to its stockholder, that is, the amount received from the stockholder, and any surplus was available in the sound judgment of the directors of the railway for dividends. [Citing cases.] * * *

We have been cited to no case and can find none where the failure of a corporation to keep assets in reserve sufficient to offset the par value of its stock is an impairment of capital to the extent of insolvency where the stock itself has not been paid for. Reduced to its simplest terms, this would mean that a corporation could impair actual working capital which never existed. This is paradoxical. We apprehend that in cases seeming to hold to the contrary the courts have assumed "par value stock" to mean fully paid up stock. Situations frequently arise where the receiver of an insolvent corporation may require delinquent stockholders to satisfy their unpaid subscriptions for the benefit of creditors, but we have no such case.

To sustain appellant's contention would permit the receiver, representing bondholders, to accomplish indirectly that which it could not accomplish by plenary suit against the stockholder because the original bondholder and stockholder, Westinghouse, Church, Kerr & Co., was identical and it of course knew that the bonds were not issued upon the faith of fully paid-up stock, and that it could not rely thereon for the payment of its debts. See Coit v. Gold Amalgamating Co., 119 U.S. 343, 347, 7 S.Ct. 231, 30 L.Ed. 420; Rickerson Roller-Mill Co. v. Farrell Fdry. & Mach. Co., 75 F. 554, 559 (C.C.A.6). The receiver does not contend that the present bondholders were advised otherwise.

Appellee through its accounting experts strenuously strove to show that the railway paid dividends out of funds that should have properly gone into reserve for depreciation. In this endeavor it offered voluminous testimony designed to show the cost of the railway and a hypothetical life in years for the various items of property and equipment upon which it calculated a yearly depreciation adjustment which would care for them as worn out. These involved calculations showed in 1923 an accumulated deficit of $167,961.53 exclusive of the dividends which had been paid by that time.

We do not feel required to determine whether such reserves were required for the protection of bondholders, for we are not impressed that the property and equipment were irretrievably depreciated in 1922. The Froehlich report was based on exhaustive examination of all the property of the railway, and its estimates indicated that even then it was in 77 per cent. condition. We are not disposed to say that the property was in first-class condition; it was far from it, but we do not feel that it had depreciated so hopelessly that it could not have been pulled up out of operating income had traffic been maintained. We are in accord with the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission of November 2, 1926, No. 15100, "Depreciation Charges of Steam Railroad Companies," that it would have been better practice to maintain depreciation reserves. However, the report recognized that it had been customary with many railroads to maintain operating conditions by charging replacements and repairs to operating expenses, and we think that the bulky evidence of repairs and replacements shows the railway had pursued that course to a marked degree. * * *

The decree of the District Court is in all things affirmed.[25]

NOTE

See generally New York Stock Corporation Law, § 114, Liability of Directors of Foreign Corporations.

---

[25] Cert. den., 299 U.S. 534, 591, 57 S.Ct. 118, 119, 1936.

5. TO WHOM DIVIDENDS ARE PAYABLE

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW

§ 62. Determination of stockholders of record for certain purposes. The board of directors of a stock corporation, unless otherwise provided in the certificate of incorporation or other certificate filed pursuant to law or in the by-laws, may fix a time, not exceeding forty days preceding the date fixed for the payment of any dividend or the making of any distribution, or for the delivery of evidences of rights or evidences of interests arising out of any change, conversion or exchange of capital stock, as a record time for the determination of the stockholders entitled to receive any such dividend, distribution, rights or interests, and in such case only stockholders of record at the time so fixed shall be entitled to receive such dividend, distribution, rights or interests. The board of directors at its option, in lieu of so fixing a record time, may prescribe a period not exceeding forty days prior to the date for such payment, distribution or delivery during which no transfer of stock on the books of the corporation may be made.

IN RE WUICHET'S ESTATE

Supreme Court of Ohio, 1941. 138 Ohio St. 97, 33 N.E.2d 15.

Proceeding in the matter of the estate of Charles Wuichet, deceased. Walter G. Wuichet, trustee under the last will and testament of Charles Wuichet, deceased, filed an application for an order of distribution covering dividends from stock in the Little Miami Railroad Company. On hearing the Probate Court, 3 Ohio Supp. 217, found and adjudged that the dividends in dispute should be distributed by the trustee, to Mary W. Blum. On appeal judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeals, and the Supreme Court allowed a motion to certify.—[Editorial Statement.]

Judgment affirmed.

The agreed statement of facts then recites four resolutions passed by the board of directors of the Little Miami Railroad Company, all on January 31, 1939. These resolutions provided for the quarterly dividends on each of the two classes of stock specified so as to reach the amount of four per cent on the one class and 8.60 per cent on the other during the entire year. These dividends were made payable as follows: (1) On March 10, 1939, to stockholders of record on February 24, 1939; (2) on June 10, 1939, to stockholders of record on May 25, 1939; (3) on September 9, 1939, to stockholders of record on August 25, 1939; and (4) on December 9, 1939, to stockholders of record on November 24, 1939.

The first resolution contained a provision that the transfer books should be closed on the record date, to wit, February 24, 1939, and reopened on the morning of March 10, 1939. Each of the last three resolutions contains provisions that the transfer books should be closed on the record date and reopened two days after the date the dividend was payable.

The amounts of the four dividends were as follows: $360.50, $391.70, $391.70 and $391.70.

WILLIAMS, JUDGE. The question is: Is the executor of Flora K. Wuichet, deceased (who died seized as beneficiary of a life interest in stock of the Little Miami Railroad Company), entitled to dividends declared before her death but payable to stockholders who were of record on a date subsequent to her death?

The contest is between the executor of the deceased owner of the life interest and the trustee of Mary W. Blum, who is referred to in the agreed statement of facts as the remainderman, although the original application for order of distribution sets out that Mary W. Blum has a successive life interest in the stock. Since the contest is over "usual" dividends (that is, ordinary as distinguished from extraordinary dividends), it is not a matter of consequence whether Mary W. Blum claims as successive life tenant or as remainderman. As to ordinary dividends payable out of net current earnings the rule would be the same in either event. The decedent will therefore be referred to as the life tenant and Mary W. Blum as the remainderman.

The general rule is that ordinary dividends declared without proviso during the lifetime of the owner of a life interest in the stock belong to him, regardless of the time they are made payable, and if he dies before payment, the right to them passes to his personal representative.

Here, however, the dividends in question, although declared prior to the death of the life tenant, were payable to stockholders who were of record on days subsequent to the day on which she died, with the proviso that the transfer books of the corporation should be closed on the record date, that is, the day fixed for determining the stockholders of record to whom the dividends were payable.

There is a dearth of authority on the precise point presented. The rule sustained in our judgment by the better reasoning supports the view that where a life tenant dies between the declaration of the dividend and the record date the dividend passes to the successive life tenant or to the remainderman as the case may be. Nutter, Trustee, v. Andrews, Adm'x, 246 Mass. 224, 142 N.E. 67 [Citing cases.] * * *

It should be observed in this connection that there is a close analogy between the situation here and that arising when a stockholder sells his stock, without reservation, between the declaration of the dividend and the record date. In the absence of a specific agreement with reference to the dividend the rule is that on such a sale the dividend passes to the vendee. * * *

That analogy is recognized in the leading case of Nutter, Trustee, v. Andrews, Adm'x, supra, in which, as indicated, was involved the precise question presented in the instant case. In the opinion therein the court says, at page 228 of 246 Mass., at page 68 of 142 N.E.: "It is common knowledge that frequently in the resolution declaring a dividend is also a clause to the effect that the dividend shall be payable to those who are stockholders of record on a specified date. * * * This form of vote in declaring dividends doubtless has been adopted because of its convenience and because it avoids confusion and misunderstandings. Such vote relates to a detail touching the internal management of the corporation. It belongs to a class of affairs which the corporation has a right ordinarily to settle and thereby bind its stockholders so long as the action taken is in good faith and without fraud or collusion. It is in substance a declaration that the vote for the payment of the dividend shall be operative and take effect as to stockholders on that date and not earlier. There is no inflexible rule of law which prevents such vote of those responsible for the management of the corporation from having its natural effect. Persons by becoming stockholders in a corporation impliedly agree to be bound by the reasonable rules and practices adopted for the management of corporate affairs. Business policies adopted by business men for the management of business transactions ought not to be frustrated unless contrary either to some rule of law or to fundamental ethical rules of right and wrong. Votes as to the time and method for ascertainment of the stockholders entitled to dividends, such as here are in question, do not offend against either of these tests. It is but the logical result of general principles of corporation law to hold that a vote of that nature passed in good faith and reasonable in its operation is binding upon the stockholders. It was so held in a well-reasoned judgment in Richter [& Co.] v. Light [Trustee], 97 Conn. 364, 116 A. 600."

It will be noted that the learned jurist made no distinction between stock owned by a life tenant who dies between the declaration of a dividend and the record date, and stock sold by its owner and holder during that period. That the court regarded the rule as applicable to both situations is emphasized by the citation of Richter & Co. v. Light, Trustee, supra, which involved stock sold in the interim between the declaration and the record date.

The principles, which determine the rights of a life tenant in corporate stock, and to dividends arising therefrom, are well established and fundamental. Accumulated earnings belong primarily to the corporation and prior to the declaration of a dividend therefrom the stockholder has no right to participate in the accumulation as such; but by the declaration the right to the dividend becomes fixed forthwith in the then stockholders regardless of the mere specification of a future date for payment, unless the resolution, in which the declaration is incorporated, provides in effect for a later time of vesting. Accordingly it is necessary to ascertain from the declaratory resolution when and in whom the right vests. If the time of vesting occurs after the death of a person who is owner of a life interest in stock, it is self-evident that he would not be seized of the right at any time. If, on the other hand, the right to a declared and unpaid dividend becomes his during life, and he dies seized thereof, the right survives his death and passes to his personal representative. Upon the vesting of the dividend in the life tenant, he becomes a creditor of the corporation. Until then, of course, no indebtedness is created. When, however, the life tenant dies between the declaration and the record date, no debtor-creditor relationship arises between him and the corporation. The reason is that there is no definitely ascertainable creditor until the record date arrives and without an ascertained or ascertainable creditor an indebtedness can not subsist. In the last analysis the passage of a resolution declaring a dividend and making it payable to stockholders of record of a named date amounts to a determination that the right to the dividend shall vest on that date.

In the instant case the stock was held by the trustee for the use of Flora K. Wuichet, during her life. On the latter's death, the dividends had previously been declared but had not vested in her trustee for her use. They would therefore pass to the remainderman. In other words the same rule would apply as if the trusteeship had not existed. * * *

For the reasons given the disputed dividends belong to Mary W. Blum, the remainderman, and not to the executor of the estate of Flora K. Wuichet, deceased life tenant.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

MARTINDELL v. FIDUCIARY COUNSEL, INCORPORATED.

Court of Errors and Appeals, New Jersey, 1943. 133 N.J.Eq. 408, 30 A.2d 281.

Suit by Virginia P. Martindell against Fiduciary Counsel, Incorporated, and Mildred Martindell, involving right to a dividend on shares of stock, wherein Mildred Martindell filed a counterclaim. From a decree advised by the Vice Chancellor, 131 N.J.Eq. 523, 26 A.2d 171, complainant appeals.

Affirmed.

[Statement of facts from opinion of Vice Chancellor, 131 N.J.Eq. 523, 26 A.2d 171, 172 (1942):

The question is whether complainant or defendant, Miss Mildred L. Martindell, is entitled to a dividend of $100 a share on 27 shares of stock of Fiduciary Counsel, Inc., declared December 30, 1940. The parties had entered into an agreement dated October 25, 1939, which recited their desire that the defendant should have an option to purchase the stock from the complainant: "Now therefore, the seller (complainant) agrees to sell and transfer said 27 shares of stock of Fiduciary Counsel, Inc., to the buyer (defendant) for the price and sum of $5,000 at any time within five years from the date of this agreement."

On December 27, 1940, defendant wrote complainant as follows:

"I hereby exercise the option referred to in agreement between us dated October 25, 1939, and accordingly do hereby demand that you transfer, sell and deliver to me twenty-seven (27) shares of stock of Fiduciary Counsel, Inc. I have deposited the purchase price of Five Thousand Dollars ($5,000) with the Colorado National Bank of Denver, Colorado, to which bank I have given instructions to pay over said sum of Five Thousand Dollars ($5,000) to you or your order against delivery of said shares of stock of Fiduciary Counsel, Inc., duly endorsed and stamped for transfer.

"If you do not accept such procedure for the delivery of said shares and payment of the purchase price, I hereby demand that you designate the time and place for same and I will make payment pursuant to your notice to that effect."

The letter was received by complainant on December 29, and the next day the directors of Fiduciary Counsel, Inc., declared the dividend. On January 3, complainant acknowledged receipt of defendant's letter. She was unwilling to conclude the transaction in the manner suggested by defendant, but stated that she would be ready to deliver the stock against legal tender in the amount of $5,000 at a certain hour and place in New Jersey. The stock was transferred and the consideration paid early in February.]

HEHER, JUSTICE. * * * A dividend declared on corporate capital stock during the pendency of a mere option to purchase the shares inures to the transferor, even though payable in futuro. But if there be no provision otherwise, a dividend declared on shares constituting the subject of a binding executory contract of sale, after the making of the contract and before the consummation of the sale, is the property of the transferee. Equity regards and treats as done what in good conscience ought to be done. * * *

Shares of capital stock are "personal property." R.S.1937, 14:8–12 N.J.S.A. 14:8–12. And dividends thereon constitute a portion of the accumulated surplus or profits of the enterprise allotted to the stockholders according to their several interests, as their distributive property. R.S. 14:8–19 and 14:8–20, N.J.S.A. 14:8–19, 14:8–20. Upon declaration, the dividend becomes instanter the property of the shareholder, although payable in the future. It is separate and distinct from the stock, and does not pass as an incident of the shares if sold before the payment of the dividend. But prior to the declaration of the dividend, the stockholder's right to share in the corporate surplus or profits is an incident of his stock ownership and is included in a sale of the shares. Ford v. Snook, 205 App.Div. 194, 199 N.Y.S. 630, affirmed 240 N.Y. 624, 148 N.E. 732. By the same token, this right to participate in a distribution of surplus or earnings among the shareholders is an incident of the beneficial ownership of shares made the subject of an executory contract of sale, and a dividend intervening the making of the contract and the consummation of the sale passes to the holder of the equitable title to the stock and is an interest cognizable and enforceable in equity. Such is the equitable conception of right and duty barring provision otherwise. The equitable obligation is designed to fulfill the common intention of the parties. In these circumstances, it is deemed that the parties contemplated the transfer of the shareholder's interest in the corporate property as it subsisted when the contract of sale was made. This is the element of value that measures the sale price. That interest undiminished by the subsequently declared dividend was the thing bargained for. To borrow the metaphor of the opinion in La Fountain & Woolson Co. v. Brown, 91 Vt. 340, 101 A. 36, L.R.A.1917F, 551, equity permits the vendor to retain the "fallen fruit," but it does not grant to him the additional privilege of "shaking the tree" after the bargain is closed.

Shares of stock represent the holder's interest in the corporate assets, and their transfer serves to convey that interest. The surplus of a corporation is an integral part of the stock itself until separated from the capital by the declaration of a dividend. In re Heaton's Estate, 89

Vt. 550, 96 A. 21, L.R.A.1916D, 201. "Such undivided surplus will pass with the stock under that name in a transfer thereof. The purchaser takes the stock with all its incidents, one of which is the right to receive its proportionate share of undivided profits." La Fountain & Woolson Co. v. Brown, supra [91 Vt. 340, 101 A. 37, L.R.A.1917F, 551]. Under an executory contract of sale, there being no different intent, the vendor's beneficial interest passes to the vendee immediately the contract of sale is made. The Uniform Stock Transfer Law, R.S.1937, 14:8–23, et seq., N.J.S.A. 14:8–23 et seq., has no applicancy to transfers of an equitable title; it governs the conveyance of the legal title only. Stuart v. Sargent, 283 Mass. 536, 186 N.E. 649.

Thus, if there be no stipulation to the contrary, the vendee under an executory contract of sale of corporate stock is entitled in equity, on the performance of his contract, to a dividend declared on the shares subsequent to the making of the contract.

As stated, equitable ownership is not effective for all purposes. For example, it is the general rule that, unless there be a statutory provision or a stipulation contrariwise, an executory contract for the sale of capital stock does not deprive the holder of the legal title of his right to vote thereon at stockholders' meetings. In re Argus Co., 138 N.Y. 557, 34 N.E. 388; 18 C.J.S., Corporations, § 548, p. 1239. Vide R.S. 1937, 14:10–1, et seq., N.J.S.A. 14:10–1 et seq.

There is no superior equity in favor of the optionor here which serves to vary the application of the general rule. Indeed, there is no such contention.

Let the decree be affirmed.

D. PREFERRED STOCK [1]

"Whatever preferential rights and privileges may thus be granted to a stockholder, the law regards them as contractual. 'The certificate of stock is the muniment of the shareholder's title, and evidence of his right. It expresses the contract between the corporation and his co-stockholders and himself.'" Strout v. Cross, Austin & Ireland Lumber Co., 283 N.Y. 406, 28 N.E.2d 890, 1940, infra p. 531.

In many states, the articles or certificate of incorporation is the sole source of the terms of the preferred share contract and the by-laws, stock certificates or corporate resolutions cannot add to or alter those terms. Gaskill v. Gladys Belle Oil Co., 16 Del.Ch. 289, 146 A. 337, 1929. But many courts have looked not alone to the charter, but to the stock certificate, the by-laws and all resolutions, notes or proceedings under which the shares were issued. Continental Ins. Co. v. United States, 259 U.S. 156, 42 S.Ct. 540, infra p. 569; Scott v. Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co., 93 Md. 475, 49 A. 327, 1901.

---

1 On preferred stock, see: Berle, Studies in the Law of Corporation Finance, 1928, c. VI; Dewing, The Financial Policy of Corporations, 4th Ed., 1941, Vol. I, c. 7; Grossman, Corporate Securities—Especially Common and Preferred Stocks, 1931, 17 A.B.A.J. 123; Notes, Right of Holders of Preferred Stock in Respect of Dividends, 1930, 67 A.L.R. 765; 1935, 98 A.L.R. 1526; The Controlling Effect of Articles of Incorporation Over Share Certificates, 1924, 24 Col.L.Rev. 177; 1925, 11 Corn.L.Q. 230; Preferred Stock as an Investment Security, 1939, 28 Geo.L.J. 232; 1938, 22 Minn.L.Rev. 676; 1936, 23 Va.L.Rev. 189.

See N. Y. Stock Corp. Law, § 11, supra 223; Del. Gen. Corp. Law, § 13, supra 224.

The preferred shareholders are members of the company and except in so far as their rights may be altered by their contract under which the shares are issued, they are entitled in all respects to the same rights as the common shareholders. General Inv. Co. v. Bethlehem Steel Co., infra, p. 593.

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW, § 11. Preferred and Common Shares, supra, p. 223.

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW, § 13. Classes of Stock, supra, p. 224.

NOTE

PREFERRED STOCK AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR BONDS OR NOTES

(A) Financially, preferred stocks are at present used by corporations as the lowest grade of security by which money can be obtained at a fixed price.

The law regards the preferred shareholder as a shareholder for all purposes. The corporation, on the other hand, is much more apt to regard him as a substitute for a bond or note holder. When capital is desired, and it is not wished to sell a full participation, i. e. common stock, a discussion normally goes on as to whether the corporation will issue bonds or preferred stock.

A modern preferred stock is practically always "redeemable," i. e., the corporation can pay off the holder of it at a stipulated price and eliminate him from the picture. It commonly bears a fixed dividend right and is commonly limited so that it will receive only a stated amount in case the corporation is liquidated or wound up. None of these elements is necessarily present. Preferred stock may also be secured by various means as, for instance, by a sinking fund carved out of profits.

The law draws a sharp distinction between the stockholder or participant in profits, and the bondholder who is a creditor. It is questionable whether financially this distinction is justified. The bondholder and the preferred stockholder both will collect their interest or dividends and ultimately be paid off, if, but only if, the management is reasonably able and faithful. On the other hand, neither the one nor the other has a vivid personal interest in seeing the corporation tremendously successful, since neither will profit largely by that success. Both, however, have their money so involved in the corporation that it cannot be repaid except after a considerable period of time.

Financially preferred stock is useful because

(a) non-payment of dividends does not entail foreclosure or winding up of the corporation;

(b) repayment of the investment does not fall due at any given time, the redemption feature being commonly an option only on the part of the corporation;

(c) it permits the corporation to borrow money on a note or bond which will be collected out of the assets before the preferred shareholder secures anything, thus leaving the corporation an additional credit resource.

At present, it is the banking cliché that the average industrial company can market a preferred stock provided it shows earnings in excess of three times the dividend requirements on its preferred issues. This varies: a stable company like a water works can sell preferred stock with less earnings; a hazardous business such as a mine will have difficulty in selling preferred stock, whatever its earnings.

(B) "* * * actually (the preferred stockholder) is an investor, almost entirely disassociated from the management of the corporation and primarily interested in the security and monetary return of his investment. What protective devices have been allowed by the courts to safeguard the investment is thus a question of primary importance. Some of the more significant provisions which have been embodied in the certificates of preferred stock are; (i) devices to insure payment of dividends; (ii) devices to secure redemption, and the closely allied device to assure priority in the distribution of assets upon dissolution; (iii) devices for protection against future incumbrances; (iv) devices to assure a share in the management of the corporation." Note, 1927, 27 Col.L.Rev. 587. A further protective device is illustrated by a North Carolina statute which permits the holders of one-fifth of the corporation's paid-up stock to petition for dissolution if the corporate net earnings for three successive years are insufficient to pay an annual 4% dividend. Note, Statutory Protection of Preferred Stockholders, 1934, 43 Yale L.J. 1196.

TENNANT v. EPSTEIN et al.

Supreme Court of Illinois, 1934. 356 Ill. 26, 189 N.E. 864.

Suit by Thomas R. Tennant against Harry Epstein and others. From a judgment of the Appellate Court (271 Ill.App. 204) reversing a decree of the circuit court for complainant, he appeals.

Reversed, and decree of the circuit court affirmed.

FARTHING, JUSTICE. This cause comes here from the Appellate Court for the Second District by appeal and certificate of importance. That court reversed a decree of the circuit court of Lake county without remanding the cause.

The appellant, Thomas R. Tennant, filed a bill in equity in July, 1929, in the Lake county circuit court, against the appellees Harry Epstein, Anna Epstein, his wife, Chester H. Epstein, their son, and the Grayslake Gelatine Company, an Illinois corporation. The bill prayed for cancellation of 32,000 shares of common stock which formed a stock dividend, for repayment of cash dividends thereon, and, in the alternative, for relief not in question in this court. * * * The question presented by this record is whether the holders of preferred stock in this company have a right to share in a stock dividend to be paid for out of the undivided earnings and surplus in addition to the 7 per cent. annual cash dividend. The preference which preferred stock enjoys over common stock as to dividends is entirely a matter of contract. The contract is generally set forth in the charter or articles of incorporation, by-laws or stock certificates. No case has been found from our own jurisdiction bearing upon the point of the right of preferred stock to share in dividends beyond the amount of preference stated. Decisions of other jurisdictions are helpful only to the extent that the language contained in the contract between the shareholders is similar to that under consideration here and if the statutes there are similar to our own. * * *

It is elementary that the statute in force when the contract between the shareholders was made is a part of their contract. Where no statute exists, the contract itself is all that need be looked to to determine the preferential rights of preferred stockholders. Williams v. Renshaw, 220 App.Div. 39, 220 N.Y.S. 532. At the time the contract contained in the articles of incorporation in this case was entered into between the parties to this suit, the act in force was the act of 1919 as amended in 1921 (Smith-Hurd Rev.St.1931, pp. 743, 745, c. 32). Sections 6 and 31 (Smith-Hurd Rev.St.1931, c. 32, §§ 6, 31) provide, respectively, what shall be included in the articles of incorporation and stock certificates. Paragraph 4 of section 6 provides that each corporation organized under the act shall, subject to the conditions and limitations prescribed by the act, have the following powers, rights, and privileges: "To have a capital stock of such an amount, and divided into shares with a par value, or without a par value, and to divide such capital stock into such classes, with such preferences, rights, values and interests as may be provided in the articles of incorporation," etc. Section 31 provides: "Shares of stock having a par value shall be represented by certificates which shall state the number of shares represented thereby, the par value thereof, the name of the holder, the relative rights, interests and preference (if any) of such shares," etc. These provisions of the statute clearly limit the rights, preferences, and interest of preferred as well as common shareholders to what is set out in the articles of incorporation and the stock certificates. In addition to statutory provisions, the rule of construction has been generally adhered to that expressio unius est exclusio alterius. Stone v. United States Envelope Co., supra; Ramsey v. Steel Co. of Canada, 4 D.L.R. (Ont.) 879; Lyman v. Southern Railway Co., 149 Va. 274, 141 S.E. 240.

What, then, did the parties here intend? Epstein's attorney, who drew up the articles of incorporation, the stock certificates, and bylaws, testified that the declaration of a stock dividend was not contemplated at the time the corporation was organized. We are left to determine what the parties must have meant from a consideration of the language they used, the circumstances surrounding the parties, and their conduct. Continental Ins. Co. v. United States, 259 U.S. 156, 42 S.Ct. 540, 66 L.Ed. 871. Before the corporation was formed, Epstein told Tennant that the profits on 25 per cent. of the common stock would double his salary of $1,000 per month. Moses testified that Tennant was very insistent that the preferred stock should yield a return of 7 per cent. and should be cumulative, so that he could pay interest on the $10,000 he had borrowed for the purpose of buying the preferred stock. These objects were expressed when the corporation was formed. The articles gave the preferred stock a first lien on the assets of the company in the event of dissolution and a preference of 7 per cent. cumulative dividend before any dividend should be declared upon the common stock. The stock certificates stated that the preferred stock should receive from the surplus or net earnings of the corporation dividends at the rate of 7 per cent., and no more. That would seem to be a complete delimitation of the rights of the preferred stock. It certainly negatives an equal distribution of the surplus of the company after the payment of the preferred dividend.

We think the results reached in Stone v. United States Envelope Co., supra, Niles v. Ludlow Valve Manf. Co. (C.C.A.) 202 F. 141, Id., 231 U.S. 748, 34 S.Ct. 320, 58 L.Ed. 465, and Will v. United Lankat Plantations Co., [1914] A.C. 11, cited in 67 A.L.R. 775, are more nearly in accord with business usage and the expectation of investors when they purchase preferred shares of stock. In Will v. United Lankat Plantations Co., supra, Earl Loreburn, speaking for the House of Lords, said that a general assumption is well founded that, where preference shares are given and a definite preferential dividend is fixed,

"that impliedly negatives any right to take any further dividend." It was contended that the rights of preference shareholders ought not to be cut down except where something is found which negatives the right to any further share in the profits. He remarked that people taking the preference shares would doubtless have been surprised to learn that they were to receive the "almost boundless additional advantages which have been held out to them in the arguments we have been hearing," and that it was really an attempt to add to the terms of the contract "by screwing something out of the articles which the framers of the contract, I do not believe, ever thought of." * * * We think the reasoning of these cases applies here. The preferences stated in the stock certificates are a delimitation of the rights of the preferred stockholders.

Another act adverse to appellees' contention is found in the payment of the 49 per cent. dividend on the value of the 2,000 shares of common stock in 1929 and the payment of but the limited 7 per cent. on the value of 30,000 shares of preferred stock in that year prior to the stock dividend. Appellees contend that by payment of this "equalizing" dividend the case of Stone v. United States Envelope Co., supra, is rendered inapplicable, but cite Englander v. Osborne, 261 Pa. 366, 104 A. 614, 6 A.L.R. 800, where it is said: "We find nothing limited the right of the preferred stockholders to the 6 per cent. dividend regardless of the earnings of the company, and in absence of such limitation the general rule is that such stockholders are entitled to share with the holders of the common stock all profits distributed after the latter have received in any year an amount equal to the dividend on the preferred stock." If this rule of law quoted by appellees is correct, the preferred stock should have had a dividend in 1929 of 49 per cent. instead of 7 per cent., "and no more," as provided in the stock certificates. What was paid on the preferred stock shows the interpretation by the parties of their rights and privileges as expressed in the articles of incorporation.

The position of the appellees is that the preferred stockholders are as much parties to the business venture as the common stockholders and are entitled to all the rights of the common stockholders except as modified by statute and contract. Star Publishing Co. v. Ball, supra; Englander v. Osborne, supra. In other words, they say that the preferences contained in the articles and the stock certificates are merely delimitations of the preferences and not of the rights of the stockholders. The effect of this would be to make the preferred shares participating when no mention of such a right or interest is contained in the articles of incorporation. The parties had the duty, under the law, to provide for this additional right if they intended to create it.

It is contended that the by-law which gave all stockholders equal right to subscribe to new stock at not less than par entitled appellees to share in the stock dividend. The answer to this is, that the act requires the rights, privileges, and interests to be set out in the articles of incorporation and to be again contained in the stock certificates. The contention is also made that what is said in the stock certificates is not controlling, but that, since the words "no more" are not found in the articles, while they do appear in the certificates, this gives the right to share in a stock dividend to preferred stockholders. For the same reasons this contention is unsound. What the parties did was to interpret and construe the meaning of the articles of incorporation by expanding what was said therein. The obvious purpose of having articles of incorporation and requiring by statute the statement of rights, privileges, etc., therein and in stock certificates, is to make convenient and certain the necessary information as to these matters for the use and protection of the investing public.

Cases involving income taxes and the construction of wills are cited to the effect that stock dividends are not dividends of cash. While this is true, the holders of the majority of the stock in this company cannot do indirectly what they cannot do directly. They cannot, by a stock dividend based upon a by-law intended to cover the situation which would arise if new capital were required, create a right to additional cash dividends in the holders of preferred stock, to the plain detriment of the appellant as one of the holders of the original common stock.

It is strongly urged, first, that, since no mention is made of the distribution of surplus assets in case of dissolution, the holders of preferred stock would be entitled to share pro rata with holders of common stock after principal and dividends were paid on the preferred stock and a like payment of principal and dividends on common stock. From this it is urged, secondly, that the holders of preferred stock should share in the division of a present surplus executed through the medium of a stock dividend. For two reasons this is illogical and unsound: First, it was not necessary in the stock certificates to use the words "no more" to limit payment of dividends to seven per cent per annum; second, the so-called "consistency rule" does not permit appellees, who are a majority in voting power, to withhold dividends on common stock, pile up a surplus, indefinitely vote a stock dividend to themselves not provided for in the articles of incorporation, and thus deprive the holders of common stock of cash dividends they might have received had these things not been done. The purpose is obvious when it is recalled that cash dividends on all common stock were declared after the stock dividend.

It is strenuously argued that the stock dividend should be allowed to stand because, if declared pro rata, it would effect no change in voting control. While this is true, it very materially changes a more important right, viz., the right to dividends if and when declared. If the rights were as contended by appellees, it would be pertinent to ask. Why would any one invest $10,000, or any other sum, in common stock in this company? In Cratty v. Peoria Law Library Ass'n, 219 Ill. 516, 76 N.E. 707, we recognized the rule that, while the directors of a corporation are given a wide discretion as to the question of declaring dividends, yet, if this discretion is abused, or if they act in bad faith or in an arbitrary manner, a holder of common stock may ask the aid of equity to compel the declaration of a dividend. There can be no question that in the opinion of the majority of the stockholders all the surplus was not needed. A dividend would not affect the voting control. No necessity for a stock dividend is shown. Immediate declaration of cash dividends followed the stock dividend. The cash dividends to the holders of preferred stock were increased, and this was the only end served. In the contract no stock dividend was provided for as to holders of preferred stock. The question, therefore, of voting control is not properly involved in the case, but the question of cash dividends, and the right thereto if cash dividends be declared, is here for a determination. We are aware of the authorities, both of cases and text-writers, which indicate that the element of consideration of voting control makes it necessary that stock dividends be distributed pro rata among all shareholders where nothing to the contrary is contained in the contract. In our opinion, the authorities mentioned do not control in this case, in view of the statute of this state in force when the corporation was organized, the articles of incorporation, the stock certificates' recitals, and the construction given the contract by the stockholders, who are the same persons now as were the original shareholders.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment of the Appellate Court is reversed, and the decree of the circuit court of Lake county is affirmed.

Appellate Court reversed, circuit court affirmed.[3]

NOTE

If the charter or certificates expressly provide what shall be the respective shares of the preferred and common stockholders in any surplus, their terms will be followed by the courts. Courts have worked out several rules to be applied in cases in which the contract is not specific. In addition to the rule laid down in Scott v. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. (cited supra, p. 499) there is the so-called "Pennsylvania" rule, which provides that: "In the absence of such limitation (limiting the rights of preferred stockholders to a 6% dividend regardless of the company's earnings) the general rule is that such (preferred) stockholders are entitled to share with the holders of the common stock all profits distributed after the latter have received in any year an amount equal to the dividend on the preferred stock." Englander v. Osborne, 261 Pa. 366, 368, 104 A. 614, 6 A.L.R. 800, 1918. A third possible rule which might be applied would be first to pay the preferred its stated dividend, then divide the balance equally between the preferred and common stockholders, without first giving the common stockholders an equal dividend with the preferred. This rule does not seem to have been adopted by any court. On the rights of preferred stockholders to share in corporate surplus, see, Christ, Right of Holders of Preferred Stock to Paticipate in the Distribution of Profits, 1929, 27 Mich.L.Rev. 731; Rowell, Rights of Preferred Shareholders in Excess of Preference, 1935, 19 Minn.L.Rev. 406 (disagrees with the point of view taken by Christ); Thompson, Respective Rights of Preferred and Common Stockholders in Surplus Profits, 1921, 19 Mich.L.Rev. 463; Notes, 1925, 11 Corn.L.Q. 234; 1937, 12 St.John's L.Rev. 108; 1931, 79 U. of Pa.L.Rev. 466; 1931, 31 Col.L.Rev. 164; 1930, 29 Mich.L.Rev. 250; 1935, 33 Mich.L.Rev. 968; 1933, 81 U. of Pa.L.Rev. 875.

[3] Note, 1934, 2 U. of Chi.L.Rev. 133; 1935, 33 Mich.L.Rev. 439; 1935, 19 Minn.L. Rev. 239; 1934, 83 U. of Pa.L.Rev. 91.

1. PREFERRED STOCK: PRIORITY DISTINGUISHED FROM DEBT

HAZEL ATLAS GLASS CO. v. VAN DYK & REEVES, Inc.
VAN DYK v. YOUNG.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Second Circuit, 1925.
8 F.2d 716.

Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of New York. Creditors' suit by Hazel Atlas Glass Co. against Van Dyk & Reeves, Inc.

[In 1921 a partnership to manufacture and deal in food products was formed by Edmond Van Dyk, Benjamin Reeves and Marion Ellis. The partnership was dissolved and its property and assets assigned to a corporation formed in July, 1922 by the copartners. Van Dyk's property in trade-marks, names and labels was valued at $45,000. $45,000 of common stock was issued to Reeves and Ellis and deposited by them in escrow to secure a $45,000 note made by them to Van Dyk in January, 1922. This note was exempted from the partnership liabilities assumed by the corporation and remained the personal obligation of Reeves and Ellis.

In July, 1922, Van Dyk, Reeves and Ellis entered into an agreement whereby Van Dyk was to receive $45,000 par value of the 100,000 preferred shares of the corporation; this stock was to receive a 10% cumulative dividend; it was to have no vote unless three dividends remained unpaid, then to have an equal vote with the common stock until all preferred dividends were paid; Reeves and Ellis were to pay Van Dyk any dividends unpaid by the corporation, and, upon so doing, the three parties waived any right to vote the preferred shares; if Reeves and Ellis failed to make good the amount of any dividend, Van Dyk could demand, on 30 days' notice, that the corporation redeem his stock at par; if the corporation failed to redeem it, Reeves and Ellis must. It was further agreed that the corporation redeem the preferred stock at par on or before January 1, 1932; if it failed to do so, Reeves and Ellis would purchase the stock at par on demand from Van Dyk; further, Reeves and Ellis might purchase the stock at par at any time.

As additional collateral for payment of the debt to Van Dyk and redemption of his preferred stock, $43,200 of common stock was deposited in escrow, to be held until the preferred was redeemed or bought at par. If the preferred was not redeemed or purchased, Van Dyk might foreclose the collateral and have it sold with so much of his preferred stock as had not yet been redeemed or purchased, pursuant to court order.

The corporation agreed to issue the preferred stock, pay dividends on it, purchase and redeem it on the above terms, with Reeves and Ellis as guarantors. With Van Dyk's consent, the corporation imposed the following conditions on the preferred stock issued to him: (1) the stock was to be left in the hands of Van Dyk's attorney in fact; (2) it was not to be taken out of New York state; (3) Van Dyk could not dispose of it except by redemption, sale to Reeves and Ellis, or sale under court order; (4) the terms of the agreement under which the stock was issued were to be stamped on each certificate; (5) if Van Dyk received more than par for the stock (i. e., by a sale at public auction pursuant to court order and there was a surplus) the surplus was to be paid to Reeves and Ellis, who agreed that, if less than par should be realized on such sale, either they or the corporation would make good the deficiency.

The corporation went into receivership; Van Dyk filed his claim as a creditor; from an order holding him not a creditor entitled to file a claim against the corporation, he appeals.]

ROGERS, Circuit Judge (after stating the facts). A receiver was appointed for the corporation in the usual creditors' suit. In due course the receiver moved the court for an order expunging a claim filed by appellant herein on the ground that he had no provable claim against the Van Dyk corporation—being a stockholder therein and not a creditor. This is an appeal from that order, and the sole question is whether this appellant is in law a creditor of the corporation.

The corporation agreed that the preferred stock should be entitled to cumulative dividends at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, payable in equal monthly installments. Under such an agreement the corporation was legally bound to pay these dividends out of profits. If it had expressly agreed to pay them out of its capital, the agreement would have been unlawful and void. * * *

The general rule is that a holder of preferred stock, even though the preferred dividend is guaranteed, is not regarded as a creditor of the corporation, and entitled as such to share with the other creditors in the distribution of the assets. He is, like the holders of the common stock, merely a stockholder, but with this difference, that he is entitled to priority of payment out of the assets which remain after all debts are paid; the holders of the common stock sharing in such assets as are left. * * *

The rights which the holder of preferred stock has depend upon his contract with the corporation. The rule is that preferred stockholders are entitled to vote the same as the common stockholders, unless by the terms of its issue the voting power has been expressly withheld. But the fact that Van Dyk, as the holder of the preferred stock, was to have no right to vote it, except in the event that three dividends should remain unpaid, and thereupon should have equal voting rights with the holders of the common stock until all dividends on the preferred stock were paid, is a matter of no consequence, so far as the legal question herein involved is concerned. It does not change Van Dyk's status from that of a preferred stockholder into that of a creditor. * * *

We have already pointed out that the agreement which the corporation made to redeem the stock and to pay dividends at 10 per cent. per annum in equal monthly instalments did not change the relation of Van Dyk to the corporation from that of a stockholder into that of a creditor, and that all that was meant was that redemption and dividend payments were to be made only out of surplus. It could not lawfully have agreed to redeem or to pay dividends out of capital. The same construction must be placed upon this agreement to be liable for a deficiency resulting from the foreclosure sale. It must be understood that this liability for any deficiency is limited to the liability originally assumed by it. We have seen that that liability did not extend beyond redeeming from its surplus and paying dividends from its surplus. * * * Order affirmed.[3]

NOTE

(A) "While * * * the claim of the holders of the preferred stock against the corporation is not strictly a debt, but is contingent upon the existence of sufficient net profits to pay it, it is evident that preferred stock is only a security for a loan, upon which a certain and definite interest was to be paid while the corporation existed, and the full amount thereof returned to the lender when it was dissolved, before the holders of the common stock should receive anything. * * * about the only difference between him and the ordinary lender of money was that he was not to receive his interest unless there were sufficient net profits to pay the same. Therefore, so far as the face value of the preferred stock is concerned, it is in the nature of a debt against the corporation, and the interest thereon becomes a debt as soon as it can be shown that there were profits wherewith to pay it, and becomes a lien prior to the rights of the holders of common stock upon the net earnings, if there were such, for the amount of the dividend, and can be followed wherever invested by the company." Storrow et al. v. Texas Consolidated Compress & Manufacturing Ass'n, 87 F. 612, 616–617, C.C.A.Tex.1898, cert. denied, 174 U.S. 800, 19 S.Ct. 887, 43 L.Ed. 1187, 1898. See, also, Note, 1939, 123 A.L.R. 856; 1913, 13 Col.L.Rev. 545; 1930, 28 Mich.L.Rev. 764.

(B) The exercise of an option given preferred stockholders to convert their shares into corporate bonds does not give them a preference over corporate creditors in bankruptcy proceedings. 1936, 34 Mich.L.Rev. 1041.

LLOYD et al. v. PENNSYLVANIA ELECTRIC VEHICLE CO.

Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, 1909.
75 N.J.Eq. 263, 72 A. 16, 21 L.R.A.,N.S., 228, 138 Am.St.Rep. 557, 20 Ann.Cas. 119.

SWAYZE, J. The question involved in this case is the distribution of a surplus remaining in the hands of the trustees in liquidation of the Pennsylvania Electric Vehicle Company after payment of the debts. The controversy is between the preferred stockholders, whose claims will absorb the whole surplus in case they are entitled to a preference in the distribution, and the common stockholders. The vice-chancellor decided in favor of the preferred stockholders.

The question to be decided is one of contract, and the contract of the preferred and common stockholders inter sese is determined by the provisions of the statute and of the certificate of incorporation. The sections of the statute [P.L.1896, p. 277] that are material to the inquiry are sections 8, 18, and 86.[4]

---

[3] Cert. denied, 269 U.S. 570, 46 S.Ct. 26, 70 L.Ed. 417, 1925.

[4] Cf. N.J.S.A. 14:2–3: "The certificate of incorporation shall set forth: * * * e. * * * if there be more than one class of stock created by the certificate, a descrip-

Section 8, as amended in 1898 (P.L.1898, p. 408), requires that the certificate of incorporation shall set forth the amount of the authorized capital stock, the number of shares into which the same is divided, and the par value of each share, and if there be more than one class of stock created by the certificate of incorporation, a description of the different classes, with the terms on which the respective classes of stock are created.

Section 18 authorizes every corporation organized under the act to create two or more kinds of stock, of such classes, with such designations, preferences and voting powers or restrictions, or qualifications thereof as shall be stated and expressed in the certificate of incorporation, or in any certificate of amendment thereof. It provides that at no time shall the total amount of the preferred stock issued and outstanding exceed two-thirds of the capital stock paid for in cash or property, and such preferred stock may, if desired, be made subject to redemption at any time after three years from the issue thereof at a price not less than par, and the holders thereof shall be entitled to receive, and the corporation shall be bound to pay thereon, dividends at such rates and on such conditions as shall be stated in the original or amended certificate of incorporation, not exceeding eight per centum. It also provides that in case of insolvency, the debts or other liabilities shall be paid in preference to the preferred stock.[5]

The provision of the certificate of incorporation, as amended, is as follows:

"Forty thousand of said shares are to be preferred stock, the holder thereof to receive, and the company to pay, a fixed yearly dividend of six per cent. before any dividend shall be set apart or paid on the general stock."

The company was organized in 1899, pursuant to the act of 1896 [P.L. p. 277.]

Section 86 of the present act, N.J.S.A. 14:14–23, is substantially the same as section 80 of the act of 1875 [Revision 1877, p. 191]. Sections 8 and 18, N.J.S.A. 14:2–3, 14:8–1 to 4, introduced new provisions, in that the former requires that the certificate of incorporation shall contain a description of the different classes, with the terms on which the respective classes of stock are created, in case more than one class of stock is created by the certificate; and the latter, which takes the place of section 25 of the act of 1875, authorizes the creation of more than two kinds of stock, with such designations, preferences

tion of the different classes with the terms on which created; * * *"; 14:8–2: "The holders of preferred or special stocks shall be entitled to receive dividends at such rates, on such terms, and at such times as shall be provided in the certificate of incorporation * * * and such dividends may be made cumulative. Such holders shall be entitled to such rights upon the dissolution of or any distribution of the assets of the corporation as shall be expressed in the certificate of incorporation. * * *"

5 N.J.S.A. 14:13–8: "The trustees or receivers shall pay ratably, as far as its moneys and property shall enable them, all the creditors of the corporation who prove their debts in the manner directed by the court. If any balance remains after the payment of the debts and necessary expenses, the same shall be distributed among the stockholders."

Cf. N.Y.General Corporation Law, § 29.

and voting powers or restrictions or qualifications thereof as shall be stated and expressed in the certificate of incorporation.

It has been held, and may be regarded as entirely settled, that calling stock "preferred stock" does not of itself determine the rights of the holders, for the extent of the preference is to be determined by the terms of the contract. McGregor v. Home Insurance Co. of Newark, 33 N.J.Eq. 181; Elkins v. Camden & Atlantic Railroad Co., 36 N.J.Eq. 233.

It was also said, upon equally good grounds in the McGregor Case, that preferred stock, in the absence of an express stipulation or direction to the contrary, simply gives the holder a right of preference in the division of profits, and not in the distribution of capital. The learned vice-chancellor cited as authority the opinion of Vice-Chancellor Maline in the case of In re London India Rubber Co., L.R. 5 Eq. 519; 37 L.J.Eq. 235, and of Sir George Jessel in Griffith v. Paget, L.R. 6 Ch.Div. 511; 46 L.J.Eq. 493. It was, however, held in the McGregor Case that the terms of section 80 of the act of 1875, now section 86, required that the preferred stockholders should be preferred in the distribution of assets upon insolvency. It is unnecessary to consider whether the opinion of the vice-chancellor in this respect was, as Mr. Cook says (Cook Corp. § 278, note), a mere dictum. We are satisfied that it has been acted upon as a correct statement of the law of the state, and that, if the legislature, in the revision of the Corporation act in 1896, had done no more than reenact this provision, it would be necessary to hold that they had adopted the construction which had been put upon the section sixteen years before. This, however, is not the situation presented by the act of 1896, for that act contained the provisions in section 8 and in section 18, that we have quoted. The insertion of those provisions in the act indicates an intent upon the part of the legislature to make some changes in the then existing law. We think the change that they intended was to require that all preferences or special privileges to be conferred upon any class of stock be set forth in the certificate of incorporation. * * * The power to create preferred stock is granted by section 18, and it is granted upon the terms set forth in that section. To enact that the stock should have such preference as is stated or expressed in the certificate was equivalent to enacting that it should have no other preferences upon the general principle of interpretation that the expression of one thing is the exclusion of another. The very fact that section 18 provided for more than one class of preferred or special stock leads to the same conclusion, for it can hardly be claimed that the rights of more than one kind of preferred stock would be determined by the language of section 86 standing alone. That section is a survival of legislation going back to the early days of corporations in this state, at a time when only one class of preferred stockholders was authorized. Such is not now the case. Under the present act it is possible, for example, to issue what are called sometimes "founders' shares." Unless the rights of such shares are determined by the certificate of incorporation, they cannot be determined by the provisions of section 86, and the same reasoning is applicable to other classes of shares (aside from the ordinary preferred shares) which are issued by modern corporations. We recognize the necessity of construing the several sections of the act so as to give effect to each and to all the language of each. We think that can well be done. Section 86 is still necessary, notwithstanding the changes made in 1896, in order to cover the case of corporations existing under special charters, or corporations under the general acts prior to 1896. A greater difficulty, perhaps, is presented by the provision of section 86, that the surplus funds after payment of creditors, costs, expenses and allowances and the preferred stockholders, shall be paid to the general stockholders proportionally according to their respective shares. It requires no strained construction, however, to hold that this provision as to the payment of preferred stockholders in preference to the general stockholders is a payment to them not of the par value of their stock but of the amount to which they are entitled as a preference by virtue of the contract contained in the certificate of incorporation. Section 86 does not say that the preferred stockholders shall be paid the par value of their stock with the unpaid dividends that may have accrued thereon. It requires only that the preferred stock shall be paid in preference to the general stockholders, and that means that they shall be paid so much, and so much only, as their contract gives them. The amount of the surplus to be paid to the general stockholders is not necessarily the amount that may be left after paying the preferred stockholders the par value of their stock. It may just as well mean the surplus that is left after paying them the amount to which they are entitled by their contract. Nor is any difficulty presented where the terms of the contract entitle the preferred stockholder to a preference in dividends only. In this case which, as Vice-Chancellor Van Vleet said, and as the authorities show, was the ordinary case in the absence of such a provision as that contained in section 86, the preferred stockholders and the general stockholders would share pro rata in the distribution of assets after the payment of dividends due the preferred stockholders. * * * We see no reason why, if the case is ever presented, the same rule should not be applicable under section 86, and the amount to be paid to the preferred stockholders in such a case would be, first, what they were entitled to under the certificate of organization, and second, their proportional share of the remaining assets. The surplus, after making that payment, would, by the terms of section 86, belong to the general stockholders. * * *

It is important that investors in a corporation should be able to ascertain their rights by an examination of the certificate, and it was no doubt with that end in view that the legislature made the changes in the act of 1875, which now appear in section 8 and 18. It is true, as was forcibly argued on behalf of the respondents, that it can hardly be that all of the rights of preferred stockholders need be set forth in the certificate of organization, but this fact does not require that we should hold that the certificate of organization cannot limit such rights. Manifestly it can, for if it were not so it would be beyond the power of the incorporators to take away the right to a preference on distribution of assets conferred by section 86. Since the corporators have this power to limit the rights of preferred stockholders, the question in any particular case is whether they have in fact done so. When they have undertaken, as in this case, to set forth the preference to which preferred stock is entitled, we think that they must set forth that preference fully, and that, so far as they fail to express a preference, the preferred stock can have no other rights than the common stock.

The decree must be reversed, with costs, and the records remitted to the court of chancery for further proceedings therein in conformity with this opinion.[6]

COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE v. MERIDIAN & THIRTEENTH REALTY COMPANY.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Seventh Circuit, 1942. 132 F.2d 182.

Petition by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to review a decision of the Board of Tax Appeals, 44 B.T.A. 865, redetermining deficiency in tax imposed against the Meridian & Thirteenth Realty Company by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Reversed.

EVANS, CIRCUIT JUDGE. Whether a corporate distribution was a dividend or an interest payment, is the major issue on this appeal which involves Federal income taxes. The M. & T. Co., made an $1,800 payment in 1936, which it claims was interest on its indebtedness, but which the Commissioner asserts was a dividend on preferred stock. The Board of Tax Appeals concluded that the payment was one of interest on indebtedness, and therefore deductible Sec. 23(b) [7] of the Revenue Act of 1936, 26 U.S.C.A. Int.Rev. Acts, page 827, and held that the taxpayer had overpaid its income tax by $234. * * *

The facts are free from dispute—rather the problem is the construction of documents to ascertain the real intention of the parties as to the nature of the interest which the "preferred" stockholders held in the corporation.

The Company was organized in Indiana in 1922 for the purpose of erecting and owning a single building, a large building, in the City of Indianapolis. It entered into an underwriting agreement to finance the erection of the building, and, pursuant to the agreement, issued what was called "preferred" stock, of 4,250 shares of $100 par value each, and 2,000 shares of common stock.

---

[6] Consider the rights of preferred stockholders to cumulative unpaid dividends on the dissolution of the corporation. See, Warren, The Progress of the Law: Corporations, 1921, 34 Harv.L.Rev. 282, 303; Developments in the Law—Corporations—1931, 1932, 45 Harv.L.Rev. 1374, 1376–1382; Notes, 1939, 52 Harv.L.Rev. 1331; 1931, 30 Mich.L.Rev. 281; 1929, 78 U. of Pa.L.Rev. 87; 1931, 40 Yale L.J. 828; 1931, 19 Calif. L.Rev. 450; 1930, 30 Col.L.Rev. 118; 1931, 31 Col.L.Rev. 163; 1931, 45 Harv.L.Rev. 185; 1932, 16 Minn.L.Rev. 313.

[7] "All interest paid or accrued within the taxable year on indebtedness" (shall be deductible).

The preferred stock had definite maturity dates. The Company, on December 31, 1936, retired $20,000 of the stock, and there then remained unretired, only $10,000.

Although the quere is simple, i. e., Is the relationship that of creditor or stockholder of a corporation? its determination may often be difficult because it is the result of adding and weighing several elements of a situation some of which may give rise to conflicting inferences. Precedents are abundant, but because of the widely-varying fact bases upon which the conclusions are reached, they serve only as guides. Many are the criteria[8] named to aid in the determination. Sometimes a particular one is called decisive,—or the most important test,—sometimes a combination of the elements sways the determination.

We cannot agree with the Board. Our conclusion is that the legal status here involved was that of a preferred stockholder, and not that of a creditor.

We feel impelled so to conclude, for numerous reasons, chief of which is that most of the attributes which are here claimed to be inherent in, and only compatible with, the creditor status, were here created in order to comply with, and follow, the Indiana statutes[9] relative to the issuance of preferred stock. They are therefore not at all indicative of intention of the parties to create a debtor-creditor relation. The intent of the parties in the establishment of the relation is of extreme importance, and where, as here, there is a simple explanation for the existence of provisions which might otherwise be associated with a creditor relationship, which explanation disproves that relationship, the ambiguous provisions lose most, if not all, of their weight.

We have cited the Indiana Statute solely to aid in the interpretation of the documents under consideration. We are fully cognizant of the holding of the Court in the case of United States v. Pelzer, 312 U.S. 399, 61 S.Ct. 659, 85 L.Ed. 913, where it was held that Federal tax laws are to be construed with a national uniform view point and not according to individual state constructions.

---

[8] These criteria might be enumerated as follows:

Fixed maturity; payment of dividends out of earnings only; cumulative dividends; participation in management; whether unpaid dividends bear interest; right to sue in case of default, and whether status is equal to, or inferior to that of regular corporate creditors; nomenclature used in the documents; intent of the parties.

The Board carefully considered these criteria and stated:

"There are certain facts in this case which must be given due consideration but do not serve to determine the issue. These include, on the one hand, the use of the words 'preferred stock' and 'dividends,' the subordination of the rights of the preferred stockholders to those of general creditors, and, on the other hand, absence of voting rights in the preferred stock. Commissioner v. O. P. P. Holding Corporation, 2 Cir., 76 F.2d 11; Wiggin Terminals, Inc., v. United States, 1 Cir., 36 F.2d 893; Commissioner v. Proctor Shop, Inc., 9 Cir., 82 F.2d 792, affirming 30 B.T.A. 721. But this preferred had other and more significant characteristics. Each share had a fixed maturity date upon which it became payable; the common was held by nominees for the protection of the preferred; the holder of a share of preferred could enforce payment of the entire sum due as a debt in case of default; and the payment of the 6 percent was not dependent upon profits, but was payable and could be demanded in any event."

[9] Laws of Indiana, 1921, Chap. 35, Sec. 15.

We have no such extreme case as was presented in Arthur R. Jones Syndicate v. Commissioner, 23 F.2d 833, a case before this court, where there was obviously a misnomer of the parties' relationship in order to evade a usury statute. It was certain, there, that the parties called the obligation a preferred stock because they couldn't effect their illegal purpose otherwise. We believe the parties in the instant case intended the corporate certificate, by them termed "preferred stock," to be just that.

It is often said that the essential difference between a creditor and a stockholder is that the latter intends to make an investment and take the risks of the venture, while the former seeks a definite obligation, payable in any event. But this variant in the relationship—while sharp in the case of a common stockholder and a bondholder—is less wide and distinct in the case of the preferred stockholder and the bondholder. The preferred stockholder has fortified his security with more safeguards than the common stockholder enjoys—and has deprived himself of some of the nebulous and speculative rights of the residuary claimant which the common stockholder enjoys. But, though the preferred stockholder's status is more secure, he has not quite achieved the protection which a creditor or bondholder enjoys, for he is subject to that very creditor's prior right to complete satisfaction of his obligation, in the distribution of the company's assets. In re 620 Church Street, 299 U.S. 24, 57 S.Ct. 88, 81 L.Ed. 16.

Important is the dispute between the parties over the preferred stockholder's asserted right, in the instant case, to payment of his dividend in any event or whether his right to dividends was restricted to earnings. This has a direct relation to the character of the right involved. A creditor has a right to be paid whether or not his debtor earns anything, but, under the Indiana statute quoted in the margin, a stockholder has no such absolute right to payment of dividends.

A reading of the statute and the above-quoted documents convinces us that the right to pay preferred stock dividends was limited to payment out of earnings. True, if dividends remain unpaid, and there be (a) a liquidation of the company, and (b) there be sufficient assets to meet regular creditors' obligations, then (c) the preferred stockholder is to receive his dividends from the assets before the common stockholders receive anything. That is but the usual right of a preferred stockholder. It is not support for a holding that preferred stock dividends are payable even though there be no earnings.

The Articles of Association provide that the preferred stockholder "shall be entitled to receive cumulative dividends * * before any dividend shall be paid on * * the common stock." Further, it says that "* * the Company shall, out of its earnings or through the proceeds of the sale of additional common stock, redeem its outstanding preferred stock * * plus all accumulated dividends. * *." The underwriting agreement contains a similar provision—the preferment of the preferred stockholder over officers' salaries and common stockholders' dividends. It provides, to quote the exact language, that "so long as any of the preferred stock shall remain outstanding * * (the) company shall pay no salaries to its officers and no dividends on its common stock, except if there has been first set aside as surplus an amount equal to the preferred stock obligations for the next succeeding twelve months." A provision which withholds salaries or common stock dividends to protect preferred stockholders affords no support for a contention that preferred dividends are payable regardless of earnings.

Stockholders have no absolute right to dividends until they are declared. A creditor has a right to his interest in any event. The provision of the preferred stock certificate, which grants the holder thereof the right to require liquidation of the company for failure to comply with its obligations and agreements cannot be construed to give the right to require liquidation for failure to pay a quarterly dividend, but is limited to the company's failure to redeem preferred stock at maturity. It would not apply to the company's failure to pay quarterly dividends, if no earnings were available therefor. * * *

Great reliance is placed upon the fact that the stock had a definite maturity date, comparable to a creditor's obligation, which also has a definite date for payment. This factor may be considered, of course, but it is not conclusive. In some situations it yields readily to contrary inferences. Evidently the Board (see Pacific Southwest case, supra) itself does not consider this factor as an infallible indication of creditor relationship. Again we cite the fact that the Indiana statutes were cognizant of a maturity date as a normal feature of preferred stock and permitted its inclusion in preferred stock issues. It is reasonable to expect a company, which had bound itself to pay cumulatively a high rate of return on its preferred stock, and also provide for its retirement should protect itself by limiting such a heavy obligation to a specified period of time.

The element of statutory and contractual subordination of this preferred stock to rights of ordinary creditors, while not decisive, bears real weight, when coupled with the other facts above discussed. * * *

In passing upon the nature of this corporate obligation, we are considering an "ultimate finding" (Helvering, Commissioner, v. Tex-Penn Oil Co., 300 U.S. 481, 57 S.Ct. 569, 81 L.Ed. 755),—in effect, it is a conclusion of law. The question, whether a particular obligation is a debt or a stock interest within the meaning of the Revenue Act, must be determined in the light of all the facts. In the instant case the facts were all documentary. There was no oral testimony on this issue. Therefore, we believe it to be our duty to study all the documents and determine, in the light of the statute and precedent, whether the statutory provision was meant to encompass the particular obligation under consideration. This is not a case where the finding of fact by the Board, supported by substantial evidence, precludes a review of such finding by this court. * * *

The decision is reversed.[10]

IN RE GREENEBAUM BROTHERS & COMPANY, INCORPORATED.

District Court of the United States, Pennsylvania, 1945. 62 F.Supp. 769.

Proceeding in the matter of Greenebaum Brothers & Company, Inc., bankrupt. On petition by the executrices of the estate of Simon Greenebaum to review the referee's final order of distribution of the bankrupt estate, and on petition of the bankrupt corporation for leave to intervene.

Exceptions to referee's order dismissed, petitions for review and intervention denied, and referee's order affirmed and confirmed.

KALODNER, DISTRICT JUDGE. Two petitions arising out of the Referee's final order of distribution of the bankrupt estate of Greenebaum Bros. & Co., Inc., have been presented for disposition. The one, a petition for review, was filed by the Executrices of the estate of Simon Greenebaum and asserts three alleged errors in the final order. The other is a petition of the bankrupt corporation filed by one of its attorneys, for leave to intervene.

The Trustee not only disputes the alleged substantive errors of the Referee, but denies the standing of the Executrices to question the Referee's order, and denies the right of the bankrupt to intervene at this time.

The executrices of the estate of Simon Greenebaum unquestionably stand in no better position than their decedent with regard to the right to petition this Court for review of the Referee's order. The right is asserted on the ground that Simon Greenebaum was the owner of all the outstanding stock in, and that he was the creditor of, the bankrupt corporation.

During his lifetime, Simon Greenebaum filed two proofs of claim against the bankrupt, one, for $65,000, was filed as a preferred stockholder's claim for the purpose of Chapter X, 11 U.S.C.A. § 501 et seq., proceedings; another, for $16,533.36, was based on the claim of a debt due in the amount of $15,000 because the bankrupt failed to call in 50 shares of preferred stock in each of the three years preceding the bankruptcy (1938, 1939 and 1940), plus $1,533.36, representing undeclared dividends.

Granting that Simon Greenebaum was a stockholder, and his estate now in his stead, no right to petition for review obtains thereby. The corporation having been adjudicated a bankrupt, the stockholders have [10] This decision is inserted as a discussion of the nature of a preferred stock contract. Subsequently it has been held that the question whether an instrument is an evidence of debt or a preferred stock contract is a question of fact upon which the finding of The Tax Court is conclusive: The John Kelley Co. v. Commissioner, 326 U.S. 521, 66 S.Ct. 299 (1946).

no standing in the bankruptcy proceedings. [Citing cases.] * * *

Concerning the claims on which the creditorship is based, it should be noted that the Trustee filed objections thereto. Insofar as I can determine, the claims were never proved nor allowed. In his certificate the present Referee stated:

"* * * neither of which said claims were allowed by the said then Referee or by me as claims of a party in interest properly filed in this proceeding, entitled to a share in distribution out of the proceeds and funds realized by the Trustee in the liquidation of the bankrupt's assets. * * *"

A certificate of stock ownership, despite the fact that it contains a redemption clause, does not make the stockholder a creditor of the corporation. Warren v. Queen & Co., 1913, 240 Pa. 154, 158, 87 A. 595; Warren v. King, 1883, 108 U.S. 389, 399, 2 S.Ct. 789, 27 L.Ed. 769. And, as it will be seen, the obligation to redeem cannot be enforced after the corporation becomes insolvent. 14 C.J., Corporations, p. 424, § 585, 18 C.J.S., Corporations, § 278.

Moreover, the claims filed must disclose a debt due. In re A. & G. Knitting Mills, Inc., 3 Cir., 1944, 144 F.2d 125. On examination, the claims fail to meet this requirement. The stock certificate here involved provides that called stock be paid out of surplus or net profits, and the Pennsylvania Corporation Law forbids a corporation to redeem stock where such redemption would reduce the remaining assets below an amount sufficient to pay all debts and known liabilities: 15 P.S.Pa. § 2852—705. Also, the stockholder is not entitled to the corporate earnings until a dividend is declared. Green v. Philadelphia Inquirer Co., 1938, 329 Pa. 169, 175, 196 A. 32. Thus, if the claim were provable at all, it would have to disclose, at the very least, facts warranting the redemptions and dividends, aside from showing abuse of discretion by the directors. Wetherill v. Arasapha Manufacturing Co., 1915, 24 Pa. Dist. 1045, 1048; Green v. Philadelphia Inquirer Co., supra. Furthermore, it appears from the face of the stock certificate that it was issued in 1941, subsequent to the bankrupt's asserted failure to redeem (in 1938, 1939 and 1940).

Accordingly, I am of the opinion that the claims filed by Simon Greenebaum were neither proved nor allowed and the Executrices of his estate have no standing to petition this Court for review of the Referee's order. * * *

For the reasons stated the exceptions to the Referee's final order of distribution are dismissed, the petitions for review and intervention are denied and the Referee's Order is affirmed and confirmed.

2. CONVENTIONAL PREFERRED STOCK CONTRACT PROVISIONS

(a) Voting Rights.

GENERAL INV. CO. v. BETHLEHEM STEEL CORP.

Court of Chancery of New Jersey, 1917. 87 N.J.Eq. 234, 100 A. 347.

LANE, V. C. (orally at conclusion of argument on motion for temporary injunction).

This is an application for a temporary injunction to restrain Bethlehem Steel Corporation from increasing its capital stock. The present capital stock is $30,000,000 divided one-half preferred and the other common, with equal voting rights. The plan is to increase the capital stock by $45,000,000, the additional to be called common, class B. Of this, $30,000,000 is to be put out as a stock dividend; $15,000,000 is to be sold. The stock is to have all the characteristics of common, except that it will have no vote. The surplus of the company amounts to something like $69,000,000, and the scheme is proposed so as to get a part of this surplus out into the hands of stockholders and yet leave the money with the company as working capital. The intent of those who formulated the plan was to keep control of the company in its present stockholders. It is said that there is a good business reason for so doing. As part of the transaction, a contract was entered into by the company under which Seligman & Co., bankers, agreed to form a syndicate to underwrite the issue of $15,000,000 of the new stock. They were to be paid a certain commission, amounting in case the plan was unsuccessful, I think, to $225,000, and in case it was successful to $450,000. A portion of this commission was to be retained by Seligman & Co., and the remainder to be paid to those who should become syndicate subscribers. Among the syndicate subscribers were certain directors of the company, including Mr. Schwab. The plan was promulgated January 25, 1917, and immediately became public. The bill is brought by the General Investment Company, a corporation dominated and controlled by Clarence H. Venner. He bought his stock, 100 shares, January 31, 1917, and immediately notified the company of opposition to the plan. He filed his bill on February 9th. The meeting of stockholders called for the purpose of acting on the increase was scheduled to be held February 14th. The last day for stockholders to subscribe under the syndicate agreement is March 8th. The contract between the company and the bankers provided for a limited time of performance. It is represented, and the court will take judicial notice of the fact, that, in the present unsettled condition of affairs, contracts of this nature dealing with the sums here dealt with must be entered into with a very limited time provided for performance; nothing else is conceivable.

On the day fixed the meeting was held. There were voted in favor of the plan 126,370 shares of preferred and 112,156 shares of common stock, and against the plan 450 shares of preferred and 125 shares of common stock, of which latter 100 shares were those held by the complainant.

There is another common stockholder holding 25 shares who after argument by complainant's counsel to-day seeks to intervene. In view of my conclusions I shall deny her application. The situation therefore is that over 99 per cent. of the present stock desire that the plan should go forward, and opposition is made by only 125 shares. Of these, 100 were actually bought after the promulgation of the plan, and I think for the sole purpose of bringing this suit, notwithstanding the denial of Mr. Venner. The law is settled that even under these circumstances this court must consider any equitable or legal right which the complainant may have cognizable or enforceable only in a court of equity. Hodge v. United States Steel Corporation, 64 N.J.Eq. 111, 53 A. 553. The reason of the rule I assume is, as applied to stock, that to hold otherwise would be to impose a restraint upon alienation. A holder of stock before the threatened act must be able to transfer all of his rights to any one or the value of the stock may be affected. Notwithstanding this rule, before this court will intervene, at the suit of a stockholder who buys in under the conditions present here, a very small amount of stock, to prevent the carrying out of a plan such as this, approved by practically the entire stock issued, it must be satisfied that the right of the complainant is clear and the injury irreparable. Vice Chancellor Pitney, in Trimble v. American Sugar Refining Company, 61 N.J.Eq. 340, at 345, 48 A. 912. The attack made upon the plan I will consider, putting out of mind, as far as I can, the circumstances under which it comes here.

Complainant asserts: Firstly, that the corporation has no power to issue a class of common stock, or a class of stock having all the characteristics of common stock, without the voting privilege; secondly, that because it is admitted that the purpose is to perpetuate the present control of the corporation, and because some of the directors who voted in favor of it became syndicate subscribers, and therefore will profit by its success, the entire proceedings are vitiated and void.

1. Whether the corporation has the legal power to issue this class of stock depends upon the construction to be put upon the eighteenth section of the Corporation Act. Revision of 1896; Comp.Stat., p. 1608.[11] From a casual reading of that section it would seem that stock of any kind, nature, or description, common or preferred, or whatever it may be called, may be created with or without voting privileges. Counsel for complainant insists that the section must be construed in the light of a public policy said to have prevailed at the time the section was adopted and to prevail now, i.e., that common stockholders at least are entitled to consultation with, and advice of, and action by every other common stockholder, and that the policy of the law required that a corporation should be managed by a majority of its stock. In other words, the privilege of voting is necessarily incidental to common stock. The cases relied on are Cone v. Russell & Mason, 48 N.J.Eq. 208, 21 A. 847; White v. Thomas Inflatable Tire Company, 52 N.J.Eq. 178, 28 A. 75. But see Chapman v. Bates, 61 N.J.Eq. 658, at page 667, 47 A. 638, 88 Am.St.Rep. 459.

[11] N.J.Comp.Stat., Rev.1896, p. 1608, § 18, N.J.S.A. 14:8-1, appears, infra, p. 521.

The question is not, however, whether, after a person has purchased stock in a corporation having a certain amount of stock vested with the right to vote, these fellow stockholders may voluntarily separate the right of property from the right to vote, and thus put the control of the corporation in the hands of those having no pecuniary interest therein and deprive the dissenting stockholder of the advice and action of those whose advice and action he may have fairly be said to have contracted for, but rather whether such stockholder is entitled to require that any new stock issued should be vested with the privilege of voting—a very different proposition. I have examined in the short time I have had all the cases that I could locate, and I have failed to find any statement of such public policy, with possibly the exception of a remark made by Judge Lurton in Hamlin v. Toledo, St. L. R. R., 78 F. 671, 24 C.C.A. 271, 278, 36 L.R.A. 826, in which, while sustaining an issue of preferred stock, or rather, an issue of stock which was neither preferred nor common, a rather peculiar kind of stock, as he called it, he said:

"They surrendered the privilege of voting. That was perhaps a valid agreement between stockholders, though of doubtful public policy."

It is almost impossible to get a definition of "common stock" or a statement of what classes of stock may be issued, and the necessary rights and privileges of the classes, that is satisfactory. Thompson, § 3426, in referring to common stock, says that the name itself indicates its nature, and it is so called because it is the common stock, or the stock which private corporations generally issue; and is usually the only kind authorized. He says the universal rule is that the owners of common stock are entitled to a pro rata dividend of profits, and to a pro rata participation in the management of the corporation; that the holders of common stock sometimes have a preference in the management of the corporation. In section 3425 with reference to classes of stock he states:

"The first general division of stock is into common or preferred stock; and these two classes are again subdivided into almost an infinite variety."

Section 859: "The rule that a right to vote follows the ownership of stock means only that in the absence of any common restriction upon all the stock, or upon a class of stock, this right prevails. That is, the right of a stockholder to vote cannot be arbitrarily abridged and is not subject to universal restriction. But the rule is equally emphatic, if not so general, that restrictions may be placed upon the right to vote; or, as sometimes stated, the right to vote may be separated from the ownership of stock. It must be remembered, in this connection, that stockholders can make any agreement respecting their stock, or the voting of it, that they may see fit or deem wise, except agreements that are void as against public policy."

He cites Miller v. Ratterman, 47 Ohio St. 141, 24 N.E. 496, Supreme Court of Ohio. There the question was as to whether preferred stock might be issued without voting privileges. The court said:

"It is true that one characteristic of stock, generally, is that it can be voted upon. But this is not essential. Indeed, instances may arise where it is good policy to prohibit the voting upon stock"—citing cases.

Thompson, § 859, contains the statement:

"So, it has been established that holders of preferred stock may be denied the right to vote the same at any meeting of the holders of the capital stock of the corporation. The legality of such restriction is not based on the theory that preferred stockholders are guaranteed a dividend, but rather on the inherent power of the corporation to restrict the voting power. It is simply a contract relation between two classes of stockholders, in which the public has no concern."

He instances a great number of cases where restrictions with respect to voting has been imposed upon common stock; i. e., one stockholder should not vote more than a fourth of the total, a stockholder should not vote more than 100 shares, nonresidents should not vote, purchasers of forfeited stock should not vote, even though not liable for the amount due until the amount due was paid.

"There is no rule of public policy which forbids a corporation and its stockholders from making any contract they please in regard to restrictions on the voting power." Cook on Corporations, § 622B.

"Inasmuch as preferred stockholders are members of the company, and except in so far as their rights may be altered by the contract, statute or by-law under which the shares are issued, entitled in all respects to the same rights as other shareholders, it follows that they have the same voting rights as other shareholders. The right of shareholders to vote is, however, like the right to dividends or to participate equally in a division of capital on liquidation, regarded as a private matter for each shareholder which he may waive if he choose. Consequently, a provision that shareholders of a certain class shall have no right to vote is, if assented to by them, quite valid. Such a provision might theoretically be made as to either the preferred or the deferred (Machen calls common deferred shares), but it is much more common with respect to the preferred shares so as to compensate the other shareholders for the preference of the preferred stockholders as to dividends." Machen, § 570.

"A stockholder has no right to vote at corporate meetings, whether the stock is common or preferred, if it is so stipulated when the stock is issued, for the stipulation is then a term of his contract." 3 Clark & Marshall, p. 1996.[12]

Mackintosh et al. v. Flint P. M. R. Co., C.C., 32 F. 350, and Id., 34 F. 582, is referred to in Clark & Marshall as authority for the proposition that preferred stock may be given the exclusive privilege of voting, at least in that case for a time. Counsel have not referred me to any case enunciating a public policy which would require that all common stockholders should have the voting privilege. In this state it has been held that the matter is purely one of contract. McGregor v. Home Ins. Company of N.J., 33 N.J.Eq. 181; In re Newark Library Ass'n, 64 N.J.L. 218, 43 A. 435. This seems to be the rule in the other states.

---

[12] N.Y.Stock Corporation Law, § 51: "Limitations on right to vote.—The certificate of incorporation * * * may provide * * * that the holders of any designated class or classes of stock shall not be entitled to vote or it may otherwise limit or define the respective voting powers of the several classes of stock * * * But unless specifically excluded * * from the right to vote in a proceeding for mortgaging the property and franchises of the corporation * *, for guaranteeing the bonds of another corporation * * *, for sale of the franchises and property * * *, for establishing priorities or creating preferences among the several classes of stock * * *, for consolidation * * *, or for change of name * * *, all shares of stock shall be entitled to vote in every such proceeding."

Section 13 of the Delaware Corporation Act (Laws 1901–03, p. 291, c. 167) is or was precisely similar to our section 18. The construction of that statute came before the Supreme Court of Delaware in State v. Brooks, Del., 74 A. 37. Preferred stock had been issued without the right to vote. There was a constitutional provision providing that all stock issued should have voting privileges. It was contended that the issuance of the preferred stock was in violation of this provision. The court held not, and that the Constitution meant that stock should vote which by law had a vote; that there was no public policy which prevented the issuance of stock without the voting privilege. The reasoning of the court is as applicable to common as to preferred stock assuming that the relation between the stockholders is purely one of contract. The case was reversed in the Court of Appeals, 3 Boyce 1, 26 Del. 1, 79 A. 790, 51 L.R.A.,N.S., 1126, Ann.Cas. 1915A, 1133, but upon the ground that the constitutional provision meant what it said, and that the statute was in violation of the provision. The constitutional provision had been repealed before the decision, and the court points out that there is a distinction between the situation in New Jersey, and in Delaware, i. e., the absence in New Jersey of any such constitutional provision. Turning to the statute:

"Every corporation organized under this act shall have power to create two or more kinds of stock, of such classes, with such designations, preferences and voting powers or restrictions or qualifications thereof as shall be stated and expressed in the certificate of incorporation or in any certificate of amendment thereof." [13]

No broader language could have been used, and, unless the usual meaning of these words is to be restricted by reason of the existence of some public policy, it is inconceivable to me that a corporation may not issue this class of common stock, or call it what you will. I have failed to find the existence of any such public policy. The matter is one for the stockholders to determine by their contract. If the public does not want to buy, it does not have to. The legal rights of the present stockholders are not affected; they contracted at the time they went in that they would have the advice, consultation with, and action by (or rather the opportunity of securing such advice, consultation, and action) of the then existing stock (and this subject to its reduction

---

13 Cf. N.J.S.A. § 14:8–1: "Every corporation organized under this title may create two or more classes of stock, any of which may be stock with par value or stock without nominal or par value, with full, limited or no voting powers, of such classes, with such designations, preferences, relative, participating, optional or other special rights, qualifications, limitations or restrictions thereof, as shall be stated and expressed in the certificate of incorporation, but no stock with par value shall be created entitling the holders thereof to receive preferred dividends thereon in excess of eight per cent per annum. * * *" in accordance with law); but there was no contract that the corporation would, if it created further stock, give that further stock the voting privilege, so that the present stockholders might have the opportunity of securing advice by and consultation with and action by the new stockholders. I think that the reasoning of the cases of which Cone v. Russell & Mason, supra, is one, does not apply in the case of an issue of a new class of stock. Section 18 has received the consideration of the Court of Errors and Appeals in Lloyd v. Pennsylvania Electric Vehicle Co., 75 N.J.Eq. 263, 72 A. 16, 21 L.R.A.,N.S., 228, 138 Am.St. Rep. 557, 20 Ann.Cas. 119; Mr. Justice Swayze delivering the opinion of the court. * * *

Cf. N.Y.Stock Corporation Law, § 11.

If a corporation may issue what are commonly called "founders' shares," I can hardly see how it can be said that it cannot issue a class of stock called common, class B, without voting power. As I presently view it, this new stock is common. I do not agree with Mr. Hardin that the effect of this plan is to make the present common a class of preferred stock. I think that it is one of the subdivisions of the common. The essential elements of common stock are that the holders have an opportunity to make profit if there is any and participate in the assets after all other claims are paid, and bear the loss if there be such.

"By common stock is meant that stock which entitled the owners of it to an equal pro rata division of profits, if any there be; one stockholder or class of stockholders having no advantage, priority, or preference over any other shareholder or class of stockholders in the division." Cook, § 12, p. 62.

I think he refers to material advantages, priorities, and preferences, and not to such privilege as the right to vote. See, also, Elkins v. Camden Atl. R. Co., 36 N.J.Eq. 233, at page 237. When there is found stock which answers so far as material interest in the property is concerned these conditions, this is the common stock. The Legislature has provided that this common stock may be divided into any number of classes. The only distinction which I can think of must be in relation to voting rights. There may be class A voting stock with full voting power, class B, allowing each share one-half a vote, and so on.

The bar generally, I think, has put the construction that I have put on this section. There were introduced in evidence some 15 or more charters, some of very large corporations, providing for classes of common stock with and without voting power and one or more with the preferred stock having the exclusive voting power. The conclusion I have reached is that the corporation may issue this peculiar class of stock.

2. A. That the purpose of the plan is to retain control in the present stockholders does not vitiate it. The question is one of good faith. There is no charge of bad faith in the present case. In Warren v. Pim, 66 N.J.Eq. 353, page 408, 59 A. 773, 794, Mr. Justice Swayze, dissenting, said (referring to the voting trust):

"If the only object of the voting trust is to secure permanency of management, with a view to what the stockholder honestly considers to be the best interest of the corporation, I see no objection to the adoption of any necessary means authorized by the statute to secure that end. * * * But can it be contended that, if a corporation finds it necessary to borrow money upon bonds issued for a long term of years, the stockholders cannot, consistently with public policy, in order to secure the loan, vest the management of the corporation in hands satisfactory to the lenders and for a term commensurate with the loan?"

The opinion, though a dissenting one, secured the vote of five other judges. The case was decided by a vote of seven to six upon another point. Only two judges took a diametrically opposite view. The opinion, therefore, is entitled to great weight.

There are many cases in other states not necessary to cite holding that it is within the power of stockholders to combine for the purpose of maintaining a management in control, and if done in good faith there is no legal objection to it. The mere fact that one of the results of the plan may be to perpetuate the control in the hands of its present stockholders does not vitiate the plan. The stockholders were entitled to vote as their selfish interests dictated. * * *[14]

The order to show cause will be discharged, and the restraint vacated.[15]

ELLINGWOOD v. WOLF'S HEAD OIL REFINING COMPANY, INCORPORATED, et al.

Supreme Court, Delaware, 1944. 38 A.2d 743.

Appeal from Court of Chancery.

Proceeding under Revised Code 1935, § 2063, by Charles H. Ellingwood against Wolf's Head Oil Refining Company, Incorporated, and others, to determine the validity of election of directors of the corporation. From an adverse decree, 33 A.2d 409, the complainant appeals.

Affirmed.

In the Supreme Court of the State of Delaware, No. 1 November Term, 1943 session. Appeal from a decision of the Court of Chancery reviewing the corporate election of directors of Wolf's Head Oil Refining Company, Incorporated, held on May 3, 1943, under Section 31 of the General Corporation Law, Rev.Code 1935, § 2063.

---

14 Cf. Gamble v. Queens County Water Co., 123 N.Y. 91, 25 N.E. 201, 9 L.R.A. 527. N.Y.Stock Corporation Law, § 50, permits voting trusts for a period not exceeding ten years; but a voting trust agreement is prohibited among stockholders of a banking corporation. See, also, N.J.S.A. 14:10–10. On voting trusts in general see, Baldwin, Voting Trusts, 1891, 1 Yale L.J. 1; Bergerman, Voting Trusts and Non-Voting Stock, 1928, 37 Yale L.J. 445; Burke, Voting Trusts Currently Observed, 1940, 24 Minn.L.Rev. 347; Finkelstein, Voting Trust Agreements 1926, 24 Mich.L.Rev. 344; Meck, Employment of Corporate Executives by Majority Stockholders, 1938, 47 Yale L.J. 1079; Smith, Limitations on the Validity of Voting Trusts, 1922, 22 Col.L.Rev. 627; Wormser, The Legality of Corporate Voting Trusts and Pooling Agreements, 1918, 18 Col.L.Rev. 123; Legis., 1926, 26 Col.L.Rev. 97; Note, 1925, 25 Col.L.Rev. 951; 1938, 38 Col.L.Rev. 508.

15 See, infra, p. 593, where plaintiff again attempted to have a proposed increase of capital stock restrained.

This case was originally brought in the Court of Chancery by the complainant below, appellant, in his capacity as a common stockholder of Wolf's Head Oil Refining Company, Incorporated, which was originally incorporated in this State in October, 1929, under the corporate name of Wolverine-Empire Refining Co. The present name having been acquired by an amendment to its charter in November 1940.

The charter provided for both preferred and common stock. The authorized number of shares of preferred stock being 50,000, of which 46,100 are outstanding, and the authorized number of shares of common stock being 30,000 all of which are outstanding.

The right of the corporation to redeem the preferred stock, and the respective rights of both the preferred and common stock in the event of any liquidation, dissolution of or wind up of the affairs of the corporation are set forth in Article 4 of the Certificate of Incorporation. Likewise the dividend and voting rights of both the preferred and common stock are set forth in Article 5 of the Certificate of Incorporation. * * *

Article 5. "The holders of preferred stock shall be entitled to cumulative dividends thereon at the rate of six per cent for each and every fiscal year of the company, and no more, payable out of any and all surplus or net profits quarterly, half-yearly or yearly, when and as declared by the Board of Directors. Such dividends on the preferred stock shall be payable in any fiscal year before any dividends shall be paid or set aside for the common stock in that year, and the preferred stock shall not be entitled to participation in any other or additional profits. Out of any surplus or net profits of the corporation remaining after the full dividend of six per cent. on the preferred stock then outstanding shall have been declared and paid, or provided for in any year, dividends may be declared on the common stock for such year; except that no dividend on the common stock shall be declared or paid out of any surplus acquired or created by the purchase or acquisition of the stock or assets of the Empire Oil Works, a corporation of Pennsylvania, and/or, of the Wolverine Lubricants Co., Inc., a corporation of New York.

"Except as otherwise required by the statutes of the State of Delaware, or as herein otherwise provided, the holders of the common stock shall exclusively possess voting power for the election of directors, and for all other purposes, and the holders of the preferred stock shall have no voting power; provided however, that if at any time the corporation shall be in default in respect to the declaration and payment of dividends in the amount of two years' dividends on the preferred stock, then the holders of a majority of the preferred stock shall have an election to exercise the sole right to vote for the election of directors and for all other purposes, to the exclusion of any such right on the part of the holders of the common stock until the corporation shall have declared and paid for a period of a full year a 6% dividend on the preferred stock, when the right to vote for the election of directors, and for all other purposes, shall revert to the holders of the common stock. The election on the part of the holders of the preferred stock shall be consummated and effectuated by a notice to the corporation of their decision to exercise such right by holders of a majority of the preferred stock. During the time within which the holders of the preferred stock are exercising under this election the right to vote upon their stock, the holders of the common stock shall have no right to vote upon their stock. The said right of the preferred stock and its holders to exercise an election to vote shall survive any exercise of such election and a subsequent reversion of the right to vote to the common stock and its holders, and shall be a continuing privilege and right of said preferred stock; and the subsequent right to a reversion of the voting power to the common stock in the event of the payment of a full year's 6% dividend shall be a continuing privilege and right of said common stock and its holders".

The By-Laws of said corporation fix its fiscal year as the calendar year, and further provide that it shall be managed by a Board of Directors consisting of seven who are to be elected at the annual meeting of the stockholders to be held on the first Monday of May of each year, and to serve for one year or until their successors shall be elected and qualified.

The bill discloses that at the closing of the year 1934, the respondent corporation, the appellee, had defaulted in the declaration and payment of dividends in the amount of two years' dividends, on its outstanding preferred stock; but that regardless of said default, the preferred stockholders of said corporation did not elect to exercise the sole right to vote for the election of directors at the annual stockholders meeting on May 6, 1935. But at the annual meeting of the stockholders held on May 4, 1936, said holders of the preferred stock of the corporation did assume to exercise the sole voting rights claimed by them under the above-quoted provisions of Section 5 of the Certificate of Incorporation and continued to exercise such voting rights down to and including the year 1942.

From the time of the organization of the said corporation in 1929, various arrearages of dividends accrued on the preferred stock. When a majority of the preferred stockholders finally decided to exercise their sole right to vote for the election of directors and for all other purposes, by giving a notice to the corporation of their decision to exercise such right, dividends had accrued on the preferred stock in the amount of 37½% of the par value. Dividends paid on the preferred stock during the same period, however, amounted to 15% of the par value, leaving accrued and unpaid dividends on said preferred stock in May 1936, when said preferred stockholders first gave notice to the corporation of their election to exercise the sole right to vote for the election of directors and for all other purposes, amounting to 22½% of the par value.

After the preferred stockholders acquired the sole right to vote for the election of directors and for all other purposes in May 1936, they continued to exercise that right until May 1943, at which time the common stockholders claimed that the sole right to vote for the election of directors and for all other purposes had reverted to them under the provisions of Article 5 of the Certificate of Incorporation above set forth. In support of this contention they relied upon the fact that during the year 1942, and for the period of a full year prior to May 3, 1943, a six per cent dividend had been paid on the preferred stock.

In April 1943, the holders of a majority of the preferred stock again gave notice to the corporation of their election to exercise the sole right to vote for the election of directors and for all other purposes, giving as their reason therefor, that the corporation was in default in regard to the declaration and payment of dividends in the amount of two years' dividends on the preferred stock. Consequently at the annual meeting on May 3, 1943, a majority of the preferred stockholders claiming their right to vote for the election of directors and for all other purposes, elected a board of seven directors. Likewise certain common stockholders, including the appellant, claiming their right to vote for the election of directors and for all other purposes, at said annual meeting on May 3, 1943, elected a board of seven directors. The appellant instituted this proceeding before the Chancellor to determine which of said elections was valid and who constituted the Board of Directors of the corporation.

The Chancellor held that the preferred stockholders were entitled to vote for the election of directors and for all other purposes at the annual meeting held on May 3, 1943, and that the persons whose names were contained on the ticket for which they voted were the legally elected directors of the corporation.

This appeal was taken to review this decision and four assignments of error were filed. These assignments of error are all embraced in the first which is as follows: "That the Chancellor erred in declaring that the persons owning the preferred stock of Wolf's Head Oil Refining Company, Incorporated, had the sole right and power to vote at the meeting of stockholders of the corporation on May 3, 1943, for the election of directors and for all other purposes".

RICHARDS, JUDGE. There is no dispute between the parties interested in this proceeding, that when the preferred stockholders and the common stockholders met at the annual meeting held on May 3, 1943, the corporation was in default in respect to the declaration and payment of dividends in the amount of two year's dividends on the preferred stock. All of said arrearages of dividends having accrued prior to 1942, and that during said year 1942 the corporation declared and paid a full six percent dividend on the preferred stock.

This being the situation the Court is called upon to determine the voting rights of the two classes of stock under the pertinent charter provisions.

It is well recognized that a certificate of incorporation may contain any provision with respect to the stock to be issued by the corporation, and the voting rights to be exercised by said stock, that is agreed upon by the stockholders, provided that the provision agreed to is not against public policy. Thompson on Corporations, 3d Ed., Sec. 989.

The Courts of this State have held that the rights of stockholders are contract rights and that it is necessary to look to the certificate of incorporation to ascertain what those rights are. Gaskill v. Gladys Belle Oil Co., 16 Del.Ch. 289, 298, 146 A. 337; Penington v. Commonwealth Const. Hotel Corp., 17 Del.Ch. 188, 151 A. 228; Id., 17 Del. Ch. 394, 155 A. 514, 75 A.L.R. 1136.

Nothing is to be presumed in favor of preferences attached to stock, and when a corporate charter attempts to confer preferences upon any class of stock provided for by it the same should be expressed in clear language. In interpreting the meaning of charter provisions the same method is applied as that which is followed in interpreting written contracts generally. The instrument should be considered in its entirety, and all of the language reviewed together in order to determine the meaning intended to be given to any portion of it. Holland v. National Automotive Fibres, Inc., 22 Del.Ch. 99, 194 A. 124; Gaskill v. Gladys Belle Oil Co., supra; Penington v. Commonwealth Hotel Construction Co., supra.

The charter of Wolf's Head Oil Refining Company, Incorporated, evidences an intention on the part of the incorporators to make provision for the protection of the preferred stockholders.

It is specified in article four of the charter, that in case of "liquidation, dissolution or winding up of the affairs of the corporation", said preferred stockholders shall be entitled to full payment of the par value of their shares and all unpaid dividends accrued thereon, before any of the assets shall be distributed to the common stockholders. This same article gives to the Board of Directors the optional right to redeem the preferred stock in whole or in part, at any time before January first, 1940, but requires said Board of Directors to give sixty days' notice to all record holders of said preferred stock; and in addition thereto to pay in cash to each holder of preferred stock to be redeemed one hundred and ten percent of the par value thereof.

Now we come to article five of the charter which guarantees to the holders of the preferred stock "cumulative dividends thereon at the rate of six percent for each and every fiscal year of the company". This same article gives to the holders of the common stock exclusive "voting power for the election of directors, and for all other purposes". This is followed by the provision that the preferred stockholders shall have no voting power. Then comes the proviso, "that if at any time the corporation shall be in default in respect to the declaration and payment of dividends in the amount of two years dividends on the preferred stock, then the holders of a majority of the preferred shall have an election to exercise the sole right to vote for the election of directors and for all other purposes, to the exclusion of any such right on the part of the holders of the common stock until the corporation shall have declared and paid for a period of a full year a 6% dividend on the preferred stock, when the right to vote for the election of directors, and for all other purposes, shall revert to the holders of the common stock". We desire to emphasize the fact that the wording of the above-quoted article is, "if at any time the corporation shall be in default in respect to the declaration and payment of dividends in the amount of two years' dividends on the preferred stock".

The appellant contends that the subsequent wording of the article, "until the corporation shall have declared and paid for a period of a full year a 6% dividend on the preferred stock", restricts the above-quoted language of the article with respect to the duration of the time when the preferred stockholders have the right to elect to exercise the sole right to vote for the election of directors and for all other purposes. If this be true, it likewise takes from the preferred stockholders a portion of the protection which we have pointed out was conferred upon them by the charter.

The appellant takes the position that after the preferred stockholders have elected to exercise the sole right to vote for the election of directors and for all other purposes, and have actually exercised said right to vote in pursuance of the election to do so, the payment of a six percent dividend for the period of a full year causes said sole right to vote by the preferred stockholders, to revert to the common stockholders until the corporation shall again default in respect to the declaration and payment of dividends in the amount of two years' dividends on the preferred stock. This ignores the rights of the preferred stockholders if the corporation is still in default in the payment of dividends on said preferred stock in the amount of two years' dividends. This also loses sight of the fact that the plain words of the charter are, "if at any time the corporation shall be in default"; and the further plain provision that "the said right of the preferred stock and its holders to exercise an election to vote shall survive any exercise of such election and a subsequent reversion of the right to vote to the common stock and its holders, and shall be a continuing privilege and right of said preferred stockholders". We agree that when a six percent dividend for a period of a full year is paid on the preferred stock, the sole right to vote for directors and for all other purposes reverts to the common stockholders, notwithstanding the fact that dividends in the amount of two years are due on the preferred stock. If the preferred stockholders failed to again elect to exercise the sole right to vote, by giving notice to the corporation of their decision to exercise such right, as the charter requires them to do, the common stockholders would be entitled to exercise the right to vote for the election of directors and for all other purposes. But if the corporation is still in default in the declaration and payment of dividends in the amount of two years' dividends on the preferred stock, when a six percent dividend is paid on preferred stock for the period of a full year, said preferred stockholders can still avail themselves of the right to vote for the election of directors and for all other purposes, if they comply with the conditions of the charter by giving notice to the corporation of their decision to exercise such right to vote.

The language used in the charter describing the conditions under which the preferred stockholders obtain the right to vote has nothing to say about the time when the arrearage in dividends on said stock shall have accrued. If the position is taken that the arrearage in dividends must have accrued after the right to vote had reverted to the common stock, the preferred stockholders would be deprived of the right to vote for the election of directors no matter how great the arrearage in dividends might be, until additional dividends in the amount of two years' dividends should accrue. This construction would take from the preferred stockholders the benefit which we think the charter intended to confer upon them.

It is not denied that when a majority of the preferred stockholders first elected to exercise their right to vote for the election of directors and for all other purposes in 1936, the dividends accrued and unpaid on the preferred stock amounted to 22½%, of that said accrued and unpaid dividends was more than two years dividends.

Neither is it denied that from 1936 to May 3, 1943, additional dividends accrued on the preferred stock amounting to 40½%, and that the dividends paid on said stock during that period amounted to 25½%.

Therefore it clearly appears that when the annual meeting of the corporation was held on May 3, 1943, dividends amounting to 37½% were accrued and unpaid on the preferred stock. Thus it appears that the corporation was in default in respect to the declaration and payment of dividends in the amount of two years' dividends.

In view of this situation we are of the opinion that the preferred stockholders were entitled to vote for the election of directors and for all other purposes, at the annual meeting of the corporation held on May 3, 1943, and that the persons whose names appeared on the ticket nominated and voted for by them are the legally elected directors of the corporation.

The decree of the Chancellor is affirmed.

* * *

(b) Cumulative Dividends

PREFERRED STOCK CLAUSES

CUMULATIVE DIVIDENDS. (PAR VALUE)

The holders of the preferred stock shall be entitled to receive, when and as declared by the board of directors of the corporation, out of any assets of the corporation available for dividends pursuant to the laws of the State of ———, preferential dividends at the rate of ——— per centum (———%) per annum and no more, payable annually, semi-annually or quarterly on

(1) such days as may be determined by the board of directors

(2) the first days of ——— and ——— in each year before any dividend shall be declared or paid upon or set apart for the common stock. Such dividends upon the preferred stock shall be cumulative from {the date of issue thereof ———, / the first day of ——— 19———,} so that if dividends for any past dividend period at the rate of ——— per centum (———%) per annum shall not have been paid thereon, or declared and a sum sufficient for payment thereof set apart, the deficiency shall be fully paid or set apart but without interest, before any dividend shall be paid upon or set apart for the common stock. Whenever the full dividend upon the preferred stock for all past dividend periods shall have been paid, and the full dividend thereon for the then current dividend period shall have been paid or declared and a sum sufficient for the payment thereof set apart, dividends upon the common stock may be declared by the board of directors out of the remainder of the assets available therefor.

BOARDMAN v. THE LAKE SHORE & MICHIGAN SOUTHERN RAILWAY CO.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1881. 84 N.Y. 157.

Appeal from a judgment of General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, entered on an order affirming a judgment for plaintiffs, entered on a decision of the court on trial at Special Term.

[The Michigan Southern & Northern Indiana Co., in 1857, issued $3,000,000 of preferred stock. The certificate provided that "the stock is entitled to dividends at the rate of 10% per annum, payable semi-annually * * * out of the net earnings of said company; and is also entitled to share pro rata with the other stock of the company in any excess of earnings over 10% per annum, and the payment of dividends * * * is hereby guaranteed * * *"

In 1862, 23 shares of this preferred stock were assigned to plaintiff's testator.

From 1857 to August 1863, no dividends were declared because the company failed to realize any net earnings. From August 1, 1863 to 1869 a 10% annual dividend was regularly paid.

In 1864 and 1865, out of accumulated surplus, two 3½% dividends on the common stock were paid. These dividends amounted to a sum sufficient to have cancelled and paid off all arrearages on the outstanding preferred stock.

In 1869, the company merged with the Lake Shore Railway Company, the consolidated company being defendant herein. The new company assumed and agreed to pay all existing debts, guarantees and obligations of the merged corporation.

This action was brought in 1875 to compel defendant to pay the 10% annual dividends unpaid by the Michigan Southern & Northern Indiana Co. from 1857–1863 on the shares of stock owned by plaintiff's testator; and to enjoin defendant from declaring dividends on certain common stock until the amount so claimed shall have been paid.

Defendant appeals from a judgment for plaintiff.]

MILLER, J. * * * The doctrine that preference shareholders are entitled to be first paid the amount of dividends guaranteed, and of all arrears of dividend or interest before the other shareholders are entitled to receive anything, and although they can receive no profits where none are earned, yet as soon as there are any profits to divide they are entitled to the same, is fully supported by authority. In Henry v. G. N. R. R. Co., 3 Jurist, N.S., part 1, 1117, affirmed upon appeal, reported in 3 Jurist, 1133, the right of preference rather than that of guaranteed stockholders to dividends in arrears was involved, and it was held by the Vice-Chancellor that the company had no right to declare a dividend so as to affect the right of preference stockholders, and that they were entitled to their full dividend for the period which had elapsed since the last payment of dividend, before the ordinary stockholder can take any dividend whatever. Upon appeal the decision was affirmed, and it was held that preference shareholders had a right to dividends at the stipulated rate chargeable exclusively as profits, and payable before anything is divided among the common shareholders. The Lord Chancellor, Cranworth, says: "That if, on the declaration of a dividend, the fund to be divided should be insufficient to satisfy the claims of the shareholders entitled to preference, those shareholders will be entitled to be paid in full out of all subsequent dividends before the ordinary shareholders can receive any thing." In the case last cited there were four classes of preferred stock, and the same principle is involved as arises in the case at bar. In Crawford v. N. E. R. R. Co., 3 Jurist, N.S., part 1, 1093, preference dividends were held to be a charge upon the profits of the company for all time, to the extent of the preference dividend held out as payable on the preference shares. The condition here was, that the preference shares should be entitled to a certain rate per annum for the periods named, and in part in perpetuity thereafter on the amount actually paid in. It was said that the words "interest" and "dividends" should be treated as synonymous. See, also, Sturge v. E. N. R. R. Co., 31 Eng. L. & Eq. 406, which decides that the holders of preference shares are entitled to be paid the amount of arrears out of any money belonging to the company applicable to such payment, before any payment shall be made by the company, to the ordinary shareholders in respect to dividends or interest. It is claimed that in the last two cases it was held that the preference dividends were a charge, because the contract was not for the payment of dividends at fixed times, but because the dividends were payable out of the revenues of the company at any time; but we think that those decisions were not made upon any such ground, but upon the principle that preference dividends must be paid before any others, which is well established and supported by the cases cited, as well as numerous other authorities. * * *

STROUT v. CROSS, AUSTIN & IRELAND LUMBER CO.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1940. 283 N.Y. 406, 28 N.E.2d 890.

Action by Waneta W. Strout against Cross, Austin & Ireland Lumber Company to secure equitable relief against use of income notes as part payment of unpaid accumulated dividends on first preferred stock. From a judgment entered upon an order of the Appellate Division, First Department, 258 App.Div. 1046, 18 N.Y.S.2d 996, unanimously affirming a judgment of the Supreme Court, New York County, entered September 14, 1939, dismissing the complaint upon the merits, plaintiff appeals by permission of the Court of Appeals, after motion for leave to appeal had been denied by the Appellate Division in 259 App.Div. 714, 19 N.Y.S.2d 769.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

LEWIS, JUDGE. The plaintiff is the owner of a substantial portion of the cumulative preferred stock issued by the defendant upon which in 1937, there were unpaid accumulated dividends amounting to twenty-two and three-quarters per cent. The defendant then assumed to discharge in full its obligation for such arrearage when it paid a dividend declared to be "in the amount of $22.75 per share" of which the media of payment were two-fold—a small portion thereof was paid in cash, the balance was paid by distributing to preferred stockholders income notes issued by two of the defendant's wholly owned subsidiaries. Having had no notice of the defendant's plan thus to discharge its obligation to its preferred stockholders and never having consented thereto, the plaintiff retained that portion of the dividend paid in cash but rejected and returned to the defendant the income notes. It is the plaintiff's claim that to the extent of the face value of the income notes the dividend was illegally declared and did not satisfy the defendant's legal obligation to her as a preferred stockholder.

The Appellate Division has unanimously affirmed the judgment at Special Term dismissing the plaintiff's complaint upon the merits. Upon the record, which is now before us by our leave, the plaintiff asks a diversity of relief—to a portion of which we believe she has established her right in equity.

The defendant is engaged in the lumber business in New York City. Its capital structure includes, in addition to other classes of junior stock, 7,500 shares of first preferred seven per cent cumulative stock of $100 par value. The first preferred stock is not widely distributed. Its entire amount is held by forty-one owners, one of whom is the plaintiff, who owns 515 shares. Between May 1, 1930, and April 30, 1935, the defendant suffered serious operating losses which impaired its working capital and caused the suspension of dividends on the first preferred stock from May 1, 1932, until July 31, 1935. In the fall of the latter year dividends on the first preferred stock were resumed and were paid for more than a year. Meantime, however, there remained unpaid the arrears in dividends on the first preferred stock for prior years.

In the latter part of 1936 the business of the company improved and was such that its directors apparently anticipated earnings in excess of regular dividend requirements on the first preferred stock for the fiscal year ending April 30, 1937. We are told they were also aware that unless such earnings were paid out as dividends the company would be subject to a high surtax under the Federal undistributed earnings tax. As there were then due and unpaid upon the preferred stock twenty-two and three-quarters per cent of accumulated dividends, any dividends declared were required to be paid upon that stock. It was also determined by the company's executives that its liquid assets had been so impaired and its bank indebtedness was so great that cash dividends sufficient to satisfy the Federal tax law were inadvisable. It was in those circumstances and in an effort to pay the arrears of dividends on the first preferred stock without disturbing the company's needed liquid capital that the defendant's board of directors took the action which the plaintiff claims adversely affected her rights as a holder of first preferred stock and led to the present controversy.

On April 16, 1937, when the accumulated arrears of dividends upon 515 shares of first preferred stock owned by the plaintiff was $22.75 per share, amounting in all to $11,716.25, the defendant's board of directors adopted the following resolution: "Resolved, that a dividend in the amount of $22.75 per share be and the same hereby is declared upon the first preferred stock of this corporation, distributable to the holders of record of such stock as of the 20th day of April, 1937."

Thereafter, but at the same meeting, the board adopted another resolution which made provision for the payment of the dividend of "$22.75 per share," theretofore declared, by distributing to the preferred stockholders for each share owned, two dollars and seventy-five cents in cash and twenty dollars face amount of fifty-year income notes issued by the defendant's subsidiaries. The resolution directing such payment was as follows:

"Resolved, that the dividend, in the amount of $22.75 per share declared upon the first preferred stock of the corporation and amounting to a total of $170,625.00 on the 7,500 shares of first preferred stock outstanding, be paid by the pro rata distribution to the holders of such stock of the following:

"$100,000 principal amount of 5% 50 year income notes of Adams, Fowler & Hoffman, Inc.

"$50,000 principal amount of 5% 50 year income notes of R. B. Everett Lumber Company, Inc.

"$20,625 cash."

In reference to the "income notes" of the defendant's two subsidiaries, which were to be distributed by the defendant at their face value, it should be said that in each instance the note states that the interest thereupon of five per cent is payable semi-annually, "if and only to the extent that the available net income, as that term is defined herein, of the [subsidiary] corporation shall suffice for such payment * * *."

The plaintiff, who resides in Denver, Col., had no notice of the dividend action by the defendant's board of directors until she received from the defendant a circular letter dated April 21, 1937, addressed to all holders of its first preferred stock, and inclosing to her a check in the amount of $1,416.25 and two fifty-year income notes issued and registered in her name—one fifty-year note of Adams, Fowler & Hoffman, Inc., of the face amount of $6,866.70, due April 30, 1987, and one fifty-year note of R. B. Everett Lumber Company, Inc., of the face amount of $3,433.30, due April 30, 1987. After advising her of the dividend action taken by defendant's board of directors and having reviewed the business experience of the defendant company and its subsidiaries, the letter stated in part:

"* * * The arrears in dividends on the First Preferred Stock of Cross, Austin & Ireland Lumber Company are 22¾% which on an issue of $750,000 amounts to $170,625. The clearing up of these arrears is the subject of this letter.

"It will be seen from the foregoing that the parent company in addition to owning all of the Common Stock of the two subsidiaries, has held their Fifty Year Income Notes in an aggregate amount of about $165,000. These notes are entitled to cumulative interest at 5%. There is good reason to believe that these companies, under the supervision and control of the parent company, will be profitable enterprises and under ordinary circumstances Cross, Austin & Ireland Lumber Company would continue to hold its entire investment in them.

"The Board of Directors has given earnest consideration to the problem of disbursing the company's earnings to avoid penalty taxation and at the same time conserve cash and has concluded that it is to the best interest of the company and the holders of First Preferred Stock alike, that the arrears on this stock be paid in full by the distribution of the major portion of the company's holdings of the Income Notes of Adams, Fowler & Hoffman, Inc. and R. B. Everett Lumber Company and a lesser amount of cash. Accordingly, the Board has voted a dividend of 22¾% on the First Preferred Stock payable to holders of record on April 20, 1937 in the following manner by check 2¾%, in Income Notes of Adams, Fowler & Hoffman, Inc., 13⅓% and in Income Notes of R. B. Everett Lumber 6⅔%. Check and notes in the correct amount duly drawn to the order of and registered in the name of the respective stockholders are enclosed herewith.

"Under the Federal Tax Law of 1936 dividends may be paid in money or property, payment in either form exempting the disbursing corporation from penalty taxation to the extent of such payments, provided distribution is made prior to the close of the fiscal year in which credit for payment is taken. Such dividends, whether in cash or property, must be fully reported as income by the recipient. You are, therefore, advised that the entire 22¾% should be included in your 1937 Income Tax Return as Current Income. You are requested to deposit check promptly, * *."

Being thus advised by the defendant that the fifty-year notes and cash were distributed to her in full payment of arrears of twenty-two and three-quarters per cent in dividends accrued upon the amount of preferred stock which she owned, and that she should report as taxable income not only the cash so received but also the face value of the income notes, the plaintiff promptly wrote the defendant that she had not consented to the method adopted by the defendant in its plan thus to make full payment of the arrears of twenty-two and three-quarters per cent in dividends then due upon her holdings of first preferred stock and that she would return the income notes and the amount of the check which she had received. In reply the defendant's president advised her by letter that "There would be no point in mailing back the certificates. The Company could not accept them except to hold them in safe keeping for your account * * *." Thereafter the plaintiff returned to the defendant the two income notes which had been issued and registered in her name, having a total face value of $10,300 and which the defendant now holds for her for safe keeping.

Preferred stock issued by a stock corporation may grant to the stockholder a variety of rights depending largely upon the financial requirements of the corporation at the time the stock is issued. Whatever preferential rights and privileges may thus be granted to a stockholder, the law regards them as contractual. "The certificate of stock is the muniment of the shareholder's title, and evidence of his right. It expresses the contract between the corporation and his co-stockholders and himself; and that contract cannot, he being unwilling, be taken away from him or changed as to him without his prior dereliction, * *." Kent v. Quicksilver Mining Co., 78 N.Y. 159, 180; Roberts v. Roberts-Wicks Co., 184 N.Y. 257, 263, 77 N.E. 13, 3 L.R.A., N.S., 1034, 112 Am.St.Rep. 607, 6 Ann.Cas. 213.

In the case at bar the certificates of first preferred stock issued by the defendant and owned by the plaintiff stated the preferential rights to which she was entitled, which recital is in part as follows: "The First Preferred Stock, consisting of seventy-five hundred (7,500) shares of the par value of One Hundred Dollars ($100) each, shall be entitled to vote and to a seven per cent (7%) cumulative annual dividend * * *." Treating that statement as an expression by the defendant corporation of its contractual obligation to the plaintiff as an owner of its first preferred stock, we construe its language as the defendant's agreement to pay the plaintiff in cash cumulative annual dividends of seven per cent of its par value. Undoubtedly, in the event a corporation has a surplus, it is within the fair and honest discretion of its board of directors, uncontrolled by the courts, to determine whether a dividend shall be declared and if so whether it shall be paid in cash or property. Williams v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 93 N.Y. 162, 191, 192. Where, however, as in the instant case, a corporation has, by the issuance of preferred stock in accord with its charter provisions and applicable law, granted preferential rights and privileges to stock issued by it and the outstanding, it cannot disregard what the law regards as contractual obligations which it has thus undertaken in connection with its stock.

We do not find in the record at hand evidence of an effort by the plaintiff to interfere with any matter which is lawfully within the control of the defendant's board of directors. There is no charge by her of fraud or mismanagement; there is no effort on her part to compel the defendant to declare a cash dividend. Asserting only her contract rights as an owner of the defendant's first preferred stock, she refuses to accept in payment of arrears in dividends upon her holdings the fifty-year income notes already described. We agree with the plaintiff's position that the defendant's obligation to her as an owner of its first preferred stock may not legally be thus satisfied in the absence of her consent to such action. She cannot be compelled to accept a property dividend. Williams v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 93 N.Y. 162, 192. See Thompson on The Law of Corporations (3d ed.) vol. 7, § 5261. * * *

The letter of transmittal and her subsequent correspondence with the defendant's president not only gave her notice that the corporation offered her no choice whether as a first preferred stockholder she was willing to accept the income notes in part payment of arrears in dividends upon her stock but it notified her that the Federal Income Tax officials had been advised that she had been paid such arrears in dividends in full. By the action thus taken by the defendant, despite plaintiff's refusal to consent thereto, the defendant's corporate records show that she has been paid in full the amount of arrears of dividends accumulated as of April 20, 1937, upon her first preferred stock. So long as the fifty-year income notes of defendant's subsidiaries remain issued and registered in her name she is the ostensible owner thereof. The defendant's records will show payment of such arrears in accumulated dividends and her right in the future to receive such dividends in cash has been jeopardized and constitutes irreparable injury.

Likewise the information filed by the defendant with Federal Income Tax officials relating to the payment of the dividend declared on April 16, 1937, shows a payment of that dividend in full to the plaintiff who, in turn, has never reported the face value of the income notes among dividends received by her because she has refused to accept the same.

In these circumstances we believe Special Term erred in refusing to exercise its powers in equity in the plaintiff's favor. * * *

The judgments should be reversed, with costs to appellant, and the case remitted to the Special Term with directions to proceed in accord with this opinion.[16]

CROCKER v. WALTHAM WATCH COMPANY et al.

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1944. 315 Mass. 397, 53 N.E.2d 230.

Bill in equity by Percy G. Crocker against the Waltham Watch Company and others on behalf of plaintiff as minority stockholder, the company, and all other stockholders, to establish the obligation of the company and its directors to declare and pay dividends to the class A common stockholders and to declare and pay or accumulate dividends on the six per cent. preferred stock. From a decree dismissing the bill, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed and decree rendered for plaintiff

DOLAN, JUSTICE. This is a bill in equity against the Waltham Watch Company and its directors, brought by a minority stockholder of the defendant company in behalf of himself, the company and all other stockholders. The bill seeks a decree establishing the obligation of the company and its directors under its agreement of association to declare and pay dividends to the class A common stockholders and to declare and pay or accumulate dividends on the six per cent preferred stock annually whenever the operations of the defendant company result in annual net earnings, and establishing the obligation of the directors to declare and pay dividends on the common stocks class A, and to declare and pay or accumulate dividends upon the six per cent preferred stock for the years 1939, 1940 and 1941. The pertinent parts of the agreement of association are annexed to and made a part of the bill. The case was heard upon statements of agreed facts, which the parties agreed are all the facts. The judge entered a decree dismissing the bill, from which the plaintiff appealed.

---

16 The Court of Appeals left open the question whether the directors intended to declare a cash or a property dividend. Plaintiff brought an action at law to recover the balance due on what she alleged was the cash dividend. Held: Judgment for defendant. The declaration of a dividend was clearly partly in cash and partly in property. Though such a declaration is invalid, the court cannot construe the resolution as calling for a cash dividend. Strout v. Cross, Austin & Ireland Lumber Co., 175 Misc. 826, 25 N.Y.S.2d 377, aff'd, 263 App.Div. 801, 32 N.Y.S.2d 127, 1941.

A summary of the facts follows: The plaintiff is the owner of nine hundred shares of the six per cent preferred stock of the defendant company, and has owned these shares continuously since the reorganization to be mentioned hereinafter. The individual defendants are the directors of the company and were the directors during the years 1939, 1940 and 1941. The company was organized and incorporated in Massachusetts in 1923 to succeed to the watchmaking business of a predecessor company of the same name. The old company met serious financial difficulties at the end of the last war, having accumulated a large inventory, much of which was obsolete and overvalued. It had little cash and was forced to resort to bank loans and public offerings of five-year coupon notes to keep going, meanwhile continuing to operate at a loss. The old company exhausted its borrowing power and could obtain no further extensions on its bank loans, and despite all efforts continued to lose money until the bank creditors approached Kidder, Peabody & Co. to undertake a financial reorganization. The assets of the old company were sold to the new defendant company in 1923; the new company assumed the debts of the old company and procured cash to liquidate the $7,200,000 of bank loans and publicly held coupon notes by the sale for $5,300,000 of the bonds, debentures, and a portion of the six per cent preferred stock of the new company, by the issue of $1,700,000 of prior preference stock for subscription at par by the old preferred stockholders, and by the issue of common stock, class A, for $250,000. For full details of the reorganization, see Abbot v. Waltham Watch Co., 260 Mass. 81, 156 N.E. 897.

Since the date of the reorganization, the financial position of the new company has steadily improved. Earnings have been sufficient to enable the company to retire its debentures without refinancing, and to purchase and retire substantial amounts of its mortgage bonds and stocks, so that on December 31, 1941, there were outstanding the following securities: $1,130,000 of mortgage bonds due June, 1943; prior preference stock of a par value of $381,230; six per cent preferred stock of a par value of $3,384,285; twenty-five thousand shares of no par value common stock, class A; and forty-one thousand eight hundred sixty-eight and three fourths shares of common stock, class B, no par value.

The pertinent provisions of the agreement of association and articles of organization of the company follow: "Second: Holders of prior preference stock shall be entitled to receive, when declared by the Directors, cumulative dividends at the rate of 7% per annum and no more. * * * No dividends shall be paid on any other class of stock until all accrued dividends and the current quarterly dividend on the prior preference stock shall have been paid, or a sufficient sum from which to make payment when due shall have been set aside for that purpose. Third: Holders of preferred stock shall be entitled to receive, when declared by the Directors, dividends at the rate of 6% per annum and no more payable before any dividends are paid on the common stock in any year, except as hereinafter provided in the case of common stock Class A. Such dividends shall be noncumulative except as hereinafter provided. Fourth: Holders of common stock, Class A, will be entitled to receive each year in dividends an amount equal in the aggregate to one-fifth of the net earnings of the Company for the preceding year, to be determined as follows: At the end of each calendar year the Directors shall ascertain the annual net earnings for the preceding year remaining after the payment of all interest charges, accrued and unpaid dividends on the prior preference stock and after providing during the first five years for the annual sinking fund, to retire the debentures dated February 15, 1923, and shall forthwith declare and pay to the holders of the common stock, Class A, a dividend equal in amount to one-fifth of such net annual earnings, provided the Company's capital will not be impaired by such payment. If the Company's capital will be so impaired, then the Directors shall forthwith declare and pay a dividend to the holders of the common stock Class A, of so much of the one-fifth of such net annual earnings as may be paid without impairing the Company's capital. The rights of the holders of common stock, Class A, to the dividends above provided for shall be non-cumulative. If a dividend as above stated is paid on the common stock, Class A, in any year, there shall either be paid in the same year, on the preferred stock a dividend equal in amount to four times the dividend paid on the common stock, Class A, but not exceeding an amount equal to 6% per annum on the preferred stock outstanding, or if such dividend is not paid during the same year, it shall be accumulated, and no dividends shall be paid on the common stock, Class B in any year unless such accumulated dividend on the preferred stock is paid as well as the dividends on the preferred stock for such year. * * * Ninth: All the stock, both preferred and common, shall have equal voting powers, each share entitling the holder to one vote."

During the years 1939, 1940 and 1941, the company had an earned surplus and, after the payment of taxes and all charges, had earnings in excess of the amount necessary to pay all accrued dividends on the prior preference stock. The figures for 1939 and 1940 are shown in the balance sheets and earnings statement for these years attached to the record. No figures were available for 1941 when the statement of agreed facts was prepared. All cumulative dividends on the prior preference stock for the years 1939, 1940 and 1941 have been paid. It is conceded that after such payments net earnings were sufficient in those years for the declaration and the payment of a dividend in some amount on the common stock, class A, and on the six per cent preferred stock; that during the years in question there has been no impairment of capital in the sense of "contributed capital" or "capital represented by outstanding capital stock"; and that out of the earnings of each of the three years dividends in some amount could have been declared and paid on the class A common stock and on the six per cent preferred stock without causing an impairment of capital in that sense. At the close of each of the years in question the directors have ascertained the amount of earnings remaining after provision for accrued dividends on the prior preference stock, but have determined to declare no dividends on the class A common or the six per cent preferred stock.

The parties are agreed that the sole issue is whether, under the agreement of association and articles of organization set out above it is within the discretion of the directors to declare no dividends on the common stock, class A, and on the six per cent preferred stock in years in which there are an earned surplus and net earnings of the prior year available therefor, or whether, as the plaintiff contends, the agreement of association makes a declaration mandatory in such circumstances. If the declaration of dividends be held discretionary, the plaintiff does not charge abuse of discretion.

It is well settled that a stockholder's rights between himself and the corporation and the other stockholders are contractual, and that the terms of the contract are to be found in the agreement of association and the provisions of applicable statutes. [Citing cases.] * * * Therefore it is to the agreement of association, particularly clause fourth thereof, that the court must look for a determination of the plaintiff's right to receive and the defendants' duty to declare dividends.

The cases in this Commonwealth as well as those of other jurisdictions reveal, in general, a reluctance on the part of the courts to construe provisions relative to the declaration of dividends in such a way as to hold that it is mandatory upon the directors in any circumstances to declare dividends. The courts prefer not to interfere thus with the sound financial management of the corporation by its directors, but declare as a general rule that the declaration of dividends rests within the sound discretion of the directors, refusing to interfere with their determination unless a plain abuse of discretion is made to appear. * * *

This principle is applicable with equal force to the rights of holders of preferred shares, whether cumulative or noncumulative, to receive dividends. The cases just cited were all cases of preferred stock. In Morse v. Boston & Maine Railroad, Wabash Railway Co. v. Barclay, and Collins v. Portland Electric Power Co., just cited, the shares in question were all noncumulative preferred shares. See also New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Co. v. Nickals, 119 U.S. 296, 307, 7 S.Ct. 209, 30 L.Ed. 363. As was said in the Collins case, 12 F.2d 671, 673: "Preferred stock does not represent a debt nor a pledge of profits in favor of the holders thereof in preference to others." * * *

The only Massachusetts case which we have been able to discover where the language of the contract, contained in a by-law, was found to impose an obligation on the corporation to pay dividends is Lydia

E. Pinkham Medicine Co. v. Gove, 303 Mass. 1, 20 N.E.2d 482. The text of the by-law is set forth in 303 Mass. at pages 11, 12, 20 N.E.2d at page 489. In Cratty v. Peoria Law Library Association, 219 Ill. 516, 76 N.E. 707, the court held that the following by-law made the payment of dividends mandatory. The by-law there in issue provided: "The association guarantees to every stockholder a dividend of eight per cent. per annum on the amount of paid-in stock held by him or them from the date of such payment, which dividend shall be a charge against the association, and the production of the certificate of stock or receipt of payment shall entitle the holder to the amount of such dividend. Such dividend shall be due and payable on the first day of January in each year." The court there held that "It certainly cannot be said that the parties to this contract intended that it should not be performed if the corporation preferred to expend its net income in increasing the capital or assets by adding to the library and rendering it more useful and valuable." Page 523 of 219 Ill., page 709 of 76 N.E. * * *

In the case at bar the defendants argue that the apparently mandatory language of clause fourth of the agreement of association must nevertheless be held to leave the matter of dividends out of net profits on the common stock, class A, and on the six per cent preferred stock within their judgment. They strongly stress the predilection of the courts for such a construction and rely upon the apparent inconsistency that will exist between that clause and clause second relating to dividends on the prior preference stock if the plaintiff's interpretation be the one adopted. Clause second reads: "Holders of prior preference stock shall be entitled to receive, when declared by the Directors, cumulative dividends at the rate of 7% per annum and no more, commencing to accrue on the 12th day of March, 1923, and payable July 1, 1923, and quarterly thereafter on the first days of January, April, July and October in each year. No dividends shall be paid on any other class of stock until all accrued dividends and the current quarterly dividend on the prior preference stock shall have been paid, or a sufficient sum from which to make payment when due shall have been set aside for that purpose."

It is argued by the defendants and conceded by the plaintiff that the declaration and the payment of dividends on the prior preference stock are expressly made subject to the directors' discretion. Yet both accrued and current dividends on that stock must be paid before any dividend may be declared on any other class of stock. From this the defendants maintain that the declaration or the payment of dividends on the common stock, class A, and on the six per cent preferred stock must be discretionary with the directors. In our opinion, however, the language of clause fourth of the agreement of association is so direct and express that we cannot escape the conclusion that it requires the directors to declare dividends out of net earnings of the preceding year in the amount and under the terms stipulated on the common stock, class A, and on the six per cent preferred stock. It is difficult to conceive of words more direct and expressive of command than the following language used in this clause: "At the end of each calendar year the Directors shall ascertain the annual net earnings for the preceding year * * * and shall forthwith declare and pay to the holders of the common stock, Class A, a dividend * * * provided the Company's capital will not be impaired by such payment. If the Company's capital will be so impaired, then the Directors shall forthwith declare and pay a dividend to the holders of the common stock, Class A, of so much * * *."

"Shall forthwith" suggests immediacy and necessity; it is expressive of the imperative; it negatives any suggestion of discretion or determination of policy by the directors. The entire clause suggests irresistibly that the policy of the directors with regard to net earnings has been fixed and declared for them beyond their power to alter. In short, it is apparent that the incorporators determined to dedicate a certain amount of such net earnings as the company might have to the payment of dividends on the class A common and on the six per cent preferred shares of the company.

Further support for this conclusion is found, as it was found in Burk v. Ottawa Gas & Electric Co., 87 Kan. 6, 123 P. 857, Ann.Cas. 1913D, 772, in the fact that when it was intended to confer discretion on the directors in the matter of dividends the draftsman of the agreement knew how to, and did, employ suitable language. Thus, when it comes to declaring dividends on the common stock, class B, clause fifth provides that "Any earnings at any time applicable to the payment of dividends after the payment of the dividends in respect of the prior preference stock, preferred stock and common stock, Class A, hereinbefore specified, may be applied to the payment of dividends on the common stock, Class B. * * *" One has but to contrast the phrase "shall forthwith declare and pay" with the words "may be applied to the payment" to ascertain the obvious difference of intent expressed in the two clauses of the agreement.

The history of the origin of the defendant company tends to indicate that the plaintiff's construction of the agreement of association is the true one. The common stock, class A, and the six per cent preferred shares were sold to the public as the issue of a company succeeding to the business of a failing concern, in an effort to raise new capital for the business. It seems most likely that new investors in a business whose future was certainly speculative could not be induced to risk their money in the new company except upon the assurance that if operations should result in net earnings they, the investors, would definitely receive a share of these earnings. In view of the risky nature of the investment it seems most probable that purchasers of the shares put their entire hopes in a share of any net earnings that might result; that the possibility of permanently augmenting their wealth was sufficiently remote at the time for them to be unwilling to permit the directors to accumulate a large surplus or plow all the earnings back into the business while they, the investors, were foregoing any return on their investment during years when such return was possible. * * *

It is not difficult to reconcile this construction of clause fourth with the provisions of clause second dealing with the payment of dividends on the prior preference stock. Reading the agreement of association as a whole, the interpretation suggested by the plaintiff seems the one most likely to have been truly intended by the incorporators. It brings all the provisions into harmony with each other, and gives effect to each clause without altering the meaning most naturally to be placed upon the words employed in each. And it is neither strained nor artificial. The plaintiff's interpretation is, briefly: In years when there have been no net earnings the directors may in their discretion pay dividends on the prior preference stock out of accumulated surplus, or they may pass them; likewise in years when earnings are meager and insufficient to pay a dividend on the prior preference stock and leave anything more. Similar discretion in like circumstances is granted to the directors by clause third with reference to the payment of noncumulative dividends on the six per cent preferred stock. But in years when the operations of the company result in net earnings sufficient, after the payment of certain prior charges, to pay a dividend on the prior preference stock with something left over, then a dividend on the prior preference stock must be declared and paid or a sufficient sum therefor set aside, and, further a dividend of the stipulated portion of the remainder declared and paid to the holders of the common stock, class A, and a cumulative dividend of a stated portion of such remainder declared in favor of the six per cent preferred shares.

Such an interpretation does not make it impossible for the directors ever to accumulate a surplus out of earning to guard against future contingencies, or to reinvest a part of the earnings in the business. In these years when net earnings remain after paying the dividends required on the prior preference, the six per cent preferred and the common, class A, stocks, whether or in what amount dividends shall be paid to the holders of the class B common stock is a matter for the determination of the directors. They may declare no dividends out of that balance or declare a dividend equalling less than the entire balance. The absolute rights of the holders of the common stock, class A, and of the holders of the six per cent preferred stock are limited to a stated share of net earnings in years when net earnings are available. There is nothing in the agreement of association that confers on any class of stockholders of the company a right to dividends out of earned surplus. Nor ought it to be held, in the absence of the clearest expression of intent, that the incorporators had so little regard for future contingencies that might arise that they drew an agreement making it impossible in any circumstances for the company to amass a surplus to provide for unforeseen emergencies or to tide the company over lean years. * * *

AFFELDT v. DUDLEY PAPER COMPANY et al.

Supreme Court of Michigan, 1943. 306 Mich. 39, 10 N.W.2d 299.

Suit by Ferdinand G. Affeldt against the Dudley Paper Company and others to compel defendants to pay plaintiff the par value of his shares of preferred stock plus cumulative dividends. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

BUTZEL, JUSTICE. Plaintiff, the owner of 100 shares of the preferred stock of defendant Dudley Paper Company, filed a bill asking that defendants be ordered to pay him $1,000, the par value of his shares plus cumulative dividends at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from September 1, 1934. Prior to the year 1931, plaintiff had become the owner of 100 shares of preferred stock. These shares were authorized by an amendment to the articles of association which provided that "the preferred stock shall be subject to redemption at par on the 15th day of April, 1935," etc., and at a premium at any time after April 15, 1916, and before April 15, 1935. During the year 1934, at the request of the officers of the corporation and upon their representation that the company would be financially unable to redeem the preferred stock on April 15, 1935, plaintiff exchanged his certificate for one dated September 1, 1934, for 100 shares of preferred stock of the par value of $10 a share. The certificate contained the following recitals:

"This stock is subject to redemption at par on April 15th, 1940, and at 5 per cent. above par at any time after November 17th, 1930 and before April 15th, 1940."

"The holder of this certificate shall be entitled to a dividend of 7 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly on the first days of January, April, July and October in each year, which dividend shall be cumulative and payable before any dividend shall be set apart or paid on the common stock."

While the exact date of the expiration of the corporate charter is not given, it was in the very early part of 1941, so that April 15, 1940, the date of redemption at par set forth in the certificate, was but shortly prior to the expiration of the corporate charter.

At the end of 1937, or soon thereafter, the officers of the corporation made an effort to exchange the 7 per cent. cumulative preferred stock for 5 per cent. noncumulative preferred stock. A meeting of the common stockholders was held for that purpose, and application was made to the Corporation and Securities Commission for authority to issue such 5 per cent. noncumulative stock, the purpose of the issuance of said stock being stated in the application as follows: "The proposed issue is not to be sold but is to be exchanged, share for share for the outstanding certificates of preferred, already issued by the company."

Plaintiff refused to make the exchange. He claims that he never received notice of any meeting of preferred stockholders in which the question of the issuance of the 5 per cent. stock and its exchange for the then outstanding stock was presented. Defendants concede that no proper legal action was taken at the time that would bind plaintiff so we need not discuss this phase of the case. As a matter of fact 4,578 shares of the 7 per cent. cumulative preferred stock were exchanged for 5 per cent. non-cumulative stock, but 340 shares of the 7 per cent. preferred stock were not exchanged. The holders of the 340 shares, with the exception of plaintiff holding 100 shares, accepted the 5 per cent. dividend that was subsequently declared on the 5 per cent. non-cumulative preferred stock. Plaintiff did not accept such 5 per cent. dividend and has received no dividends on his stock since December 1, 1934. * * *

The more serious question is whether it was proper for the trial court to compel the payment of accumulated dividends. While it is true that a court is unwilling to impose its judgment upon the directors of a corporation and interfere with the exercise of their sound discretion, if the directors refuse to declare a dividend in the hope of compelling a stockholder to abandon his contract, the latter may have his remedy in equity. See Knight v. Alamo Manufacturing Co., 190 Mich. 223, 157 N.W. 24, 6 A.L.R. 789. The defendant corporation had already paid a 5 per cent. dividend on the outstanding 5 per cent. non-cumulative preferred stock and was prepared to pay an additional 5 per cent. dividend for the current year. As was stated in Vanden Bosch v. Michigan Trust Co., supra, all who accepted the new preferred stock did so with the understanding that the old holders must be paid to the extent they would not accept the substitution. Inasmuch as the corporation conceded its ability to pay dividends to the new preferred stockholders, it was its duty to take care of the old preferred stockholders first. See Wiedersum v. Atlantic Cement Products Co., 261 App.Div. 305, 25 N.Y.S.2d 496.

A question is raised as to whether the obligation should continue to pay the certificate rate of 7 per cent. after maturity. Counsel have been unable to find any authority on this subject. In Warner v. Juif, 38 Mich. 662, we said: "We are aware of the difference of judicial opinion which appears in regard to this general subject, but we think the matter is settled in this State in favor of the * * * rate * * * prescribed by the contract as well after maturity as before. Such has been the invariable construction here, not only by the profession, but by all others, and we are not disposed to question its propriety."

Defendants further object to the fact that there was an injunction restraining the declaration of a dividend of 5 per cent. on the new preferred stock. As stated in the brief, "The company had at the time of the trial current assets with a value approximately three times the amount of its current liabilities;" also that its net worth was over one hundred times the amount in litigation. It further stated that collection of the amounts due plaintiff was such a simple matter that the issuance of an injunction was entirely improper. The question of the propriety of issuing an injunction becomes moot. The affirmation of the decree requires its immediate payment. The injunction then ceases to be of any force or effect. Defendants claim that the costs were improperly assessed. We have checked them and find no error.

The decree of the trial court is affirmed, with costs to plaintiff.

NEW ENGLAND TRUST COMPANY et al. v. PENOBSCOT CHEMICAL FIBRE COMPANY, et al.

Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1946. 50 A.2d 188.

Suit by the New England Trust Company and others, against the Penobscot Chemical Fibre Company and others, to compel the payment of accumulated dividends on certain stock. From a decree in favor of complainants, the defendants appeal.

Appeal dismissed; decree affirmed.

THAXTER, JUSTICE. The plaintiffs, who are the holders of 1,618 shares out of a total of 2,500 of the second preferred stock of the Penobscot Chemical Fibre Company, on behalf of themselves and all other second preferred stockholders similarly situated, filed a bill in equity on May 15, 1945 against the Company and its directors to compel the payment of accumulated dividends on the stock which on March 31, 1945, the end of the fiscal year, amounted to $42 per share. Answers were filed by the defendants to which there were replications by the plaintiffs and a hearing was had on bill, answers and evidence. The sitting justice entered a decree sustaining the bill and ordering the payment of the accumulated dividends which on April 14, 1946, the date of the entry of the decree, had been reduced to $35 per share. The case is now before us on an appeal from this decree. * * *

On January 8, 1945 the plaintiffs, on behalf of themselves and all other second preferred stockholders, made written demand on the company and on the directors that all accumulated dividends on their stock should be declared and paid. No answer having been received to this demand, this action was brought.

The plaintiffs rely on the by-law relating to the second preferred stock, Par. (a) which reads as follows:

"Second preferred stock shall bear date of May 1, 1920, and shall be entitled to dividends at the rate of seven per centum per annum and no more, payable quarterly on the first days of August, November, February and May in each year hereafter.

"Such dividends shall be cumulative so that if on any such quarterly dividend date a dividend of 1¾ per centum of the par value shall not have been paid, the deficiency shall be paid before any dividends shall be declared, paid out, or set apart for any other class of stock, excepting Preferred Stock."

This by-law was enacted in 1920 and has remained in force to the present time exactly as originally worded with the exception that, apparently in 1937 at the time of the issuance of the prior preference stock, the second paragraph was amended to read as follows: "Such dividends shall be cumulative so that if on any such quarterly dividend date a dividend of one and three-quarters per cent (1¾%) of the par value shall not have been paid, the deficiency shall be paid before any dividends shall be declared, paid out or set apart for any class of junior stock."

The defendants contend that, in the absence of fraud, bad faith or abuse of discretion, their judgment not to pay dividends is conclusive unless their discretion is limited by statute, charter or by-law. With this general principle we concur. It is a fact that the corporation has made large commitments for additional plant equipment and for improvements, the justification for which seems to be established. And the sitting justice has found that, if the directors had a discretion to withhold dividends on the second preferred stock, they exercised that discretion soundly.

A glance at the balance sheets of this company indicates that the payment of these dividends is not impossible as was the case in Spear v. Rockland-Rockport Lime Co., 113 Me. 285, 93 A. 754, 6 A.L.R. 793. Without doubt the money to do so could have been procured without imperiling the credit of the company, and it had the right to borrow money for that purpose. Hazeltine v. Belfast & Moosehead Lake Railroad Co., 79 Me. 411, 419, 10 A. 328, 1 Am.St.Rep. 330.

The question before us is a narrow one. On the facts of this particular case, were these plaintiffs entitled as a matter of right to these dividends, or did the directors have a discretion to withhold them?

As we have intimated above, we have no quarrel with the general rule that the declaration of dividends rests in the sound discretion of the board of directors of a corporation; but such discretion may be limited by a contract between the company and its stockholders, Spear v. Rockland-Rockport Lime Co., supra, or by a by-law which in effect constitutes such a contract. Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co. v. Gove, 303 Mass. 1, 13, 20 N.E.2d 482. Our court has gone farther than have some others in holding that the discretion of directors is limited when the preferred stock contract, as was the case here, provides without qualification that stockholders are entitled to dividends at a fixed rate. Spear v. Rockland-Rockport Lime Co., supra. In such a case the question is not, whether the directors in carrying out the financial policy of the company have acted wisely in withholding dividends, but rather what are the legal rights of the stockholders.

The question here involved was discussed in Spear v. Rockland-Rockport Lime Co., supra [113 Me. 285, 93 A. 755]. The preferred stock contract there before the court provided "That the preferred stock is entitled, out of the net earnings of the company, to a semiannual, preferential, cumulative dividend at the rate of 7 per centum per annum, and no more, payable on the 1st days of March and September in each year, to be paid or provided for before any dividend shall be set apart or paid on the common stock." Chief Justice Savage said, 113 Me. at page 289, 93 A. at page 756, 6 A.L.R. 793:

"The plaintiff's contract is that he shall be entitled, out of the net earnings of the company, to a semiannual, preferential, cumulative dividend, to be paid or provided for before any dividend is set apart or paid on the common stock. And that is why it is called preferential. By being cumulative, if net earnings at any dividend period are insufficient to pay the contract dividend, it is to be made up out of subsequent net earnings. And in any event, upon liquidation or dissolution of the corporation, the contract goes on to say, the preferred stockholders are to be paid in full for their stock at par, with all accrued and unpaid dividends, before common stockholders receive anything. One feature of the contract remains to be noticed. The contract was that the preferred stockholder was entitled, out of the net earnings, to 'semiannual * * * dividends.' The defendant contends that, under this contract, the plaintiff was not entitled, even if there were net earnings, to have dividends paid for any half year, year, or series of years; that the directors might use the net earnings for the development of the business; and that there was but a single limitation, namely, that the plaintiff must be paid all accrued and unpaid dividends before anything is paid to common stockholders. In other words, it is claimed that the defendant made no promise or guaranty to the plaintiff of any dividends to be paid out of net earnings, at any particular time, and that it will have fully kept and performed the obligation of its contract, if at any time, past or future, it has paid or will pay the preferred dividends before common ones are paid; that is, it may indefinitely postpone payment. We are unable to concur in this view. This contract, like all others, must be interpreted in accordance with the expressed intention of the parties, reading the contract in the light of its purposes and existing conditions and surrounding circumstances. And, reading the contract in that way, we think it obvious that, when the parties agreed that the plaintiff was to be entitled, out of the net earnings, to a semiannual dividend, they intended that he should be entitled to have a dividend paid semiannually if there were net earnings."

Counsel for the defendants claim that the language quoted is dictum because the bill was in fact dismissed on the ground that the corporate property had been sold and there were no funds available from which payment of dividends could have been made. Conceding that technically the doctrine here laid down is dictum, it is nonetheless a statement as to how such a contract as we now have before us should be construed; and we cannot ignore it. It certainly means that preferred stockholders under such an agreement are as a matter of right entitled to dividends if they are earned, and that the directors do not have the right to postpone payment of them because in their judgment it is wiser to use the money required for their payment for extensions, rehabilitation and improvements. In reaffirming this principle we do not mean to imply that such right is an absolute one. Circumstances may exist which would justify the refusal to pay but they are not present in the instant case.

There is a cogent if not a compelling reason why this court should not now modify the doctrine so clearly laid down in the Spear case. Dictum though it may have been, it was a carefully worded and deliberate statement as to the rights of preferred stockholders. The by-law which we have before us was drafted within a few years after the opinion in the Spear case was handed down and the money may well have been paid to the corporation by the purchasers of the second preferred stock with the knowledge that under that by-law they were entitled, in accordance with the opinion of this court previously rendered, to semiannual dividends at the rate of seven percent, if there were net earnings of at least that amount applicable to such stock. In construing the language used in the contract involved in that case, the court said, 113 Me. at page 289, 93 A. at page 756, 6 A.L.R. 793: "And, if there is any ambiguity in meaning, the contract should be construed more strictly against the company. The phraseology was its own, and it should be held to the significance which the words would ordinarily imply to an investor." We call attention to the fact that in the case now before us the language of the by-law with which we are dealing did have significance to the investors in this stock. It told them of their right to dividends if they were earned and on that understanding they paid their money to the corporation. For this court to change the rule after the money has been paid would in effect be to sanction a breach of faith.

We must therefore hold that under the contract between the company and the second preferred stockholders as expressed in the by-law the stockholders were entitled as of right to dividends if they were earned. * * *

It is strenuously argued that the corporation has insufficient cash with which to make this payment; that it has tried to borrow sufficient money and has failed. It did have sufficient funds at the time the suit was brought but we prefer not to rest our rejection of the defendants' contention on that ground. With such a favorable financial position as this balance sheet indicates, we frankly do not believe that there is no way that the relatively small amount necessary for this purpose can be procured. And we are fortified in that belief by the fact that in making the commitments for extensive improvements the directors must have determined that the money for such improvements could be raised. It is obvious that they feel it is wiser to use their funds and credit for improvements rather than to make the payment to these stockholders. In that they may be right as a matter of business policy but that is not the question before this court.

Appeal dismissed.

Decree below affirmed.

(c) Non-Cumulative Dividends

NON-CUMULATIVE DIVIDEND CLAUSE. (NO PAR VALUE)

The holders of the ——— stock shall be entitled to receive in each year, when and as declared by the board of directors of the corporation, out of any assets of the corporation available for dividends pursuant to the laws of the State of ———, preferential dividends at the rate of ——— Dollars ($———) per share per annum, and no more, payable annually, semi-annually or quarterly on such days as may be determined by the board of directors, before any dividends shall be declared or paid upon or set apart for the ——— stock for such year. Such dividends upon the ——— stock shall be non-cumulative, so that the holders of said stock shall be entitled to receive only such dividends not exceeding dividends at the rate of ——— Dollars ($———) per share, during any year, as may, in the unlimited discretion of the board of directors, be declared and made payable.

Whenever the full dividend upon the ——— stock at the rate of ——— Dollars ($———) per share per annum shall have been paid or declared and a sum sufficient for the payment thereof set apart in any year, then dividends upon the ——— stock may be declared by the board of directors out of the remainder of the assets available therefor.

WABASH RAILWAY COMPANY, et al. v. BARCLAY et al. AUSTIN v. SAME.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1930. 280 U.S. 197, 50 S.Ct. 106.

Suit by John C. Barclay against the Wabash Railway Company and others. Decree for defendant [23 F.2d 691] was reversed by the Circuit Court of Appeals [30 F.2d 260], and the Wabash Railway Company and others and Shirley P. Austin separately bring certiorari. Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is a bill by holders of first preferred stock (called Class A) of the Wabash Railway Company, to have it declared that holders of such stock are entitled to receive preferential dividends up to five per cent. for each fiscal year from 1915 to 1926 inclusive to the extent that such dividends were earned in such fiscal years but were unpaid, before any dividends are paid upon other stock; and that the Company may be enjoined from paying dividends upon preferred stock B or common stock unless it shall first have paid such preferential dividends of five per cent. to the extent that the Company has had net earnings available for the payment and that such dividends remain unpaid. The case was heard upon bill and answer. The bill was dismissed by the District Court but the decree was reversed by the Circuit Court of Appeals, one of the Judges dissenting, 30 F.2d 260, and a writ of certiorari was granted by this Court. Wabash R. Co. v. Barclay, 279 U.S. 828, 49 S.Ct. 265, 73 L.Ed. 979.

The railway company was organized in 1915 under the laws of Indiana with three classes of capital stock: Shares of the par value of $100, of Five Per Cent. Profit Sharing Preferred Stock A; shares of the same par value of Five Per Cent. Convertible Preferred Stock B; and shares of the same par value of Common Stock. At the date of the bill there were 693,330.50 shares of A, 24,211.42 B and 666,977.75 common. From 1915 to 1926 there were net earnings on most of the years but for a number of years no dividend, or less than five per cent., was paid on Class A, while $16,000,000 net earnings that could have been used for the payment were expended upon improvements and additions to the property and equipment of the road. It is not denied that the latter expenditures were proper and were made in good faith, or that the money could not have been applied to dividends consistently with the duties of the Road. The Company now is more prosperous and proposes to pay dividends not only upon A but also on B and the common stock, but the plaintiffs say that it is not entitled to do so until it has paid to them unpaid preferential dividends for prior fiscal years in which it had net earnings that might have been applied to them but were not.

The obligations assumed by the Company appear in its instrument of incorporation and in the certificates of Preferred Stock A in substantially the same words "The holders of the Five Per Cent. Profit Sharing Preferred Stock A of the Company shall be entitled to receive preferential dividends in each fiscal year up to the amount of five per cent. before any dividends shall be paid upon any other stock of the Company, but such preferential dividends shall be non-cumulative." In the event of a liquidation the holders "shall be entitled to be paid in full out of the assets of the Company the par amount of their stock and all dividends thereon declared and unpaid before any amount shall be paid out of said assets to the holders of any other stock of the Company." By the plain meaning of the words the holders "are not entitled, of right, to dividends, payable out of the net profits accruing in any particular year, unless the directors of the Company formally declare, or ought to declare, a dividend payable out of such profits"; in the first instance at least a matter for the directors to determine. New York, Lake Erie & Western R. R. Co. v. Nickals, 119 U.S. 296, 307, 7 S.Ct. 209, 30 L.Ed. 363.

We believe that it has been the common understanding of lawyers and business men that in the case of non-cumulative stock entitled only to a dividend if declared out of annual profits, if those profits are justifiably applied by the directors to capital improvements and no dividend is declared within the year, the claim for that year is gone and cannot be asserted at a later date. But recently doubts have been raised that seem to have affected the minds of the majority below. We suppose the ground for the doubts is the probability that the directors will be tempted to abuse their power, in the usual case of a corporation controlled by the holders of the common stock. Their interest would lead them to apply earnings to improvement of the capital rather than to make avoidable payments of dividends which they do not share. But whether the remedies available in case of such a breach of duty are adequate or not, and apart from the fact that the control of the Wabash seems to have been in Class A, the class to which the plaintiffs belong, the law, as remarked by the dissenting Judge below, "has long advised them that their rights depend upon the judgment of men subject to just that possible bias."

When a man buys stock instead of bonds he takes a greater risk in the business. No one suggests that he has a right to dividends if there are no net earnings. But the investment presupposes that the business is to go on, and therefore even if there are net earnings, the holder of stock, preferred as well as common, is entitled to have a dividend declared only out of such part of them as can be applied to dividends consistently with a wise administration of a going concern. When, as was the case here, the dividends in each fiscal year were declared to be non-cumulative and no net income could be so applied within the fiscal year referred to in the certificate, the right for that year was gone. If the right is extended further upon some conception of policy, it is enlarged beyond the meaning of the contract and the common and reasonable understanding of men.

Decree reversed.

NOTE

This decision represents the majority rule in this country today. It has been the subject of much comment in the law reviews. See, Hicks, The Rights of Non-Cumulative Preferred Stock—A Doubtful Decision by the United States Supreme Court, 1931, 5 Temple L.Q. 538; Lattin, Is Non-Cumulative Preferred Stock in Fact Preferred? 1930, 25 Ill.L.Rev. 148–154; Stevens, Rights of Non-Cumulative Preferred Stockholders, 1934, 34 Col.L.Rev. 1439, 1445–1447; Notes, 1929, 14 Corn.L.Q. 341; 1930, 25 Ill.L.Rev. 330; 1929, 77 U. of P.L.Rev. 897; 1929, 3 St.John's L.Rev. 284; 1929, 38 Yale L.J. 820; comments on the Court of Appeals decision, 30 F.2d 260, C.C.A.N.Y. 1929; 1930, 10 B.U.L.Rev. 404; 1930, 18 Calif.L.Rev. 318; 1930, 30 Col.L.Rev. 260; 1930, 43 Harv.L.Rev. 829; 1930, 28 Mich.L.Rev. 763; 1930, 14 Minn.L.Rev. 417; 1930, 8 N.Y.U.L.Q.Rev. 138; 1930, 39 Yale L.J. 581.

The following cases represent the minority rule:

MORAN v. UNITED STATES CAST IRON PIPE AND FOUNDRY COMPANY.
DAY v. SAME.

Court of Chancery of New Jersey, 1924. 95 N.J.Eq. 389, 123 A. 546.

Bills by Anson B. Moran and John Day against the United States Cast Iron Pipe & Foundry Company. Bill of first complainant dismissed, and decree for other complainant advised.

BACKES, V. C. There has been no material change in the subject-matter of this litigation since the decision in 1908 in Bassett v. U. S. Cast Iron Pipe & Foundry Co., 74 N.J.Eq. 668, 70 A. 929, affirmed 75 N.J.Eq. 539, 73 A. 514.

It will be recalled that at that time the company had a reserve fund, accumulated by withholding dividends from its preferred and common stockholders, which, though listed on the books as "Reserve for Additional Working Capital," was held to be surplus profits and not working capital in the statutory sense of section 47 of the Corporation Act [2 Comp.St.1910, p. 1629], and that so much thereof as was derived from withholding dividends from the preferred stockholders was held to be available for division among them; that is to say, whenever in the opinion of the directors it was no longer needed for the purpose for which it was reserved and they in their discretion saw fit to divide it. The character of that fund remains the same, except that its book title is now "Working Capital Reserve," and the respective amounts composing the fund withheld from the two classes of stock have changed. At the end of the fiscal year 1922, the amount of dividends withheld from preferred stock was $700,000; from common stock $1,800,000, in round figures. The outstanding capital stock is now $12,000,000 preferred, 7 per centum, noncumulative, dividends, and $12,000,000 common.

The company's earnings during the year 1922 were over a million dollars, and after paying a dividend of 5 per cent. ($600,000) on the preferred stock the balance ($559,595.75) was transferred to the working capital reserve. Later a further dividend of 2 per cent.

was declared for the year 1922, and the amount ($240,000) was withdrawn from the working capital reserve to pay it. On November 16, 1923, the company resolved to pay to the preferred stockholders an additional dividend of one-half of 1 per cent., and a like dividend of one-half of 1 per cent. to the common stockholders, and drew upon the working capital reserve for the amount ($120,000). The resolution declaring the dividend on the preferred stock recites that it was out of earnings withheld from the preferred stockholders in previous years and was no longer needed as working capital, and the one declaring the dividend on the common stock, after setting forth the fact that a dividend of 7 per cent. had been paid to the preferred stockholders for the year 1922 out of the profits of that year, states that it is out of the net earnings for the year 1922. At this juncture the complainant Moran, a common stockholder, filed his bill to enjoin the payment of the additional dividend to the preferred stockholders, and the complainant Day, a preferred stockholder, filed his bill to prevent the payment of the dividend declared on the common stock.

The Moran bill: The complainant, a common stockholder, contends that the company having paid 7 per cent. in dividends on the preferred stock for the year 1922—the yearly maximum fixed by its charter—it was unlawful to declare the extra dividend of one-half of 1 per cent. out of withheld dividends of prior years because the charter limits the payment of dividends in any one year to 7 per cent. The certificate of incorporation fixes the yearly dividend at not to exceed 7 per centum.

Section 18 of the Corporation Act of 1896 (P.L. p. 283) provides, as to preferred stock, that——

"The holders thereof shall be entitled to receive, and the corporation shall be bound to pay thereon, a fixed yearly dividend, to be expressed in the certificate, not exceeding eight per centum, payable quarterly, half yearly or yearly, before any dividend shall be set apart or paid on the common stock."

This obviously means, as to noncumulative dividends, that out of the profits of any fiscal year not more than the percentage fixed by the charter shall be paid on such stock for such year, but it does not prohibit the company, after having paid the fixed yearly dividend, from, in the same year, declaring and paying additional dividends out of profits earned in prior years applicable to dividends for such years, and which, but for holding them in reserve for economic reasons, would have been distributed in dividends in those years. These profits belong primarily to the preferred stockholders, and the directors are in no wise restricted either as to amount, time, or occasion when distribution shall be made.

It has been suggested that the withheld profits are available only for dividends in lean years to make up deficiencies, and that was the effect of the opinion in the Bassett case. That situation was involved, but the point was not.

The resolution declaring the dividend is lawful, and the bill will be dismissed.

The Day bill: This bill is by a preferred stockholder to prevent the payment of the dividend declared on the common stock "out of the profits of 1922." The dividend was declared after the company had paid 7 per cent. on the preferred stock for that year. The point made is that no dividend can be declared on the common stock until all the withheld profits applicable to dividends on the preferred stock have first been divided and paid.

It will be observed that section 18 provides not only that preferred stockholders shall be entitled to receive, and the corporation shall be bound to pay, a fixed yearly dividend, but also declares that such dividend shall be paid "before any dividend shall be set apart or paid to the common stock." The quoted language is unmistakable and the reason for it is aptly demonstrated in the present effort of the board of directors to favor the common stock at the expense of the preferred stockholders. While the statute says that the preferred stockholders shall be entitled to receive and the company shall be bound to pay a fixed yearly dividend out of the profits, when that obligation is to be performed is largely a matter of discretion with the directors. They are at liberty to pass dividends year after year and pile up profits, if in their opinion it is for the welfare of the company that this be done—as was done here—and in the absence of fraud, actual or constructive, their judgment is controlling. But once having decided to divide the profits, duty supplants discretion, and it becomes incumbent upon the directors to discharge the company's obligation to pay the fixed yearly dividends, and this before any dividend shall be set apart or paid on the common stock, viz.: To holders of cumulative dividend shares, all arrearages; to holders of noncumulative dividend stock, the dividends withheld. Otherwise, if the action of the defendant company were sanctioned, and the directors pursued the course they have outlined, the rights of the preferred stockholders in the reserve profits could be indefinitely ignored and altogether subordinated to those of the common stock. Although each class has a definite sum in the reserve and one cannot encroach on the other's for dividends, the preferential right of payment of dividends assured by the statute cannot be disregarded. The statutory design was to meet just such a situation as here confronts the preferred stockholders. The legislative scheme was to protect them in their priority rights to dividends over the common stock in all events, and where, as here, profits of past years applicable to dividends on both preferred and common stock are held in reserve, or there are current profits applicable to dividends on common stock, it was conceived that this protection would be afforded for forbidding the payment of any dividends on the common stock until the amount due the preferred stockholders was first paid. The statute in this respect is nothing more or less than a definition of the equitable rights of the preferred stockholders arising out of the company's obligation to pay the yearly fixed dividend, for if the company had profits not needed in its business, and was about to distribute them among the common stockholders when it owed dividends on the preferred stock, a court of equity would enjoin the diversion, just as it would intervene in behalf of creditors of a corporation when dividends are in derogation of their rights.

The fact that the dividend was declared out of the profits of 1922 adds no merit. The profits of that year had been in fact transferred to the working capital reserve, and the amount of the dividend was later withdrawn to meet it; but that is unimportant. The profits of 1922 were bulk surplus profits, by whatever name, and, as Vice Chancellor Howell observed, mere bookkeeping entries cannot change their character. The dividend cannot be differentiated because it was out of the profits of the last fiscal year any more than if it had been declared out of the profits of any preceding year and carried in the working capital reserve.

The defendant company's conception of section 18 is illustrated by the stock preference clauses contained in the certificate of incorporation, which read as follows:

"The preferred stock shall be entitled out of any and all surplus net profits, whenever declared by the board of directors, to noncumulative dividends at a rate not to exceed seven per cent. (7%) per annum for the fiscal year beginning on the first day of June, 1899, and for each and every other fiscal year thereafter, payable in preference and priority to any payment of any dividend on the common stock for such fiscal year. In the event of the dissolution of the corporation the holders of the preferred stock shall be entitled to receive par value of their preferred shares out of the surplus funds of the corporation remaining after the payment of its debts, before any payment shall be made therefrom to the holders of the common stock. The common stock shall be subject to the prior rights of the holders of the preferred stock as herein declared. If after providing for the payment of full dividends for any fiscal year on the preferred stock there shall remain any surplus net profits for such year, any of such net profits of such year and of any other fiscal year, after full dividends shall have been paid on the preferred stock shall be applicable to such dividends upon the common stock as from time to time shall be declared by the board of directors; and out of any such surplus net profits, after the closing of any fiscal year, the board of directors may pay dividends upon the common stock of the corporation for such fiscal year, but not until the dividends upon the preferred stock for such fiscal year shall have been actually paid or provided for and set apart."

This interpretation, if such it be, is, in effect, that noncumulative dividends are entitled to precedence only in years for which dividends are declared on the common stock out of profits of such years sufficient to pay dividends on both preferred and common stock, and not for years when applicable profits are available but undivided. The view is manifestly too narrow, for in the favored circumstances the preferred stock would be, as a matter of course, entitled to priority because of, as has already been pointed out, the company's bounden duty to pay the preferred stockholder a fixed yearly dividend. The fixed yearly dividend is the measure of their income per year out of profits per year, and the obligation of lean years is not met by preferential payments in fat years. Sight is lost entirely of the specific subordination of all dividends on the common stock.

Section 18 was amended in 1901 (P. L. 1901, p. 245, § 1), and in respect of dividends on preferred stock it provides:

"And such dividends may be made payable before any dividends shall be set apart or paid on the common stock, and such dividends may be made cumulative; provided, the corporation shall set apart or pay the said dividends to the holders of noncumulative preferred stock before any dividends shall be paid on the common stock."

The preservation of the priority right of noncumulative dividends, it would seem, emphasizes the view here entertained that the Legislature intended that no profits were to be divided among common stockholders, whatever may have been their origin or however applicable, unless the company's obligation to the preferred stockholders was first discharged.

The statutory ban on payments of dividends on the common stock until the preferred stockholders have been awarded their just due is explicit and imperative. The preference clauses in the certificate of incorporation in so far as they are thus inconsistent with the statute are invalid. Section 8, par. 7, C.S. 1910, p. 1604.

The dividend under consideration is without warrant in law and will be enjoined.[17]

CINTAS v. AMERICAN CAR & FOUNDRY COMPANY.

Court of Chancery of New Jersey, 1942. 131 N.J.Eq. 419, 25 A.2d 418.

Suit by Oscar B. Cintas against American Car and Foundry Company to restrain the payment of a dividend to common stockholders in violation of complainant's rights as a preferred stockholder.

Decree in accordance with opinion.

KAYS, VICE CHANCELLOR. The bill of complaint in this case is a class bill filed by the complainant who owns 2,500 shares of seven per cent. noncumulative preferred stock and 300 shares of common stock of the defendant corporation. The purpose of the bill is to protect complainant's rights as a preferred stockholder.

The matter first came before me on application for an ad interim restraint to prevent the payment of a dividend to the common stockholders which payment, it is claimed, would violate the rights of the preferred stockholders. Since hearing the motion, counsel have stipulated that I decide the whole case on the pleadings, affidavits and a stipulation entered into by counsel.

From the pleadings, affidavits and stipulation it appears that the defendant, American Car and Foundry Company, was organized under the laws of this State on February 20, 1899. It acquired eighteen manufacturing plants all of which are situated in the eastern part of the United States. The principal business of the defendant has been the manufacture of railroad cars and equipment and, at the present time, the manufacture of tanks, armorplate shells and other material for the United States and Great Britain. The defendant has acquired or established several subsidiaries which are as follows: American Car and Foundry Export Company, American Car and Foundry Investment Corporation, Carter Carburetor Company, American Car and Foundry Securities Corporation, American Welding Company, Railway Equipment Company of Argentine, Railway Equipment Company of Brazil, Railway Equipment Company of Cuba, and American Car and Foundry Company, Ltd., of England. The above are foreign corporations in that they are not incorporated under the laws of this State. All the stock of these companies is owned either by the defendant or one of its other subsidiaries. The officers and directors of the subsidiaries have been officers, directors or employees of the defendant. In most instances the principal offices of said companies are at the principal office of the defendant in New York City. The books, records and accounts of the subsidiaries have been kept by the auditing department of the defendant although separate records and accounts have been maintained by each subsidiary as if it were in fact a separate entity as, in law, it is.

---

17 Aff'd, 96 N.J.Eq. 698, 736, 126 A. 302, 329, 1924.

The capital of the defendant, at the time of its corporation, consisted of 300,000 shares of seven per cent. non-cumulative stock of the par value of $100 each and 300,000 shares of common stock of the par value of $100 each. The certificate of incorporation was amended in the year 1925 and thereby the 300,000 shares of common stock of the par value of $100 each was changed to 600,000 shares of no par value. The portion of the amended certificate, which effected this change, reads as follows:

"The Preferred Stock shall be entitled out of any and all surplus net profits, whenever declared by the Board of Directors, to non-cumulative dividends at the rate of not to exceed seven (7) per cent. for each year from the first day of March, 1899, to the first day of May, 1925, and for each and every fiscal year therafter (i.e., from May 1, 1925), payable in preference and priority to any payment of any dividend on the Common Stock for such fiscal year. * * *

"The Common Stock shall be subject to the prior rights of the holders of the Preferred Stock as herein declared. If after providing for the payment of full dividends for any fiscal year on the Preferred Stock there shall remain any surplus net profits of such year, any and all such surplus net profits of such year and of any other fiscal year after the full dividends shall have been paid on the Preferred Stock, shall be applicable to such dividends upon the Common Stock as from time to time shall be declared by the Board of Directors, and out of any such surplus net profits, after the closing of any fiscal year, the Board of Directors may pay such dividends upon the Common Stock of the corporation for such fiscal year, but not until the dividends upon the Preferred Stock for such fiscal year shall have been actually paid or provided and set apart. * * *"

Seven per cent. dividends were paid on the preferred stock to and including July 1, 1932. Since that time the following dividends on the preferred stock have been paid or declared:

4%—paid April 20, 1937, out of surplus net profits for 1937.
2½%—paid April 23, 1938, out of surplus net profits for 1938.
1¾%—paid on April 19, 1941, representing 19¢ per share of surplus net profits for 1937, and 10¢ per share out of the surplus net profits for 1938, and $1.46 per share out of the surplus net profits for 1941.
1¾%—paid July 7, 1941, out of the surplus net profits for 1941.
2.04%—declared July 7, 1941, out of the surplus net profits for 1941, payable August 29, 1941.
1¾%—declared July 10, 1941, out of the surplus net profits for 1941, payable October 1, 1941.

The directors of the defendant apparently intended to exhaust the net earnings of the company for the years 1937 and 1938 by the payment of the dividends mentioned for those years. However, they underestimated the profits for those years and declared a dividend on the preferred stock of 29¢ a share for the year 1941 to cover the difference.

On July 10, 1941, the directors declared a dividend of $1 per share on the common stock, one-half of which was payable from its "Reserve for Dividends on the Common Capital Stock, to be paid when and as declared by the Board of Directors", and the other half from the surplus net profits accumulated prior to April 30, 1941, which remained after the payment of the 1941 preferred stock dividends.

Complainant alleges that the surplus net profits for the fiscal year 1936 were more than $3,500,000 or more than seven per cent. per share on the preferred stock. No dividend was either declared or paid for that year. It is alleged that the surplus net profits for the year 1938 were more than $1,125,000 which would be at the rate of at least $3.89 per share on the preferred stock. The total dividends declared for 1938 were $2.60 per share. Complainant, therefore, contends that since no dividends were paid on the preferred stock for the year 1936 and since only a part of the dividends were paid on the preferred stock for 1938 the directors of the defendant should be restrained from paying any dividends on the common stock from funds which are properly surplus net profits for either of said years.

Defendant, by its answer, alleges that there were no surplus net profits for the year 1936 and that the surplus net profits for the year 1938 did not exceed the dividends paid on the preferred stock for that year.

Therefore, the question to be determined is what were the surplus net profits for the years 1936 and 1938. Defendant contends that in determining the net profits for dividend purposes it may compute its earnings on a consolidated basis; that is that in addition to the earnings or losses of the parent company it may add or subtract the respective earnings or losses of the subsidiaries owned by it. On the other hand complainant contends that the earnings should be determined on a non-consolidated basis. To illustrate the earnings from the defendant and its subsidiaries, it appears that in 1936 the parent company had a deficit of $1,304,662.16. The dividends from subsidiaries were $4,860,200. The earnings of subsidiaries were $722,146.72. This left the deficit of the consolidated earnings of the parent company and its subsidiaries of $582,515.44. For the year 1938, calculated on the same basis, the parent company and its subsidiaries had consolidated earnings of $753,407.44. It is, therefore, apparent that the consolidated earnings when the dividends from the subsidiary companies are not accounted for, is vastly different from the result which is reached when such dividends are considered a part of the net profits of the defendant company.

The defendant says that the dividends received from the subsidiaries, which it owns, do not constitute a profit to it because the parent company was not enriched thereby. Defendant says that the dividends paid to it by the subsidiaries for the years 1936 and 1938 exceeded the earnings of the subsidiaries for the years in which the dividends were declared and that they were paid out of earnings of previous years. The defendant bases its argument on a false premise. It contends that separate corporations wholly owned by a parent company and directed by it in law are and should be considered subdivisions or departments of the parent company. In other words, defendant contends that the parent company and the subsidiaries referred to compromise one unit or enterprise. To substantiate this contention, counsel cites several cases. The first case cited is that of the North Jersey Title Ins. Co. v. Commissioner, 3 Cir., 84 F.2d 898. In that case the court disregarded the separate corporate identities in order to avoid an injustice.

The next case is Rippel v. Kaplus, 124 N.J.Eq. 303, 1 A.2d 883, 884. In the Rippel case a subsidiary corporation opposed the confirmation of a sheriff's sale on the ground that it lacked financial resources to protect itself. This court disregarded the corporate identity and held that the parent company for its own purposes had prevented the subsidiary from raising funds to pay its debts and that, therefore, the petitioner was not a distressed debtor. Counsel quotes from the opinion in the above cases as follows:

"While one company's ownership of shares of the capital stock of another does not necessarily create an identity of corporate interests between the two, 'yet where such ownership of stock is resorted to not for the purposes of participating in the affairs of the corporation in which it is held in a manner normal and usual with stockholders, but for the purpose of making it a mere agent, or instrumentality or department of another company, the courts will look through the forms to the realities of the relation between the companies as if the corporate agency did not exist and will deal with them as the justice of the case may require.' United States v. Reading Co., 253 U.S. 26, 40 S.Ct. 425, 434, 64 L.Ed. 760. This rule has been followed in New Jersey. Ross v. Pennsylvania Railroad Co., 106 N.J.L. 536, 148 A. 741; Stockton v. Central Railroad Co., 50 N.J.Eq. 52, 73, 24 A. 964, 17 L.R.A. 97. Chancellor McGill, in the last case, regarded the rule as an application of the doctrine, 'Equity looks at the substance, not merely the outward form' * * * and he quoted Morawetz on Corporations, sec. 227: 'The statement that a corporation is an artificial entity, apart from its members is merely a description, in figurative language, of a corporation viewed as a collective body. A corporation is really an association of persons, and no judicial dictum or legislative enactment can alter this fact.' "

The opinion does not sustain the contention of the defendant. In the case of United States v. Reading Co., therein referred to, the court disregarded the separate identities in order to prevent the consummation of a monopoly. In the case of Stockton v. Central Railroad Co., also referred to in the Rippel opinion, the court disregarded the form in order to prevent a fraudulent attempt to circumvent a statutory restriction against monopoly. In the case of Ross v. Pennsylvania Railroad Co. [106 N.J.L. 536, 148 A. 742], the Court of Errors and Appeals said:

"We agree that ownership alone of capital stock in one corporation by another, does not create any relationship by reason of which the stockholding company would be liable for torts of the other * * *."

The case did not turn on the question of control by one corporation over another by reason of stock ownership. The situation in the case was that the word "Pennsylvania" was painted on the tender of an engine and the cars and the crew wore uniforms bearing the initials "P.R.R.". The question presented to the jury was whether the Pennsylvania Railroad Company or the West Jersey Railroad Company, the subsidiary, operated and controlled the train. The court said:

"Where a corporation holds stock of another, not for the purpose of participating in the affairs of the other corporation, in the normal and usual manner, but for the purpose of control, so that the subsidiary company may be used as a mere agency or instrumentality for the stockholding company, such company will be liable for injuries due to the negligence of the subsidiary, and the mere fact that an accident is caused by the negligence of persons in the employ of the subsidiary will not relieve the dominant company of responsibility." * * *

There is a real distinction between a corporation and its stockholders. The corporate identity will be disregarded in equity only when it is necessary to do so in order to prevent fraud, deception, evasion or injustice. In such an event "Equity regards the substance and not the form". This rule was laid down recently in the case of Schmid v. First Camden Nat. Bank & Trust Co., 130 N.J.Eq. 254, 22 A.2d 246. Defendant's contention that separate corporate identities of wholly owned subsidiaries must always be regarded as mere departments or divisions of the parent company, is not supported by the cases.

Defendant submitted affidavits of several certified public accountants to the effect that the only proper method of computing the earnings of the parent company and its subsidiaries is on a consolidated basis. Complainant, on the other hand, submitted affidavits of certified public accountants denying this contention. The fact is that the accounts of the parent company and those of the subsidiaries are kept separately. The consolidated account is made solely for the purpose of the annual report of the stockholders upon which the bases for the dividends are determined. Under such circumstances the defendant company must be considered a separate and distinct entity for the purpose of fixing dividends and the earnings and profits of the subsidiary companies do not enure to the benefit of defendant's stockholders until dividends are actually declared by its subsidiaries.

Defendant's brief suggests that there may be laches or an estoppel present in the institution of this action. The contention is that defendant has for many years presented consolidated reports to its stockholders which have never been questioned. There is nothing in the record, however, which establishes that the same conditions existed in previous years as existed in the years 1936 and 1938. This contention therefore falls.

The resolution of July 10, 1941, declaring a dividend on the common stock, directed that one-half of the dividend be paid from the account entitled, "Reserve for Dividends on Common Capital Stock to be paid when and as directed by the Board of Directors". The account referred to in said resolution was set up about the year 1908. Various additions and deductions were made thereto and therefrom until in July, 1941, it amounted to approximately $3,000,000. Defendant contends that because this reserve was created from profits earned during years when full dividends were paid on the preferred stock, that the whole reserve is now available for payment of dividends on the common stock even though dividends on the preferred stock were not paid for the years 1936 and 1938. This reserve account was a mere bookkeeping entry which set up therein a portion of earned surplus and did not separate funds of the company from its general assets. The secretary of the defendant company, in his affidavit, states that, "* * * the reserve above set out is in reality a part of the earned surplus, having been reserved out of the surplus net profits, although not treated as such on the respective balance sheets".

Defendant admits that where non-cumulative preferred stock has not been allotted the full dividend to which it is entitled in any one year and the corporation for that year has earned more than the dividend paid to the preferred stockholders, the preferred stock is entitled to have allotted to it such withheld earnings to the extent of its priority before dividends are paid to common stockholders. * * *

I, therefore, conclude that the restraint should be made permanent. The preferred stockholders are entitled to receive the surplus net profits for the years 1936 and 1938 not to exceed seven per cent. of the amount of the preferred stock before any dividends are paid on common stock from the reserve account to such extent, however, as the reserve is made up from the surplus net profits for the years 1936 and 1938. The surplus net profits for the year 1938, which consisted of the earnings of the defendant plus the dividends received from its subsidiaries, amount to over $1,125,000. Dividends of $2.60 on the preferred stock have been declared and paid based on the above surplus net profits. The rate, however, based on $1,125,000 would be at least $3.89 per share. Therefore, the common stock dividend voted last July should not be paid until the deficiency is provided for.

The same situation exists for the year 1936 for which year, however, there is a disagreement as to whether there was a profit or loss. The parent company shows a loss in its own operation before the receipt of dividends from its subsidiaries. It is claimed that part of the dividend paid by the American Car and Foundry Securities Company (now known as the American Car and Foundry Investment Corporation) was represented by promissory notes of the American Car and Foundry Motors Company. Defendant claims that the notes are not worth their face value for the reason that the American Car and Foundry Motors Company was insolvent at the time it declared the dividend. The parent company, however, holds the notes the principal of which has not been paid although it has received interest thereon. There is not sufficient proof before me to determine the question.

I will refer this matter to a special master as suggested by the defendant for the purpose of determining the facts relative to same.[17a]

3. PARTICIPATING PREFERRED STOCK

LOCKWOOD v. GENERAL ABRASIVE COMPANY.

Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Division, Fourth Department, 1924
210 App.Div. 141, 205 N.Y.S. 511.

Appeal by defendant, General Abrasive Company, from a judgment by the Supreme Court in favor of plaintiffs, upon the decision of the court rendered after a trial at Erie Special Term.

CLARK, J. This action was brought for a declaratory judgment. (See Civil Practice Act, § 473; Rules Civil Practice rule 210 et seq.) The controversy is between the common and preferred stockholders of the General Abrasive Company, a domestic corporation.

The certificate of incorporation of the company is the contract between the two classes of stockholders, and their rights must be determined by the language of that instrument. Roberts v. Roberts-Wicks Co., 184 N.Y. 257, 77 N.E. 13, 3 L.R.A.,N.S., 1034, 112 Am.St. Rep. 607, 6 Ann.Cas. 213.

The real question to be determined here is: Are the common stockholders entitled to cumulative dividends? If they are, the authority to pay them must be found in the certificate of incorporation.

We may not read into that instrument words which it does not contain.

The dispute here is over the distribution of dividends. The defendant company proposes to distribute its surplus profits for the year 1923 by paying a seven per cent. dividend to owners of preferred stock and seven per cent. to owners of the common stock, and the remainder, if any, between the owners of the two classes of stock, in the ratio of their respective shares.

Plaintiffs contend that the provisions of the certificate of incorporation will not permit distribution of surplus earnings in this way. They contend that seven per cent. should be paid on the preferred stock and seven per cent. on the common stock and the remainder of the surplus to be applied in payments of dividends in arrears on the common stock, and after that is done the remainder, if any, to be distributed ratably between the holders of the preferred stock and the holders of the common stock.

[17a] Aff'd, 132 N.J.Eq. 460, 28 A.2d 531, 1942.

Defendant claims that after seven per cent. has been paid to the owners of the preferred stock and a like amount to the owners of the common stock, the remainder of the surplus should be divided pro rata between the holders of the preferred and the holders of the common stock, without first paying to the owners of the common stock amounts that would have been paid in former years if the surplus earnings in those years had justified it.

The learned court below was of the opinion that after the payment of seven dollars per share on the preferred stock, and seven dollars per share on the common stock, the common stockholders were next entitled to a payment of thirty-one per cent. on their shares to make up for dividends not earned or paid in former years, and that the surplus, if any, should be divided equally between the preferred and common shareholders.

I think the learned court adopted an erroneous construction of the certificate of incorporation with reference to dividends.

The clauses of the certificate of incorporation affecting the right of stockholders to dividends are as follows:

"Fourth. Dividends upon the preferred stock of the company at the rate of seven per centum (7%) per annum, cumulative after July first, one thousand nine hundred and sixteen, may be declared and paid out of the surplus profits, and no dividend in excess thereof shall be declared upon said preferred stock until dividends at the rate of seven dollars ($7.00) per annum shall have been declared and paid upon each share of the common stock.

"Whenever, after the declaration or payment of all accumulated dividends upon the preferred stock, any surplus profits shall remain, the same may be paid in dividends declared upon the common stock of the company up to the amount at the rate of seven dollars ($7.00) per annum upon each share of the common stock. Any surplus profits over and above said cumulative dividends upon preferred stock, and seven dollars ($7.00) per share per annum upon the common stock, may be paid in dividends in equal amounts upon each share of preferred stock and upon each share of common stock of the company."

It will be noticed that the certificate expressly provides that dividends upon the preferred stock shall be cumulative after July 1, 1916.

There is nothing in the certificate which says that the common stock shall be entitled to cumulative dividends, and inasmuch as the certificate is the contract between the shareholders, it must be presumed that it represented what they intended at the time of its execution, and we may not read into the instrument words which were not used and evidently not intended to be used when the certificate was made and executed.

The words of the certificate must be given their usual and ordinary meaning, and when it says that owners of common stock, after the declaration or payment of all accumulated dividends upon the preferred stock, may be paid dividends on common stock at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, it meant that they were to be paid such dividends yearly, or by the year, dividends that were earned and paid in any particular year, but that they could not out of a present surplus be paid dividends for former years which had never been declared or earned.

A cumulative dividend is one "With regard to which it is agreed that if at any time it is not paid in full the difference shall be added to the following payment." Cent.Dict. "A dividend * * * which is not paid or received when due is added to what is to be paid in the future." Webster Internat.Dict. The idea being that arrearages of one year are payable out of the surplus earnings for subsequent years.

No such dividend distribution was contemplated by the certificate of incorporation in the instant case. If it had been the intention of the incorporators that the owners of common stock should be entitled to cumulative dividends it is fair to assume that they would have provided for such payments in so many words in the certificate of incorporation, as they did with reference to cumulative dividends for the preferred shareholders. If there were not profits to be divided in any year after making payments to preferred stockholders in accordance with the terms of the certificate of incorporation, they were lost forever, for each new year would mark the beginning of a new dividend period. Englander v. Osborne, 261 Pa. 366, 104 A. 614, 6 A.L.R. 800. Michael v. Cayey-Caguas Tobacco Co., 190 App.Div. 618, 180 N.Y.S. 532.

There is no justification for holding that the owners of the common stock are entitled to go back of the current year and claim to be reimbursed for unearned dividends of former years. To do so would make dividends cumulative in behalf of the owners of the common stock, and that was not expressed or contemplated by the certificate of incorporation.

In the absence of an agreement, expressed or implied, that dividends shall be cumulative, unpaid dividends in the past cannot be claimed. 10 Cyc. 573; 14 C.J. 421.[18]

Since the incorporation of defendant company in 1916 the preferred stockholders have received dividends amounting to forty-five and one-half per cent. That would be seven per cent. per annum. The common stockholders have received dividends amounting to fourteen and one-half per cent. The reason that the holders of the common stock did not receive larger returns in years gone by is because the dividends were not earned and declared.

If the certificate of incorporation had provided in terms that they were to receive cumulative dividends, as it did in the case of the owners of preferred stock, plaintiffs' position here would be unassailable, but in the absence of such provision in the certificate, to say that the owners of common stock are entitled to cumulative dividends, is to put a construction upon the certificates which, to my mind, would be unjustified.

The owners of the common stock, after provision was made for payment of dividends to the owners of the preferred stock, were entitled to seven per cent. per annum if it was earned in any one year, but I can see no justification in the language of the certificate itself for holding that out of the surplus earnings of 1923 the common stockholders have a preferential right to be paid dividends not earned and declared in former years so as to make their dividend payments since the organization of the company correspond with the payments that have been made to preferred stockholders. To adopt plaintiffs' theory would be to make the owners of common stock actually preferred stockholders, and that was not within the contemplation of the parties who organized the company.

18 To the effect that preferred stock is cumulative if not otherwise specified, see, 1938, 36 Mich.L.Rev. 1384.

The judgment should be modified by providing that any dividends in excess of cumulative dividends of seven per cent. upon the preferred stock of the defendant company, and seven percent. per share upon the common stock of defendant in any year shall be paid in equal amounts upon each share of preferred and common stock and as so modified the judgment should be affirmed, without costs of this appeal to either party.

The first conclusion of law is disapproved and reversed.

HUBBS, P. J., and DAVIS, J., concur; SEARS and CROUCH, JJ., dissent and vote for affirmance.

Judgment modified * * * any dividend in excess of cumulative dividends of 7% upon the preferred stock of defendant company, and 7% per share upon the common stock of defendant in any year shall be paid in equal amounts upon each share of preferred and common stock, and as so modified, judgment affirmed.[19]

McGAHAN v. UNITED ENGINEERING CORPORATION, Incorporated.

Court of Chancery of New Jersey, 1935. 118 N.J.Eq. 410, 180 A. 195.

Bill by George B. McGahan against the United Engineering Corporation, Incorporated.

Decree in accordance with opinion.

BUCHANAN, VICE CHANCELLOR. The defendant is a manufacturing corporation organized under the General Corporation Act of this state, in 1926 (2 Comp.St.1910, p. 1595, et seq., § 1 et seq., as amended). Its original certificate of incorporation provided for a capital stock of $125,000, divided into 25,000 shares of the par value of $5 each. By an amendment in 1928 its capital stock was increased to $500,000. The amendment (paragraph fourth) reads as follows: "Fourth. The total authorized capital stock of this corporation is Five Hundred Thousand ($500,000.) Dollars divided into Sixty-two Thousand Five Hundred (62,500) shares and the shares of this corporation are divided into two distinct classes of stock as follows: Twenty-five Thousand (25,000) shares of voting Class 'A' fully participating stock at Five ($5.00) Dollars per share, and Thirty-seven Thousand Five Hundred (37,500) shares Class 'A' non-voting fully participating stock at Ten ($10.00) Dollars per share."

Subsequently defendant sold and issued 21,700 shares of the class A nonvoting stock, for the par value of $217,000. In July, 1934, there were issued and outstanding 22,600 shares of the class A voting stock and 21,700 of the class A nonvoting stock (both classes, for some reason, were designated "class A").

19 Aff'd without opinion, 240 N.Y. 592, 148 N.E. 719, 1925.

At that time the board of directors adopted a resolution to further amend paragraph fourth of the certificate of incorporation, and subsequently filed a certificate of such amendment; which amendment made paragraph fourth read as follows: "4th. The total authorized capital stock of this corporation is Five Hundred Thousand Dollars, ($500,000.), consisting of one hundred thousand shares, and the shares of this corporation shall be divided into two distinct classes, as follows: twenty-five thousand shares of voting Class 'A' fully participating stock at par value of Five Dollars ($5.00) per share, and seventy-five thousand shares of stock non-voting Class 'A' fully participating shares of stock at the par value of Five Dollars ($5.00) per share. The present stockholders of record shall be given the right to exchange their present holdings of Class 'A' fully participating non-voting stock, share for share, for the new class fully participating Class 'A' non-voting stock."

Thereafter the defendant company took $108,500 from the capital stock account of the nonvoting stock and transferred it to the capital surplus account of the company; notified the holders of the nonvoting stock that it was "necessary" for them to surrender their certificates of $10 par stock and receive instead an equal number of shares of $5 par stock; and declared a dividend of 25 cents per share on all the stock—valuing the nonvoting stock at $5 per share, the same as the voting stock.

Complainant, the holder of 185 shares of the nonvoting stock, thereupon filed his bill of complaint herein, setting forth the foregoing facts, and also the further facts that no publication was made, as required by the statute, of the reduction of capital stock, and that no vote was had, nor any opportunity to vote, by the holders of the nonvoting stock, on the proposed reduction. The bill charges that the attempted reduction of the nonvoting stock to the par value of $5 per share is unlawful and void; that it is a wrongful taking of property and rights from the holders of the nonvoting stock; and that the declaration and payment of a dividend of an equal amount per share to the voting stock ($5 par) and the nonvoting stock ($10 par) wrongfully deprives the holders of the nonvoting stock of the share in the earnings to which they are entitled.

The bill prays that the aforesaid acts of the defendant be set aside as null and void, and that the defendant be restrained from reducing its capital stock in that manner and from paying any dividend other than on the basis that the amount payable on each share of the nonvoting ($10 par) stock shall be twice as much as that payable on each share of the voting ($5 par) stock. * * *

The contention of defendant is that "shares are shares," so to speak; that all shares must be equal if there is no specific provision making them of unequal value, and that the provisions as to the par value in the two respective classes does not make the shares in the two classes unequal; that the actual capital of a corporation is not the aggregate of the number of shares multiplied by the par value, but may be more or less—instancing corporations with shares of "no par value."

The answer to that contention is that we are not dealing here with a corporation whose certificate provides for shares of no par value, and this case must be determined by its own particular facts and circumstances. Where corporations have stock of "no par value," that stock is common stock, and the shares of that common stock are of course all of equal value; but the preferred stock is dealt with separately, and the value and priority of payment in respect thereof, both as to dividends and distributive value on dissolution, are specifically provided for.

In the instant case, the certificate of incorporation does not say that the shares are all to be of equal value. It says "the capital stock shall be $500,000 divided into 62,500 shares," and immediately goes on to say that those shares shall be divided into two distinct classes, "25,000 shares at $5.00 per share and 37,500 shares at $10.00 per share." From this it would seem to follow as a natural, if not indeed a necessary, inference that the entire 62,500 were not intended to be all of equal value, but that 37,500 of them were intended to be each of a value twice as great as that of each of the other 25,000 shares. No other conceivable explanation occurs, consonant with the fixing of the price of the nonvoting shares twice as great as that of the voting shares. (If the price had been fixed conversely, $10 for the voting shares and $5 for the nonvoting shares, defendant's argument would be much more rationally acceptable.) * * *

Clearly then there is nothing to prevent or prohibit a corporation from dividing its capital stock into divisions or shares which are not all equal each to the other—from dividing it into shares some of which have rights or interests in the net assets and in the earnings twice as great as the rights or interests of the remaining shares.

As has already been shown, this corporation did, by its certificate of incorporation (amendment of 1928), divide its stock into two classes; one class consisting of 25,000 shares, of the par value of $5 each and having voting rights; and the other class consisting of 37,500 shares, of the par value of $10 each, but having no voting rights. The aggregate shares in these two classes totals 62,500, which is the total specified authorized number of shares; and the aggregate par value thereof, at the respective par value rates, totals the total, specified, authorized capital. The 25,000 shares at $5 each aggregate $125,000, which is 1/4 of the total capital of $500,000; and the 37,500 shares at $10 each aggregate $375,000, which is the other 3/4 of the total capital. The result is that each $5 share represents a fraction or interest of 1/25000 of 1/4, or 1/100000, of the total capital or net assets; and each $10 share represents a fraction or interest of 1/37500 of 3/4 or 1/50000, or 2/100000, of the total capital or net assets.

In other words, one-quarter ($125,000) of the total capital has been divided into 25,000 shares, each of which is therefore 1/100000 of the total capital; and the remaining three-quarters ($375,000) of the total capital has been divided into 37,500 shares each of which is therefore 2/100000 or 1/50000 of the total capital. And these respective shares or fractional interests in the authorized capital stock must needs continue to be the same thereafter, in the actual capital or net assets of the corporation, as that may vary from time to time by way of increase or decrease.

Now with respect to the profits earned upon the capital stock, and distributed in dividends, there is no dispute between the present parties as to the principle that there can be no discrimination between stockholders. All stockholders—at least all in the same class—must be treated alike; each stockholder is entitled to share in the dividend in proportion to the amount of his holdings. 14 C.J. p. 813, par. 1236; p. 817, par. 1240.

Defendant, however, says that this principle means that each stockholder must share in the dividend in proportion to the number of shares of stock held by him, irrespective of the difference in the fractional interest in the capital stock of the corporation represented by one share as compared with another, and regardless of the fact that the certificate of incorporation contains no such provision. With that contention this court cannot agree.

If this corporation had only one class of stock, or if all of its stock were divided into shares each of which represented the same fractional interest in the capital as each of the others, and there was no provision in the certificate of incorporation entitling a share in one class to a different amount of the profits or dividend than that of a share in the other class, then each stockholder would be entitled to dividends in proportion to the number of shares held by him.

This corporation, however, has divided its capital into shares of two different classes, and in the one class (the nonvoting stock), each share represents a fractional interest in the capital twice as great as the interest represented by each share of the other class (the voting stock).

It would have been possible, and legal, for the corporation to have provided in its certificate of incorporation that each share in both classes alike should share equally with each other share, regardless of its class, in any distribution of profits or dividends. This, however, it did not do, either specifically or by implication. The presumption, or conclusion, must be, therefore, that each share is entitled to share equally with all other shares, in the profits or dividends, in proportion to the fractional interests in the capital represented by the respective shares—and this on the principle that equality is equity.

Section 47 of the statute (2 Comp.St.1910, p. 1629, § 47) requires each corporation (in the absence of provision to the contrary in the certificate of incorporation) to declare and pay to and among its stockholders in January of each year "a dividend * * * of the whole of its accumulated profits" (over and above such sum as may have been fixed and set aside as working capital). Neither in this section, nor in any other provision of the statute, is there expressly set forth the method of computation of such dividend.

All surplus assets or accumulated profits, however, are obviously, prior to the setting apart or declaration of a dividend, simply a part of the capital assets or principal of the corporation. As has already been said, the respective share or fractional interest (of the holder of any particular share of stock), in the total, net, corporate capital assets remains the same whether those net assets increase or decrease. The fractional interest in the profits, prior to declaration of a dividend, to which the holder of a share of stock is entitled, is therefore the same fraction as his fractional interest in the original capital stock. Clearly that fraction is not changed by the mere declaration of a dividend; there being no provision in the certificate of incorporation, nor in the statute, for any such change.

Quite the contrary is the implication to be gathered from section 86 of the statute (2 Comp.St.1910, p. 1652, § 86). That section provides that in a distribution of the assets of an insolvent corporation—i. e., a corporation which has lost money instead of making profits—the surplus funds, after payment of the corporation's creditors (and preferred stockholders, if any), shall be divided among the stockholders "proportionally, according to their respective shares." This latter must, of course, mean "in proportion to the respective fractional interests owned by them in the corporation's capital." The result is that each share of stock bears the same fraction of the total losses of the company as the fraction of the total capital of the company which it originally represented.

If the losses are to be borne in this proportion, then equitably the profits should be shared in like manner; there being no provision otherwise either in the statute or the certificate of incorporation.

The presumption must be, in the absence of any other agreement or legal requirement, that the stockholders will be entitled to share in the profits in proportion to the amounts respectively contributed by them to the capital. If, in the present instance, the entire corporate capital of $500,000 had been divided into only three shares, one of $250,000 and the other two of $125,000 each, the result might perhaps be a little more readily apparent, but the principle would be exactly the same.

It is concluded therefore that the dividend declared in 1934, if it is to be paid at all, must be adjusted so as to provide for payment of dividends on the respective shares in proportion to the respective fractional interest of the capital represented by the respective shares, for the payment of an amount on each share of nonvoting stock twice as great as the amount payable on each share of voting stock; and defendant will be enjoined from the payment of any dividend on any other basis.

The expression above, "if it is to be paid at all," is occasioned by the fact that it seems to appear on the record that this dividend was declared out of the surplus created by the illegal reduction of the value of the non-voting shares. If there is no other surplus out of which this dividend can be paid, obviously it cannot legally be paid at all. Moreover, it may be that in the judgment of the directors, no dividend should be paid at this time, in view of the setting aside of this "surplus" and the resultant condition of the corporation as to surplus and undivided profits. It would seem that the decree probably should be framed only to restrain the payment of dividends on any other basis than that herein adjudicated.

(a) Liquidation Rights Conferred by Preferred Stock Contracts

CONTINENTAL INSURANCE COMPANY v. UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1922.
259 U.S. 156, 42 S.Ct. 540, 66 L.Ed. 871.

[Facts: The Reading Co. was a holding company owning the entire capital stock of the Reading Railway Co., and $20,000,000 of its bonds, the entire capital stock of the Reading Coal Co., a majority of stock in the New Jersey Railroad Company.

[The United States sued to dissolve the relation existing between the Reading Co., and its subsidiaries, as a combination to restrain interstate commerce in anthracite coal, and as a violation of the Commodities Clause of the Act of 1906, c. 3591, 34 Stat. 585.[20]

[The decree of the court, provided that the stockholders of the Reading Co. should be furnished, at a cost of $2 each, certificates of interest, in the new Coal Co., to be formed by the court's order, to take over the property and business of the Reading Coal Co. Stockholders were required to sell, either these certificates of interest, or their stock in the Reading Co.

[The appeals in this case were taken by the Insurance Companies, who own 8,400 shares of the common stock of the Reading Company, less than one per cent. of the entire common stock, and by the so-called Prosser Committee, also interveners, who represent 407,728 shares of the common stock, which is somewhat less than 30 per cent. of the total common stock, and less than 15 per cent. of the entire capital stock of the company. Their appeals are based on the claim that the right to subscribe for the certificates of interest in the stock of the new Coal Company belong to the common stockholders of the Reading Company and to them alone, to the exclusion of the preferred stockholders.]

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE TAFT delivered the opinion of the court: * * *

We come now to the issue upon which these appeals were brought here. It concerns the respective rights of the common stockholders and the preferred stockholders in the assets of the Reading Company. They all, under the plan, will receive the benefit of the difference between the real value of the privilege of disposing of their distributive certificates of interest in stock in the new Coal Company, and the payment of $2, or such other sum as may be fixed, per share held by them of the Reading Company stock. Such difference has already been the subject of sale and quotation on the market in New York, and has varied from $11 to $20. This might have been expected, in view of the disparity between par of the capital stock of the Reading Coal Company and the far greater actual value of its properties. The disparity shows that while the transfer of certificates of interest in the new Coal Company stock is denominated a sale, it is only a distribution of the surplus or assets of the Reading Company to its stockholders, made necessary by the decree of this court in taking the Reading Company out of the coal business and restricting it to that of owning and operating a railroad system. The Reading Company, by merger with the Reading Railway Company, is made to change its character. Under the plan it must comply with the Act of Pennsylvania May 3, 1909, P.L. 408, 15 P.S. § 421 et seq., by which, in merging with the Reading Railway Company, it becomes a new corporation. Pennsylvania Utilities Co. v. Public Service Commission, 69 Pa. Super.Ct. 612; Lauman v. Lebanon Valley R. Co., 30 Pa. 42, 45, 72 Am.Dec. 685; Clearwater v. Meredith (Ferguson v. Meredith), 1 Wall. 25, 17 L.Ed. 604; Atlantic & G. R. Co. v. Georgia, 98 U.S. 359, 25 L.Ed. 185; Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Adams, 180 U.S. 1, 21 S.Ct. 240, 45 L.Ed. 395; Shields v. Ohio, 95 U.S. 319, 24 L.Ed. 357.

[20] See, supra, f. n. 18, p. 457.

What is to be done is, in fact and law, a liquidation of the assets of the old Reading Company. Its stockholders receive their distribution in kind by retention of the stock they held in the old Reading Company as stock in the reduced new Reading Company, purged of its offense against the law, together with the distributive values of that which the old Reading Company has been compelled to get rid of; i. e., the ownership of the stock of the Coal Company. The distribution of certificates of interest in the new Coal Company shares was evidently given the form of a sale to enable the new Reading Company to realize out of it $5,600,000 in cash, to give it additional working capital enough properly to operate the Reading Railway System. But this does not change its real nature as a mere distribution of forbidden assets in kind to stockholders.

The rights of the common and preferred stockholders of the Reading Company inter sese are to be determined by the organization agreement of 1896. At that time, under a special charter of a corporation known as the Excelsior Enterprise Company, granted by the Pennsylvania legislature in 1871, the Reading Company, by change of name, came into being. The capital stock was increased to $140,000,000, divided into 2,800,000 shares of the par value of $50 each. Half of these were preferred, $28,000,000 first preferred, and $42,000,000 second preferred. The other half, or $70,000,000, were common, and the rights of the preferred and common stock were fixed by agreement. Each share of stock, whether common or preferred, had a vote. The agreement provided that the preferred stock should be entitled to noncumulative dividends "at the rate of, but not exceeding, 4 per cent. per annum, in each and every fiscal year, in preference and priority to any payment in or for such fiscal year, of any dividend on other stock; but only from undivided net profits of the company when and as determined by the board of directors, and only if and when the board shall declare dividends therefrom. If, after providing for the payment of full dividends for any fiscal year on the first preferred stock, there shall remain any surplus undivided net profits, the board, out of such surplus, may declare and pay dividends for such year upon the second preferred stock. If, from the business of any particular fiscal year, excluding undivided net profits remaining from previous years, after providing out of the net profits of such particular fiscal year for the payment of the full dividends for such fiscal year on the first and second preferred stock, there shall remain surplus net profits, the board of directors may declare, and out of such surplus net profits of such year may pay, dividends upon any other stock of the company. But no dividends shall in any year be paid upon any such other stock out of net profits of any previous fiscal year in which the full dividends shall not have been paid on the first and second preferred stock."

The company was given the right at any time to redeem either or both classes of its preferred stock at par in cash, if such redemption should then be allowed by law, and after payment of dividends of 4 per cent. for two successive years on the first preferred stock, to convert the second preferred stock, not exceeding $42,000,000, par value, one-half into first preferred stock, and one-half into common stock, and to increase its first preferred and common stock to the extent necessary to effect such conversion. The company never exercised the right to convert or redeem the preferred stock.

It will be observed that the preferred stock and the common stock, with 1,400,000 shares of each, were thus given an equality of voting power which could not be changed without the consent of the company, and that it has not been changed, either by conversion or redemption. This would seem to have been designed to preserve an equilibrium of control in which reasonable dividends out of profits, when they accrued in sufficient amount, would be voted to the common stockholders, on the one hand, and proper additions would be made out of earnings to the capital of the company to increase its future profit-earning capacity and create a greater security for a constant payment of dividends to preferred stockholders. Of course, there would not be block voting of the two classes of stock, but the division did tend to secure a fair representation of both interests in the board of directors.

The effect of the agreement as to dividends upon the preferred and common stock seems to us clear. It emphasizes that dividends are to be paid only out of undivided profits, and when and as determined by the board of directors, and only if and when the board shall declare them. It leaves to the board to determine, in its discretion, whether the undivided profits shall be put in surplus working capital or in dividends. The limitations on the discretion of the board are that the first and second preferred cannot receive more than 4 per cent. in any fiscal year, and that neither the second preferred nor the common stock can receive any dividend until the first preferred dividend has been paid in full each year, and the common stock receives nothing until the second preferred dividend is thus paid. The words describing the condition upon which the power of the board to declare dividends on the common stock can be exercised show that each year's profits are to be considered by themselves in the distribution of dividends between the stock.

Appellants, however, rely on the final words of the clause to show that it is intended that net profits in any past year can be thereafter allowed to the common stock if, in that past year, the preferred stock had been paid full dividends. We do not find it necessary to decide that the board of directors has not such power; but, if so, the power is not one the exercise of which can be compelled in the absence of fraud or breach of trust. The failure of the board to exercise it, and the application of the earnings to surplus, determine such earnings to be assets as of the time of the compulsory winding up and liquidation of the corporation. The power to declare dividends not exercised can have no more effect upon the rights of the preferred stockholders to share in the existing assets of the corporation when liquidated than the failure of the company to convert preferred stock into common, or to redeem the preferred stock at par. The proper interpretation of the agreement is that, after the declaration of dividends for any current year, the undivided earnings are to be regarded as capital assets, and to be distributed on liquidation, unless the board of directors has meantime applied them as dividends. If the argument of appellants were carried to its logical result, all the net earnings of the Reading Company in twenty years, no matter how invested or applied to increasing the earning capital, must, in a liquidation, be treated as undistributed profits, to go entirely to the common stock without any action of the board of directors. This is impossible.

The record discloses that in 1904, when the Reading Company made its application to the New York Stock Exchange to have its stock listed, it contained the following statement:

"The preferred and common stock have equal voting power, and, in liquidation or dissolution of the corporation, will share equally in pro rata distribution of assets."

Coming, as this must have come, from the representatives of both the preferred and common stockholders, it is significant evidence of what they then thought of their respective rights, and has the additional weight of a representation to future purchasers of the two classes of stock as to the kind of interests they were buying in the company.

Our conclusion that the claim on behalf of the common stockholders is invalid is based on the construction of the words of the agreement itself, and hardly needs authority to sustain it. It is, however, in accord with the general common-law rule that stockholders, common and preferred, share alike in the assets of a liquidating corporation, if the preference is only as to dividends. * * * This is the rule in Pennsylvania. North American Min. Co. v. Clarke, 40 Pa. 432. The cases in which a different conclusion has been reached are where the contract or law determining the rights of the preferred stockholders has an express or clearly implied restriction as to the share which they may take in the assets on liquidation. Niles v. Ludlow Valve Mfg. Co., D.C., 196 F. 994; Russell v. American Gas & Electric Co., 152 App.Div. 136, 136 N.Y.S. 602.

The decree of the District Court is affirmed, with modifications already indicated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings in conformity to this opinion.[21]

OTIS & CO. v. SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1945. 323 U.S. 624, 65 S.Ct. 483.

Proceeding in the matter of the application of the Securities and Exchange Commission to enforce and carry out a plan for liquidation of the United Light & Power Company under the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935, 15 U.S.C.A. § 79 et seq., wherein Otis & Company, a preferred stockholder, intervened. To review a judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals, 142 F.2d 411, which affirmed a judgment of the District Court, 51 F.Supp. 217, granting the application, Otis & Company brings certiorari.

Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE REED delivered the opinion of the Court.

An important although narrow legal point in the interpretation of the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935 is involved in this case. This is whether a plan under section 11(e) of that act may be "fair and equitable" to preferred stockholders within the meaning of those words as used in that section, which allows a participation by junior common stockholders in the distribution of the assets of a registered holding company, which is liquidated in compliance with section 11(b) (2), before the senior preferred stockholders receive securities whose present value equals the preferred's full liquidation preferences.

The Securities and Exchange Commission approved the Plan, Holding Company Act Release No. 4215, April 5, 1943. The United States District Court of Delaware approved the Plan, D.C., 51 F. Supp. 217, and the Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed this action. This Court has jurisdiction under Judicial Code, Section 240, 28 U.S. C.A. § 347, and Section 25 of the Holding Company Act. Certiorari was granted because of the importance of the question raised in administration of the act. 322 U.S. 724, 64 S.Ct. 1289.

The United Light and Power Company, a Maryland corporation, is a registered holding company under the Act. Section 5. It is the top holding company of a large system with twenty-four other corporate associates. Section 2(a) (10). Its place in the system violates the prohibition of the Act against a registered holding company being a "holding company with respect to [any] of its subsidiary companies [Sec. 2(a) (8)] which itself has a subsidiary company which is a holding company." Section 11(b) (2). This prohibition is known as the "great-grandfather clause."

In proceedings for the simplification of the system, after finding that Power violated the great-grandfather clause, an order was entered on March 20, 1941, directing that Power be liquidated and dissolved. The order authorized Power to submit to the Commission a plan for compliance with the order "on a basis which is fair and equitable to its security holders." Power with its registered holding company subsidiary, The United Light and Railways Company, a Delaware corporation, all of whose common stock was owned by Power, submitted such a plan and after examination by the Commission and modification it was approved by order of April 5, 1943. The Plan was held specifically to be fair and equitable to all security holders. By the application and order Railways' participation in the Plan was accepted. Holding Company Act Release No. 4215. This is the order which is before us.

---

21 See, Christ, Right of Holders of Preferred Stock to Participate in the Distribution of Profits, 1929, 27 Mich.L.Rev. 731; 1935, 33 Mich.L.Rev. 439.

It approved the Plan for the liquidation and dissolution of Power as "necessary to effectuate the provisions of Section 11(b) of the" Act. It directed counsel for the Commission to apply to an appropriate federal court for an order enforcing the Plan. The central feature of the Plan and the one here in issue was Power's proposed distribution of its assets to its preferred and common stockholders. Power's chief asset was its holdings of common stock in its subsidiary, Railways. It represented over $72,000,000 of its total gross assets of a little more than $81,000,000. All other property of Power which remained after the satisfaction of its obligations was to be distributed by Power to Railways. Thus this residual property of Power would inure to the benefit of Railways' new common stockholders, the former stockholders of Power.

Distribution of Power's common stock holdings in Railways was to be effected on the basis of 5 shares of Railways' common stock for one share of Power's preferred and one share of Railways' common for 20 shares of Power's common, and allocation of 94.52% to Power's preferred stockholders and 5.48% to Power's common stockholders. As Railways was the only company in the tier below Power of the holding company system, it would become by the dissolution of Power the top holding company and Power's preferred and common stockholders, by the distribution to them of all of Railways' common, would have in the aggregate the same rights in Railways and in the holding company system that Power had. The rights and preferences of Power's stockholders would of course disappear with the distribution of Railways' common and the dissolution of Power. As holders of Railways' single class of common, a new relationship of equality would arise between Power's preferred and common stockholders.

This order was preceded by an examination by the Commission into the situation of this holding company system. For a clear understanding of the single issue as to whether, in the liquidation of a holding company by order of the Commission under section 11(e), a participation by junior security holders in the assets is permissible before preferred security holders have received the entire liquidating preference secured to them by the company's charter, it is sufficient to state only the following facts about which there is no controversy between the litigants. Power is a solvent company. As of April 30, 1942, and there is no intimation that its condition has worsened, its balance sheet showed assets of $81,159,075 and liabilities of only $6,132,976, without consideration of its capital stock structure. Its principal asset, the Railways common stock heretofore referred to, has a book value in excess of the $72,000,000 plus at which it is carried on Power's balance sheet and an actual value which makes Power unquestionably solvent with large equity values in its stock.

Power has outstanding 600,000 shares of Class A Preferred. This preferred stock has a liquidation value of $100 per share or $60,000,000 plus arrearages of $38,700,000 as of December 31, 1942, or a total liquidating value ahead of the common, as of the time of the order of $98,700,000. There are 2,421,192 shares of Class A common and 1,055,576 shares of Class B common.

The Commission found the balance sheet value of all Railways' common on a pro forma corporate basis to be $77,954,874 and, when using a pro forma consolidated basis for the entire system, to be $81,554,330. On a capitalization of reasonably anticipated earnings of the system, the Commission was unable to find a value for Railways' common "which approaches $98,700,000.00."

If the liquidation preference of Power's preferred stock is applicable, under the Commission's conclusions on present valuations all of the Railways' common would go on distribution to Power's preferred. The Commission determined that the liquidation preference was not applicable and for these reasons.

The Commission's order of March 20, 1941, for the liquidation and dissolution of Power was a step in the simplification of the holding company system which simplification was enjoined by section 11(b) (2) of the Act. Satisfaction of the great-grandfather clause might have been obtained in this or other holding company systems by an order for merger, consolidation or recapitalization between top holding companies or between associate companies in the lower tiers of the corporate hierarchy. Such procedure would avoid the liquidation of Power. Cf. Windhurst v. Central Leather Co., 105 N.J.Eq. 621, 149 A. 36; Porges v. Vadsco Sales Corporation, Del.Ch., 32 A.2d 148, 151. The selection by the Commission of one method of system adjustment to accomplish simplification rather than another is an incident which ought not to affect rights. The exercise of legislative power by Congress through section 11(b) (2) to accomplish simplification as a matter of public policy and the Commission's administration of the Act by dissolution of this particular company results in a type of liquidation which is entirely distinct from the "liquidation of the corporation, whether voluntary or involuntary" envisaged by the charter provisions of Power for preferences to the senior stock.

This conclusion permitted the Commission to examine the investment values of the common and preferred stocks of Power. The rights of the preferred stock to $6 annual cumulative dividends in the going business and to full priority in liquidation other than by operation of the Act were treated as factors in valuation rather than determinative of amounts payable in a traditional dissolution. Upon analysis of the Holding Company System's experience and upon an estimate of future earnings, the Commission assumed earnings of $6,185,000 annually which would be applicable to Railways' common and, as a consequence of the distribution, to Power's preferred and common stockholders. Since the annual preferred dividend requirements were $3,600,000, there appeared a balance of $2,585,000 available for the reduction of preferred stock arrearages of $38,700,000 as of December 31, 1942. The Commission noted that if all the assumed earnings materialized and were applied to liquidating the preferred current and deferred dividends, in approximately fifteen years the arrearages would be paid and the common would be in a position to receive dividends. Furthermore, only by forced liquidation could the common stock be deprived of its possibility for future earnings. Only by means of forced liquidation and the receipt of all Railways' common, could Power's preferred gain a right to prospecttive earnings above its guaranteed dividends. The deferred dividends do not bear interest. While recognizing that the common stock participation was remote, the Commission determined that in its "overall judgment" Power's common had a legitimate investment value of a proportion of 5.48 per cent of Power's assets to the preferred's value of 94.52 per cent. Such a conclusion is not "susceptible of mathematical demonstration," any more than any other valuation of a utility's worth. The Commission determined this allocation was fair and equitable within section 11(e).

Petitioner does not challenge the above allocation of values between the preferred and common stock of Power, if the Commission is correct in treating the stock rights as though in a continuing enterprise instead of in liquidation. Petitioner relies upon the charter rights which on liquidation of Power give to the preferred $100 and the cumulated and accrued dividends. * * * It relies upon the authorities of this and other courts which hold that under a full priority rule junior securities in bankruptcy or equity reorganizations may not participate in the assets until the rights of the holders of senior securities are satisfied in full. Petitioner says:

"When the Plan, whatever the device used, contemplates the surrender of outstanding securities for new securities, either in the same or a different company, it is not 'fair and equitable' to force senior security holders to accept less than that which they are contractually entitled to receive."

To petitioner, no distinction is to be drawn between liquidation under bankruptcy or reorganization and liquidation under the public Utility Holding Company Act by virtue of sections 11(b) (2) and 11(e).

We reach the conclusion that the Securities and Exchange Commission applied the correct rule of law as to the rights of the stockholders inter sese. That is to say, when the Commission proceeds in the simplification of a holding company system, the rights of stockholders of a solvent company which is ordered by the Commission to distribute its assets among its stockholders may be evaluated on the basis of a going business and not as though a liquidation were taking place.

The manifest solvency of Power simplifies the problem of stockholders' rights with which we are here concerned. The creditors are satisfied. No possibility exists that simplification of structure is employed here to evade or nullify creditors' rights in reorganization or to take the place of traditional reorganization.

Like the bankruptcy and reorganization statutes, the Public Utility Holding Company Act, in providing that plans for simplification be "fair and equitable," incorporates the principle of full priority in the treatment to be accorded various classes of security interests. This right to priority in assets which exists between creditors and stockholders, exists also between various classes of stockholders. When by contract as evidenced by charter provisions one class of stockholders is superior to another in its claim against earnings or assets that superior position must be recognized by courts or agencies which deal with the earnings or assets of such a company. Fairness and equity require this conclusion. Even before our decision in Case v. Los Angeles Lumber Products Co. on November 6, 1939 [308 U.S. 106, 60 S.Ct. 1, 84 L.Ed. 110], recent federal cases had recognized this priority. That has been their view since the Case decision, In re Porto Rican American Tobacco Co., 2 Cir., 112 F.2d 655, 656, 657. This is the rule applied by the Commission in the simplification of corporate structure. The Commission recognizes and applies the doctrine of full priority by giving value to the rights of the preferred in a going concern rather than as if by sale and distribution. Its views are stated below. The issue in this case is not whether full priority should be given to preferred over common stockholders but whether the priority which is established by the charter, note 6, is applicable to a simplification by liquidation under § 11(b) (2) and (e). There is an argument that if the charter provision applies to this situation, it cannot be disregarded and that in such a liquidation "fair and equitable" would require the distribution of assets only to the preferred. We do not reach that question. The point at issue is whether this charter provision applies.

The applicability of the charter provision under the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935 is a matter of federal law. * * * It may be that if the charter liquidation preference were held to cover this situation it would not frustrate the simplification of the holding company system, to the same degree that the gold clause agreements interfered with the power of Congress to regulate the gold content of the dollar. Norman v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 294 U.S. 240, 306, 55 S.Ct. 407, 415, 79 L.Ed. 885, 95 A.L.R. 1352, et seq., and cases cited. Distribution to preferred stockholders only with disregard of common's interest would eliminate Power and cure the system's present inconsistency with the great-grandfather clause. We think, however, the charter preference is inoperative in simplification under section 11(b) (2). The provision having been adopted in 1929, six years prior to enactment of the Public Utility Holding Company Act, a "simplification" under this Act, having as an incident to it the dissolution of one company in a holding company system, was not an anticipated "liquidation" within the meaning of Power's charter provision. Enforcement of an overriding public policy should not have its effect visited on one class with a corresponding windfall to another class of security holders. Nor should common stock values be made to depend on whether the Commission, in enforcing compliance with the Act, resorts to dissolution of a particular company in the holding company system, or resorts instead to the devices of merger or consolidation, which would not run afoul of a charter provision formulated years before adoption of the Act in question. The Commission in its enforcement of the policies of the Act should not be hampered in its determination of the proper type of holding company structure by considerations of avoidance of harsh effects on various stock interests which might result from enforcement of charter provisions of doubtful applicability to the procedures undertaken. While pre-existing contract provisions exist which produce results at variance with a legislative policy which was not forseeable at the time the contract was made, they cannot be permitted to operate. Compare New York Trust Co. v. Securities and Exchange Comm., 2 Cir., 131 F.2d 274; In re Laclede Gas Light Company, D.C., 57 F.Supp. 997. The reason does not lie in the fact that the business of Power continues in another form. That is true of bankruptcy and equity reorganization. It lies in the fact that Congress did not intend that its exercise of power to simplify should mature rights, created without regard to the possibility of simplification of system structure, which otherwise would only arise by voluntary action of stockholders or, involuntarily, through action of creditors. We must assume that Congress intended to exercise its power with the least possible harm to citizens. * * *

The Continental or Reading case turned, however, on the charter rights of the preferred to share equally with the common in earnings which had become assets, pages 179, 180 of 259 U.S., at pages 547, 548 of 42 S.Ct., 66 L.Ed. 871, not on whether a right to share was matured or varied by governmental action. Contrary to the situation in this present case, the charter provisions of the Reading Company were adopted with knowledge of the sanctions of the Sherman Act against monopoly. 259 U.S. at pages 171 and 177, 42 S.Ct. at pages 545, 547, 66 L.Ed. 871. We do not feel constrained by its dealing with charter rights as in a normal liquidation to hold that where liquidation is adopted as a matter of administrative routine, the preferences are thereby matured. * * *

Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE STONE, dissenting.

MR. JUSTICE ROBERTS, MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER and I think the judgment below should be reversed. * * *

Here Congress has commanded the Commission to respect contract rights by requiring that its action conform to the well defined meaning of the phrase "fair and equitable." Congress seems to have recognized that the stipulated priorities of stockholders were not to be disturbed in liquidations ordered under the Public Utility Holding Company Act. The report of the Senate Committee (S.Rep. No. 621, 74th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 33) recommending the enactment of the present statute and proponents of the Bill (H.R.Rep. 1318, 74th Cong. 1st Sess., pp. 49-50; 79 Cong.Rec. 4607, 8432) repeatedly cited Continental Insurance Co. v. United States, supra, in which it was held that the distribution in a liquidation compelled by the enforcement of the Sherman and Hepburn Acts must preserve the stipulated priorities of the several classes of stockholders of the offending corporation.

The intimation that the priority stipulation can be disregarded in the present liquidation because the Commission could have effected the simplification of the holding company structure by merger, consolidation or recapitalization, is merely to say that such procedure would not involve liquidation, voluntary or involuntary, or, what comes to the same thing, that the preferred stockholders could not claim the protection of the priority stipulation in situations to which it does not and was not intended to apply. By buying preferred stock the preferred stockholders paid for the privilege of membership in the corporation and for participation in the fruits of the corporate enterprise, to continue, with full priority of dividends so long as the corporation should continue as a going concern. But in the event of liquidation they stipulated and paid for the specified priority over the common stockholders in the distribution of the net corporate assets. The preferred stockholders here assert only the rights to which that stock is entitled on liquidation by the terms of the priority stipulation. Calling the preferred stockholders' right of priority a "windfall" will not serve as an apology, explanation, or justification for the Commission's action in appropriating the priority of the preferred in order to give a windfall to the common. It is no answer to say that their claim on liquidation might have been avoided by not liquidating or to say, as the Commission has ordered, that they must accept on liquidation less than their stipulated priority on liquidation and less than the rights to which they would have been entitled if the corporation had continued as a going concern.

The judgment should be reversed.

SHANIK et al. v. EMPIRE POWER CORPORATION et al.
CLARK et al. v. SAME.

Supreme Court of New York, Special Term, 1945. 58 N.Y.S.2d 176.

Consolidated derivative suits by Alexander Shanik and another, as plaintiffs, suing on their own behalf and on behalf of all holders of participating stock of Empire Power Corporation, and by Kenneth F. Clark and another, etc., against the Empire Power Corporation, in dissolution, and others, to require restoration of excess distribution on dissolution to common stockholders.

Motions to dismiss denied, and plaintiffs held entitled to judgment, but judgment held in abeyance pending further hearing.

SCHREIBER, JUSTICE. Plaintiffs are the holders of 1400 shares of the Participating Stock of Empire Power Corporation. Pursuant to statute (Sec. 105, Stock Corporation Law), that corporation was dissolved in January 1945 and its assets distributed shortly thereafter. The complaint in this consolidated derivative suit charges that such distribution was in violation of the corporate charter, as amended, and improperly favored the Common Stock over the Participating Stock.

The Common Stock was the sole voting stock; 400,000 shares had been issued and were outstanding; all were held by defendant Eastern Seaboard Securities Corporation, thus in control of Empire. Of 400,000 shares of Participating Stock likewise issued, 175,585 were outstanding at the time of dissolution and of these Eastern held 140,471. An issue of preferred stock had been redeemed and retired long prior to dissolution.

Concededly, the amended charter provided preferential and cumulative dividends to the Participating Stock and permitted, if there were sufficient additional surplus, declaration of dividends to the Common Stock, as a class, to an amount equal to that received by the Participating shares as a class. Aggregate dividends to both classes were to be equal, measured by the dividends on the Participating Stock.

The scheme of the charter is clearly stated:

"There shall never be distributed in aggregate to the Common Stock, as a class, for any period of time, whether by dividends or otherwise, a greater sum than shall have theretofore, including the same period been paid to the Participating Stock as a class * * *."

Over the years the aggregate dividends to the Participating Stock as a class were greater than the aggregate dividends to the Common Stock as a class. At least before dissolution, it is clear that pursuant to the charter a compensating dividend to the Common Stock, as a class, might well have been declared, for the funds were at hand. Eastern, holding all of the voting or Common Stock of Empire, properly then might have brought about class equality between the two types of stock, by declaring a dividend to itself, as the sole common stockholder, of that differential of aggregate dividends between the two classes of stock.

This was not done but, as ruled on trial, the reason for the omission is immaterial to the question at bar, which is simply to construe the charter as a matter of law and to determine whether the formula for distribution of the assets on dissolution, prescribed therein, permits an equalizing adjustment thereon.

The clauses of the amended charter covering such distribution on dissolution, thus required to be examined, are:

"In any distribution of assets other than by dividends from surplus or profits, the Participating Stock shall have a preference over the Common Stock until there shall have been paid on each share of the Participating Stock Forty dollars ($40), plus the amount, if any, by which Two dollars and twenty-five cents ($2.25) per annum from the date after which dividends on said share became cumulative to the date of such distribution exceeds the preferential dividends (as distinguished from the participating dividends) actually paid thereon or declared and set apart for payment thereon."

"In any distribution of assets, other than by dividends from surplus or profits, the Common Stock then outstanding, as a class, in subordination to * * * the Participating Stock, shall be entitled to a sum equal to Forty dollars ($40) for each share of Participating Stock then outstanding, plus the amount, if any, by which Two Dollars and twenty-five cents ($2.25) per annum from the date after which dividends on said share of Participating Stock became cumulative to the date of such distribution exceeds the preferential dividends actually paid thereon or declared or set apart for payment; and said sum shall be paid and distributed to the holders of the Common Stock then outstanding pro rata, according to their respective holdings thereof."

"In any further distribution of assets, other than by dividends from surplus or profits, the assets so to be distributed shall be divided into two equal parts; and one of said parts shall be distributed pro rata among the holders of Participating Stock then outstanding according to their respective holdings thereof, and the other of said parts shall be distributed pro rata among the holders of Common Stock then outstanding according to their respective holdings thereof."

There is no dispute as to the application of the first of the foregoing clauses relating to distribution to the Participating Stock on dissolution and stating the amounts due that stock in the first instance on distribution; it is the construction of the succeeding clause giving a like formula as to the Common Stock that gives rise to this litigation.

Plaintiffs contend that the inescapable meaning of the language used is that, if assets are sufficient, on dissolution a sum measured by and equal to but in no event greater than that paid in the aggregate to the Participating stockholders as a class is to be paid to the Common stockholders as a class; and that, after both classes of stock are thus paid, any excess is to be divided equally between them in accordance with the charter provision last quoted. Thus, as the Common Stock as a class actually did receive on this distribution a sum in excess of that received by the Participating Stock as a class, plaintiffs seek a decree herein that the responsible defendants be required to restore to the corporation one-half of that excess distribution, or $4,032,965.96, to be redistributed to the Participating stockholders pro rata.

It is defendants' contention that the language is susceptible of an interpretation that will restore on distribution the class inequality suffered in dividends; that the scheme of the charter, read as a whole, of class equality between the two types of stock will then be preserved.

* * *

Thus on distribution on dissolution defendants sought to reach class equality between the two types of stock by additionally granting, to the extent that funds were sufficient, to the Common Stock the aggregate class dividend differential that arose during the existence of the corporation. That differential was $9,082,279.

Defendants make no suggestion that the differential was attempted to be made up by the declaration of a belated dividend in any sense; the claim is solely that its payment was proper and in entire conformity with the distribution formula on dissolution with regard to the Common Stock.

Although the construction urged by plaintiffs is grammatically sound, the Court nevertheless may adopt another if the choice is fairly and reasonably open from the language employed and a true and equitable result obtained thereby. The difficulty with defendants' interpretation of the formula is that its application creates class inequality even as that of which they complain and for which there is utterly no support in the charter. The gross dividend differential is $9,082,279 and yet the computation made by defendant yields a differential of $11,792,000. This figure was in effect reduced in the final reckoning on distribution, but it is evident that a formula producing such a result affords the Court no proper basis for departure, by straining the language, from the plain meaning of the charter provision. Thus it will serve no useful purpose to consider at length other labored arguments advanced by defendants for the Court is constrained to hold that the charter provisions in question require that, on dissolution, the Common Stock as a class shall in no event receive more than the Participating Stock as a class.

True it is, as defendants urge, that the intent of the charter is class equality of dividend and a like equality on distribution. Admittedly there was class inequality in dividends. But dividends are incident to continued corporate existence and are payable out of surplus; distribution on dissolution is liquidation of the corporation and embraces all assets. Stock Corporation Law, §§ 11, 58, 105; [Citing cases.] * * *

The Court holds that it may not do violence to that contract by approving a distribution on dissolution in direct violation of the controlling charter provision, in order to counterbalance a deliberate failure seasonably to declare a dividend before dissolution under other, distinct and unrelated charter provisions.

It follows that the motions to dismiss the complaint are denied and that plaintiffs are entitled to judgment that the responsible defendants restore one-half the excess distribution on the Common Stock to be redistributed to the Participating stockholders pro rata. Interest will be allowed from the date of excess payment. The reserved motion to strike the testimony of William J. Wilckens is denied and all testimony relating to motivation for nondeclaration of the dividend in question to the Common Stock is stricken as immaterial, with appropriate exceptions.

This conclusion brings up defendants' plea that a decree be moulded consonant with the true equities presently existing. Defendant Eastern, as stated, holds a large percentage of Empire's Participating Stock. Said defendant has offered in evidence a consent by all its stockholders that any recovery herein be reduced to the extent that Eastern, as a Participating stockholder, may share therein. For the purpose of a proper and just decree the exhibits offered in this regard are held proper, are admitted in evidence and objections thereto are overruled, with appropriate exceptions. Ordinarily the recovery would be that of the corporation for whose benefit the suit was brought. Pollitz v. Wabash Railroad Co., 167 App.Div. 669, 685, 686, 152 N.Y.S.

803, 814, 815; Berger v. National Architects' Bronze Co., 173 App.Div. 680, 682, 160 N.Y.S. 331, 333. The Court in a proper case where special circumstances exist should adjust the decree to the realities of the situation and prevent unnecessary circuity and hardship. Harris v. Rogers, 190 App.Div. 208, 179 N.Y.S. 799; Kittinger v. Churchill, 161 Misc. 3, 292 N.Y.S. 35, affirmed 249 App.Div. 703, 292 N.Y.S. 51; Hayman v. Morris, Sup., 46 N.Y.S.2d 482, 495.

On the bare record in this regard, however, there is difficulty in determining what adjustments and allowances are proper and, indeed whether moulding the decree is feasible at all under the circumstances. The matter was hardly litigated. It is clear at least that fees, expenses and a number of other variants possibly affecting the net recovery should be considered and that Eastern is not necessarily entitled to a set-off based on the exact percentage of Participation Stock held. Further Eastern may be entitled to credits by reason of its assumption of contingent liabilities of Empire on dissolution; and in view of the fact that the excess distribution to the Common Stock (Eastern) was wholly or partly in kind, consisting of stock of other corporations, a problem arises as to the manner and form of restoration and as to accounting for dividends and profits thereof.

In the interest of justice the parties will be given an opportunity to be heard on all of the foregoing matters, and any others relevant thereto. Pending such further hearing, decision and judgment will be held in abeyance.[21a]

ZAHN v. TRANSAMERICA CORPORATION.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Third Circuit, 1947.

162 F.2d 36.

BIGGS, CIRCUIT JUDGE. ZAHN, a holder of Class A common stock of Axton-Fisher Tobacco Company, a corporation of Kentucky, sued Transamerica Corporation, a Delaware company, on his own behalf and on behalf of all stockholders similarly situated, in the District Court of the United States for the District of Delaware. His complaint as amended asserts that Transamerica caused Axton-Fisher to redeem its Class A stock at $80.80 per share on July 1, 1943, instead of permitting the Class A stockholders to participate in the assets on the liquidation of their company in June, 1944. He alleges in brief that if the Class A stockholders had been allowed to participate in the assets on liquidation of Axton-Fisher and had received their respective shares of the assets, he and the other Class A stockholders would have received $240 per share instead of $80.80. Zahn takes the position that he has two separate causes of action, one based on the Class A shares which were not turned back to the company for redemption; another based on the shares which were redeemed.[22] He prayed the court below to direct 21a Aff'd, 296 N.Y. 664, 69 N.E.2d 818, 1946.

22 The plaintiff was originally the holder of 235 shares of Class A stock purchased on four occasions between July 23 and August 10, 1943, inclusive. Between August Transamerica to pay over to the shareholders who had not surrendered their stock the liquidation value and to pay over to those shareholders who had surrendered their stock the liquidation value less $80.80. Transamerica filed a motion to dismiss. The court below granted the motion holding that Zahn had failed to state a cause of action. See 63 F.Supp. 243. He appealed.

The facts follow as appear from the pleadings, which recite provisions of Axton-Fisher's charter. Prior to April 30, 1943, Axton-Fisher had authorized and outstanding three classes of stock, designated respectively as preferred stock, Class A stock and Class B stock. Each share of preferred stock had a par value of $100 and was entitled to cumulative dividends at the rate of $6 per annum and possessed a liquidation value of $105 plus accrued dividends. The Class A stock, specifically described in the charter as a "common" stock, was entitled to an annual cumulative dividend of $3.20 per share. The Class B stock was next entitled to receive an annual dividend of $1.60 per share. If further funds were made available by action of the board of directors by way of dividends, the Class A stock and the Class B stock were entitled to share equally therein. Upon liquidation of the company and the payment of the sums required by the preferred stock, the Class A stock was entitled to share with the Class B stock in the distribution of the remaining assets, but the Class A stock was entitled to receive twice as much per share as the Class B stock.[23]

Each share of Class A stock was convertible at the option of the shareholder into one share of Class B stock. All or any of the shares of Class A stock were callable by the corporation at any quarterly dividend date upon sixty days' notice to the shareholders, at $60 per share with accrued dividends.[24] The voting rights were vested in the Class B stock but if there were four successive defaults in the payment of quarterly dividends, the class or classes of stock as to which such defaults occurred gained voting rights equal share for share with the

2 and August 20, 1943, the plaintiff surrendered for redemption 215 shares and retained 20 shares.

23 The charter provides as follows:

"In the event of the dissolution, liquidation, merger or consolidation of the corporation, or sale of substantially all its assets, whether voluntary or involuntary, there shall be paid to the holders of the preferred stock then outstanding $105 per share, together with all unpaid accrued dividends thereon, before any sum shall be paid to or any assets distributed among the holders of the Class A common stock and/or the holders of the Class B common stock. After such payment to the holders of the preferred stock, and all unpaid accrued dividends on the Class A common stock shall have been paid, then all remaining assets and funds of the corporation shall be divided among and paid to the holders of the Class A common stock and to the holders of the Class B common stock in the ratio of 2 to 1; that is to say, there shall be paid upon each share of Class A common stock twice the amount paid upon each share of Class B common stock, in any such event."

24 The charter provides as follows:

"The whole or any part of the Class A common stock of the corporation, at the option of the Board of Directors, may be redeemed on any quarterly dividend payment date by paying therefor in cash Sixty dollars ($60.00) per share and all unpaid and accrued dividends thereon at the date fixed for such redemption, upon sending by mail to the registered holders of the Class A common stock at least sixty (60) days' notice of the exercise of such option. If at any time the Board of Directors shall determine to redeem less than the whole amount of Class A common stock then outstanding, the particular stock to be so redeemed shall be deter-

Class B stock. By reason of this provision the Class A stock had possessed equal voting rights with the Class B stock since on or about January 1, 1937.

On or about May 16, 1941, Transamerica purchased 80,160 shares of Axton-Fisher's Class B common stock. This was about 71.5% of the outstanding Class B stock and about 46.7% of the total voting stocks of Axton-Fisher. By August 15, 1942, Transamerica owned 5,332 shares of Class A stock and 82,610 shares of Class B stock. By March 31, 1943, the amount of Class A stock of Axton-Fisher owned by Transamerica had grown to 30,168 shares or about 66⅔% of the total amount of this stock outstanding, and the amount of Class B stock owned by Transamerica had increased to 90,768 shares or about 80% of the total outstanding. Additional shares of Class B stock were acquired by Transamerica after April 30, 1943, and Transamerica converted the Class A stock owned by it into Class B stock so that on or about the end of May 1944 Transamerica owned virtually all of the outstanding Class B stock of Axton-Fisher. Since May 16, 1941, Transamerica had control of and had dominated the management, directorate, financial policies, business and affairs of Axton-Fisher. Since the date last stated Transamerica had elected a majority of the board of directors of Axton-Fisher. These individuals are in large part officers or agents of Transamerica.

In the fall of 1942 and in the spring of 1943 Axton-Fisher possessed as its principal asset leaf tobacco which had cost it about $6,361,981. This asset was carried on Axton-Fisher's books in that amount. The value of leaf tobacco had risen sharply and, to quote the words of the complaint, "unbeknown to the public holders of * * * Class A common stock of Axton-Fisher, but known to Transamerica, the market value of * * * [the] tobacco had, in March and April of 1943, attained the huge sum of about $20,000,000."

The complaint then alleges the gist of the plaintiff's grievance, viz., that Transamerica, knowing of the great value of the tobacco which Axton-Fisher possessed, conceived a plan to appropriate the value of the tobacco to itself by redeeming the Class A stock at the price of $60 a share plus accrued dividends, the redemption being made to appear as if "incident to the continuance of the business of Axton-Fisher as a going concern", and thereafter, the redemption of the Class A stock being completed, to liquidate Axton-Fisher; that this would result, after the disbursal of the sum required to be paid to the preferred stock, in Transamerica gaining for itself most of the value of the warehouse tobacco. The complaint further alleges that in pursuit of this plan Transamerica, by a resolution of the Board of directors of Axton-Fisher on April 30, 1943, called the Class A stock at $60 and, selling a large part of the tobacco to Phillip-Morris Company, Ltd., Inc., together with substantially all of the other assets of Axton-Fisher, thereafter liquidated Axton-Fisher, paid off the preferred stock and pocketed the balance of the proceeds of the sale. Warehouse receipts rep-mined in such manner as the Board of Directors shall prescribe; provided, however, that no holder of Class A common stock shall be preferred over any other holder of such stock."

---

resenting the remainder of the tobacco were distributed to the Class B stockholders.

Assuming as we must that the allegations of the complaint are true, it will be observed that agents or representatives of Transamerica constituted Axton-Fisher's board of directors at the times of the happening of the events complained of, and that Transamerica was Axton-Fisher's principal and controlling stockholder at such times. It will be observed also that jurisdiction in the suit at bar is based upon diversity of citizenship and jurisdictional amount. In such a suit the conflict-of-laws rule of Delaware required the District Court of Delaware to refer to the law of the State of incorporation to determine the extent and nature of relationships between corporation and stockholder, corporate officer or director and stockholder and between stockholders inter sese. See Skillman v. Conner, 8 W.W.Harr. 402, 193 A. 563, and Black & Yates v. Mahogany Ass'n, 3 Cir., 129 F.2d 227, 233. As was well stated by the court below in Geller v. Transamerica Corporation, D.C. 53 F.Supp. 625, 629–630, "* * * under the Delaware conflict of laws rule the law of the place of the wrong determines the quantum of the breach of duty * * * It would seem that the place of wrong is where the final act occurred which establishes liability." This court approved that reasoning by affirming per curiam the decision. See, 3 Cir., 151 F.2d 534.

The loci of the events complained of in the instant case are not set forth in the complaint. In Black & Yates v. Mahogany Ass'n, 129 F.2d at p. 233, we stated, "We think that in the absence of allegations as to the place or places where the acts complained of occurred, the court below would have been entitled to assume that these operative facts took place within the State of Delaware", viz., the state of the forum. It is necessary therefore to assume that the events complained of took place within the State of Delaware. The law of Kentucky determines the existence of fiduciary duty, or the lack of it, between Transamerica (as the board of directors of Axton-Fisher, as its officership or as its controlling stockholder) and Axton-Fisher's minority Class A stockholders, and the law of Delaware determines the extent of the breach of fiduciary duty, if any.

Transamerica leans heavily upon the decision of the Court of Appeals of Kentucky in Taylor v. Axton-Fisher Tobacco Co., 295 Ky. 226, 173 S.W.2d 377, and to a lesser extent upon the decision of the court below in the Geller case. The latter authority held that a majority stockholder of a corporation is at liberty to deal at arm's length with a minority stockholder who sought to sell and did sell his stock to the majority stockholder in the absence of affirmative misrepresentation or fraud by the latter. This was a correct application of the law of Kentucky.[25] See Waller v. Hodge, 214 Ky. 705, 283 S.W. 1047, [25] The rule of law stated is analogous to that applicable when a director buys the stock of a stockholder. On this subject Thompson on Corporations, 3rd Ed., Section 1363, pp. 885 et seq., states: "On the proposition of the right or power of a director to deal with a stockholder in the purchase of his stock on an equal footing, the cases are diametrically opposed." But see Fletcher Cyc. Corporations, Section 1168. The view of the Delaware courts is the same as that of the Kentucky courts. See Cahall v. Lofland, 12 Del.Ch. 299, 114 A. 224, affirmed 13 Del.Ch. 384, 118 A. 1.

and Barth v. Fidelity & Columbia Trust Company, 188 Ky. 788, 224 S. W. 351. These decisions and that of the Geller case are not apposite under the circumstances of the instant case.

The decision of the Court of Appeals of Kentucky in the Taylor case requires careful analysis. The following appears. Charlotte Taylor, a citizen of Jefferson County, Kentucky, sued Axton-Fisher in the Jefferson Circuit Court, Chancery Branch, First Division, stating that she was the holder of nine shares of its Class B stock and, setting up in her complaint the provisions of Axton-Fisher's charter hereinbefore referred to, alleged that Axton-Fisher's board of directors by a resolution of June 16, 1943 had provided that the Class A stock not presented for redemption on or before July 1, 1943, should "continue in full force and effect with all the rights and privileges thereunto appertaining, as fully as if the call for redemption [pursuant to the resolution of April 30, 1943] had never been issued * * *" and that those Class A stockholders who had surrendered their stock for redemption might change their positions and remain as Class A stockholders of their corporation provided rescissions of surrenders of their stock were filed with the corporation's agent on or before July 1, 1943. Taylor alleged, in short, that by the resolution of June 16, 1943 the board of directors attempted to change the call for the redemption of the Class A stock from a mandatory to an optional one, leaving it to the choice of the stockholders whether they would surrender their stock or not. Taylor asked the court to declare that the resolution of the board of April 30, 1943 was a final and irrevocable act of the board of directors, binding upon Axton-Fisher and on all Class A stockholders; that the attempted modification of the terms of the resolution of April 30, 1943 by the resolution of June 16, 1943 was void and that Axton-Fisher was required to carry out the redemption of the Class A stock as provided by the resolution of April 30, 1943.

A demurrer was filed and the cause proceeded to judgment. The Circuit Court of Jefferson County held that the board of directors had the right to modify the call embodied in the resolution of April 30 by the resolution of June 16. A brief opinion was filed. The case was appealed to the Court of Appeals of Kentucky. See 295 Ky. 226, 173 S.W.2d 377, 379, 148 A.L.R. 834. That Court, speaking through Commissioner Stanley, one Judge dissenting, stated inter alia: "The rights of the holders of Class A stock and of the corporation as to its redemption rested on an express contract, namely, the provision of the articles of incorporation which made them junior preferred stockholders and subject at all times to have their stock retired," citing Thompson on Corporations, Sections 189, 210; 13 Am.Jur., Corporations, Section 318; Fletcher, Section 5443; Westerfield-Bonte Co. v. Burnett, 176 Ky. 188, 195 S.W. 477; F. T. Gunther Grocery Co. v. Hazel, 179 Ky. 775, 201 S.W. 336, and other authorities. Commissioner Stanley went on to say: "Manifestly, it was very much to the interest of the holders of Class B stock to have all these priorities, obligations and restrictions on and conditional joint control of the management eliminated. A substantial advantage was given to and acquired by the Class B stockholders by the resolution definitely and unqualifiedly calling Class A stock for redemption. That being true, it was vested and fixed, so that the directors could not withdraw or cancel or modify their action to the prejudice or detriment of Class B stockholders.

"The first action of the directors may not be regarded as but an offer or proffer, or in the nature of such, capable of being withdrawn before acceptance or consummation. Rather it is the converse. The charter provision constituted a continuing contractual power and corresponding right which only waited action by the directors for use and consummation. It was a continuing option." Commissioner Stanley said that while the acts of boards of directors, exercised in good faith and not in fraud of the rights of the stockholders, should not be interfered with by the courts,[26] if the prior action of the board of directors had vested rights in others the board could "not [subsequently] alter or affect those rights * * ". Discussing Axton-Fisher's charter provisions at some length, Commissioner Stanley stated, " * * we [cannot] agree with the appellee [Axton-Fisher] that the result of this action of the directors is to be regarded only as an incidental benefit flowing to the Class B stockholders since they were not promisees of the [redemption] contract nor parties to whom performance was to be rendered. * * * The provision of the articles of incorporation and the effect of the action of the directors are too substantial and too great to be so regarded. We think the provision for redemption of Class A stock was made as much for the one as for the other class. If it was not, then it was very delusive.

"The principle applicable in cases where there has been a declaration of dividends is applicable here. Undivided profits of a corporation in a sense or qualifiedly belong to the stockholders, but disposition or distribution thereof rests within the fair discretion of the directors." [27] citing Smith v. Southern Foundry Co., 166 Ky. 208, 179 S.W. 205.

The circumstances of the case at bar are sui generis and we can find no Kentucky decision squarely in point. In our opinion, however, the law of Kentucky imposes upon the directors of a corporation or upon those who are in charge of its affairs by virtue of majority stock ownership or otherwise the same fiduciary relationship in respect to the corporation and to its stockholders as is imposed generally by the laws of Kentucky's sister States or which was imposed by federal law prior to Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64, 58 S.Ct. 817.

The tenor of the federal decisions in respect to the general fiduciary duty of those in control of a corporation is unmistakable. The Supreme Court in Southern Pacific Co. v. Bogert, 250 U.S. 483, 487, 488, 39 S.Ct. 533, 535, said: "The rule of corporation law and of equity invoked is well settled and has been often applied. The majority has the right to control; but when it does so, it occupies a fiduciary relation toward the minority, as much so as the corporation itself or its officers and directors." In Pepper v. Litton, 308 U.S. 295, 306, 60 S.Ct. 238, 245, the Supreme Court stated: "A director is a fiduciary.

---

26 Citing KRS 271.230.

27 Emphasis added to all of the foregoing quotations from the Taylor case.

* * * So is a dominant or controlling stockholder or group of stockholders. * * * Their powers are powers in trust. * * * Their dealings with the corporation are subjected to rigorous scrutiny and where any of their contracts or engagements with the corporation is challenged, the burden is on the director or stockholder not only to prove the good faith of the transaction, but also to show its inherent fairness from the viewpoint of the corporation and those interested therein."

See also Hyams v. Calumet & Hecla Mining Co., 6 Cir., 221 F. 529, 537, "* * * the rule, independently of state or national anti-trust statutes, is fundamental that one in control of majority of the stock and of the board of directors of a corporation occupies a fiduciary relation towards the minority stockholders, and is charged with the duty of exercising a high degree of good faith, care, and diligence for the protection of such minority interests. Every act in its own interest to the detriment of the holders of minority stock becomes a breach of duty and of trust, and entitles to plenary relief from a court of equity. Jackson v. Ludeling, 88 U.S. 616, 21 Wall. 616, 624, 625, 22 L.Ed. 492; Jones v. Electric Co., 8 Cir., 144 F. at page 771, [Missouri Edison] 75 C.C.A. 631; Wheeler v. Abilene, etc., Bldg Co., 8 Cir., 159 F. 391, 394, 395, 89 C.C.A. 477, 16 L.R.A.,N.S., 892, 14 Ann.Cas. 917; 3 Clark & Marshall on Corporations, at page 2289." See in particular Lebold v. Inland Steel Co., 7 Cir., 125 F.2d 369. Cf. Lebold v. Inland S. S. Co., 7 Cir., 82 F.2d 351.

The law of the States in this respect is illustrated by such decisions as Singer v. Carlisle, Sup., 26 N.Y.S.2d 172; Pearson v. Concord Railroad Corporation, 62 N.H. 537, 13 Am.St.Rep. 590; Miner v. Belle Isle Ice Co., 93 Mich. 97, 53 N.W. 218, 17 L.R.A. 412; Bailey v. Jacobs, 325 Pa. 187, 189 A. 320; Lofland v. Cahall, 13 Del.Ch. 384, 118 A. 1. See also 19 C.J.S., Corporations, § 764: "The directors owe a duty of managing the corporate affairs honestly and impartially in behalf of the corporation and all the stockholders * * *." See also Restatement of the Law of Trusts, Section 170. Most of the decisions cited were rendered under circumstances in which one corporation controlled another as in the case at bar. The means of control is of course immaterial. See Fletcher Cyclopedia Corporations, Permanent Ed., Vol. 13, Section 5842.

The law of Kentucky also demonstrates the fact that those in charge of a corporation stand in a fiduciary relation to its minority stockholders. * * *

In Kirwan v. Parkway Distillery, 285 Ky. 605, 148 S.W.2d 720, 723, the Court of Appeals of Kentucky had before it the following facts. The majority stockholders of a corporation voted to dissolve it because the minority stockholders objected to a sale of the corporate assets. It appeared that the minority stockholders desired to obtain the book value of their stock in lieu of the prorata share of the funds remaining after the sale of the corporate assets. The minority stockholders filed a bill to restrain the dissolution. The Court of Appeals of Kentucky sustained a demurrer to the complaint, stating in part: "It is claimed that the dissolution of Bonnie Bros. corporation subsequent to the contract of sale of its assets was done for the purpose of defeating the appellants' rights to the book value of their stock which was more remunerative to them than their proportionate shares of the assets under a dissolution of the corporation. Conceding that to be true, yet the stockholders when voting strictly as stockholders were still within their legal rights. In the case of Haldeman v. Haldeman et al., 176 Ky. 635, 197 S.W. 376, it is pointed out that there is a radical difference when a stockholder is voting strictly as a stockholder and when voting as a director. When voting as a stockholder he has the legal right to vote with a view of his own benefits and is representing himself only; but, a director represents all the stockholders in the capacity of trustee for them and cannot use his office as director for his personal benefit at the expense of the stockholders. * * *

There can be no doubt of the general law upon this question. It is succinctly stated in Thompson on Corporations, supra, Section 1337, as follows: "Very plainly a director is disqualified from voting on matters in which he has a personal interest or on matters concerning the personal interest of a director who controls his vote. The rule is that any resolution passed at a meeting of the directors at which a director having a personal interest in the matter voted, will be voidable at the instance of the corporation or the stockholders, without regard to its fairness, where the vote of such directors was necessary to the passage of such resolution." It is clear that under the law of Kentucky the fiduciary relationship of directors is such that a court of equity will not permit them to make a profit of their trust and that directors of a corporation are required to manage and conduct their trust so as to realize whatever profit may accrue in the course of the business for the benefit of their cestuis que trust.

It is appropriate to emphasize out at this point that the right to call the Class A stock for redemption was confided by the charter of Axton-Fisher to the directors and not to the stockholders of that corporation. We must also re-emphasize the statement of the court in Haldeman v. Haldeman, supra, and its reiteration in Kirwan v. Parkway Distillery, supra, that there is a radical difference when a stockholder is voting strictly as a stockholder and when voting as a director; that when voting as a stockholder he may have the legal right to vote with a view of his own benefits and to represent himself only; but that when he votes as a director he represents all the stockholders in the capacity of a trustee for them and cannot use his office as a director for his personal benefit at the expense of the stockholders.

Two theories are presented on one of which the case at bar must be decided: one, vigorously asserted by Transamerica and based on its interpretation of the decision in the Taylor case, is that the board of directors of Axton-Fisher, whether or not dominated by Transamerica, the principal Class B stockholder, at any time and for any purpose, might call the Class A stock for redemption; the other, asserted with equal vigor by Zahn, is that the board of directors of Axton-Fisher as fiduciaries were not entitled to favor Transamerica, the Class B stockholder, by employing the redemption provisions of the charter for its benefit.

We must of course treat the decision of the Court of Appeals of Kentucky in the Taylor case as evidence of what is the law of Kentucky. The Court took the position on that record that the directors at any time[28] might call the Class A stock for redemption and that the redemption provision of the charter was written as much for the benefit of the Class B stock as for the Class A stock.[29] It is argued by Transamerica very persuasively that what the Court of Appeals of Kentucky held was that when the Class A stock received its allocation of $60 a share plus accrued dividends it received its full due and that the directors had the right at any time to eliminate Class A stock from the corporate setup for the benefit of the Class B stock.[30] It does not appear from the opinion of the Court of Appeals of Kentucky whether or not the subsequent liquidation of Axton-Fisher was brought to the attention of the Court. But it is clear from the pleading that the subsequent liquidation was not an issue in the case and from the language of the Court there is some indication that it believed that Axton-Fisher was to continue in existence because Commissioner Stanley spoke of the elimination of the Class A stock, which possessed voting rights, from the management and control of Axton-Fisher. Such surmises are hazardous, however, and are not really apposite since it is our duty to determine the law of Kentucky and not to delve into subjective mental processes. It should be noted that Commissioner Stanley stated the justiciable controversy before the Court of Appeals of Kentucky as follows: "The case presents a novel question of power of the board of directors of a corporation to rescind or modify its action in calling certain stock for redemption or retirement." This, and only this, was the question before the Court. It is notable that Commissioner Stanley said also that the acts of boards of directors "exercised in good faith and not in fraud of the rights of stockholders" should not be interfered with by the courts and that he spoke as well of the "fair discretion" of directors to be exercised in the same manner as would be the case in the declaration of dividends, citing Smith v. Southern Foundry Co., referred to in the body of this opinion. We think that it is the settled law of Kentucky that directors may not declare or withhold the declaration of dividends for the purpose of personal profit or, by analogy, take any corporate action for such a purpose.

The difficulty in accepting Transamerica's contentions in the case at bar is that the directors of Axton-Fisher, if the allegations of the complaint be accepted as true, were the instruments of Transamerica, were directors voting in favor of their special interest, that of Transamerica, could not and did not exercise "an independent judgment" in calling the Class A stock, but made the call for the purpose of profiting their true principal, Transamerica. In short, a puppet-puppeteer re-

---

28 The phrase used by the Court of Appeals of Kentucky was "at all times."

29 The language used as quoted supra was as follows: "We think the provision for redemption of Class A stock was made as much for the one as for the other class. If it was not, then it was very delusive."

30 The court said: "Manifestly, it was very much to the interest of the holders of Class B stock to have all these priorities, obligations and restrictions on and conditional joint control of the management eliminated. A substantial advantage was given to and acquired by the Class B stockholders. * * *" lationship existed between the directors of Axton-Fisher and Transamerica.

The act of the board of directors in calling the Class A stock, an act which could have been legally consummated by a disinterested board of directors, was here effected at the direction of the principal Class B stockholder in order to profit it. Such a call is voidable in equity at the instance of a stockholder injured thereby. It must be pointed out that under the allegations of the complaint there was no reason for the redemption of the Class A stock to be followed by the liquidation of Axton-Fisher except to enable the Class B stock to profit at the expense of the Class A stock. As has been hereinbefore stated the function of the call was confided to the board of directors by the charter and was not vested by the charter in the stockholders of any class. It was the intention of the framers of Axton-Fisher's charter to require the board of directors to act disinterestedly if that body called the Class A stock, and to make the call with a due regard for its fiduciary obligations. If the allegations of the complaint be proved, it follows that the directors of Axton-Fisher, the instruments of Transamerica, have been derelict in that duty. Liability which flows from the dereliction must be imposed upon Transamerica which, under the allegations of the complaint, constituted the board of Axton-Fisher and controlled it.

The quantum or extent of the breach of the fiduciary duty on the present record must be determined according to the law of Delaware for the reasons hereinbefore stated. The reaction of the law of Delaware to such a course as that pursued here by Transamerica is suggested by such decisions of the Supreme Court of Delaware as Bovay v. H. M. Byllesby & Co., Del.Sup., 38 A.2d 808, and Keenan v. Eshleman, 23 Del.Ch. 234, 2 A.2d 904, 120 A.L.R. 227. But whether the law of Delaware be applicable to determine the extent of the breach of fiduciary duty, or that of Kentucky or of New York, there will be found to be no substantial difference.[31] The remedies to be afforded by the District Court of the United States for the District of Delaware, of course, must be those which may be available under the law of Delaware. See Guaranty Trust Co. v. York, 326 U.S. 99, 65 S.Ct. 1464, 89 L.Ed. 2079, 160 A.L.R. 1231, and Overfield v. Pennroad Corporation, 3 Cir., 146 F.2d 889.

As has been stated the plaintiff has endeavored to set up a "First Cause of Action" and a "Second Cause of Action" in his complaint. The first cause of action is based upon his ownership of shares of Class A stock not surrendered by him to Axton-Fisher for redemption and is asserted not only on his own behalf but also on behalf of other Class A stockholders retaining their stock. The second cause of action is asserted by him on his own behalf and on behalf of other Class A stockholders in respect to the value of the stock which was surrendered for redemption. The two alleged separate causes of action, however, are in reality one.[32] In our opinion, if the allegations of the complaint 31 The general law is set out in the Restatement, Restitution, Section 190. See Comment a. Fiduciary Relations.

32 The second cause of action refers to the resolution of the board of directors be proved, Zahn may maintain his cause of action to recover from Transamerica the value of the stock retained by him as that shall be represented by its aliquot share of the proceeds of Axton-Fisher on dissolution. It is also our opinion that he may maintain a cause of action to recover the difference between the amount received by him for the shares already surrendered and the amount which he would have received on liquidation of Axton-Fisher if he had not surrendered his stock.[33] For analogy see Lebold v. Inland Steel Co., supra; Jones v. Missouri-Edison Electric Co., 8 Cir., 144 F. 765; Id., 8 Cir., 199 F. 64, certiorari denied 229 U.S. 615, 33 S.Ct. 174, 57 L.Ed. 1352; Richardson v. Blue Grass Mining Co., D.C., 29 F.Supp. 658, and Willcox v. Harriman Securities Corporation, D.C., 10 F.Supp. 532. * * *

The judgment will be reversed.

(b) Preemptive Rights of Preferred Stock

GENERAL INV. CO. v. BETHLEHEM STEEL CORPORATION.

Court of Chancery of New Jersey, 1917. 88 N.J.Eq. 237, 102 A. 252.

LANE, V. C. (orally): This is an application for a preliminary injunction restraining the Bethlehem Steel Corporation from increasing its capital by the issuance of thirty million of stock termed "Eight Per Cent. Cumulative Convertible Preferred." A meeting is to be held to-morrow at eleven o'clock. The Court of Errors and Appeals, I understand, is in session and application for any ad interim relief on appeal may be made to that court tomorrow morning. That is the reason why I have changed my mind and have concluded to decide the case at this time.

The application is made by General Investment Company and Continental Securities Company, other names for one Venner. They are holders respectively of one hundred shares of the present common and one hundred shares of preferred stock, and the application is made on behalf of both interests. Venner (and I shall use his name in place of the names of his corporations) bought his common stock in January of this year, as I find, for the sole purpose of harassing in any way that he could the stockholders and directors of this corporation. At the time the specific purpose that he had in mind was to prevent a scheme of financing which was then under discussion. He bought his preferred stock after notice of the present plan and for the specific purpose of preventing its success. He is entitled from a court of equity to only such consideration as that court is absolutely bound of Axton-Fisher of June 16, 1943, hereinbefore referred to in this opinion, and the fact that that resolution was declared to be invalid by the Court of Appeals of Kentucky as has been stated. These facts are immaterial as we view the law applicable to the suit at bar. It is not within the jurisdiction of this court to pass upon the questions presented by the two resolutions, the effects of which were adjudicated by the Court of Appeals of Kentucky.

[33] As to Zahn's present and past ownership of Class A stock see note 22, p. 583, supra.

under rules of law to accord him.[34] The company at the present time has a preferred stock issue of $15,000,000; and a common stock issue of $60,000,000. The common stock is divided into two classes, fifteen million termed "Common" and forty-five million termed "Common Class B." The voting power is possessed only by the preferred fifteen million and the common fifteen million. It is now proposed to issue a new stock to the amount of $30,000,000 at a dividend rate of eight per cent., which will be preferred, as to dividends, to the present preferred and common and will share in distribution with the present preferred pari passu. This stock is to be redeemable at the option of the corporation after three years at one hundred and fifteen. It is to be convertible into common class B at the option of the holder at any time. * * *

It is next objected that the present preferred stock is not given the right to subscribe to the new preferred. Generally speaking, I think the law is well settled that unless there is something in the certificate of incorporation to the contrary the rights of preferred and common stockholders are equal. Whether a particular right is enjoyed equally by both, however, must depend upon the reason for the existence of the right; at least, a very strong argument may be made to that effect. It will be observed that the present preferred has no right in the assets except to the extent of par and accrued dividends. The reason for the existence of the pre-emptive right of subscription is that the relative rights of the existing stockholders both in the assets of the company and in its control may not be altered. The relative interest of the present preferred stock in the assets of the company is not affected by the present scheme. The proposed preferred stock has no voting power so that the relative interest in the control is not affected. It is argued with force that to permit the present preferred to subscribe for the proposed preferred would be to permit a change in the relative rights of the present preferred and common and would be illegal. Of course, if the reason for the rule fails, the rule is not to be applied. * * *

Without deciding, therefore, any of the questions raised, solely upon balancing the conveniences I will discharge the order to show cause.

NOTE

"In modern times common shares as well as preferred shares are sometimes issued without voting rights, and preferred shares are ordinarily issued with preferential rights to dividends at a specified rate, but with no right to participate with the holders of common shares in further distributions of profits or of surplus. Under these circumstances, a rule of preemptive rights cannot be applied without considering the rights and equities of the different classes of shareholders. * * * the issue of additional common shares without voting rights would not be prejudicial to the holders of non-participating preferred shares even though the additional common shares be given as a share dividend to the holders of common shares

---

34 Venner had already sought a temporary injunction to restrain an increase of the capital stock of the corporation. See, General Investment Co. v. Bethlehem Steel Co., supra, p. 517.

See, Note, Stockholder's Suit for Wrong Which Occurred before Complainant Acquired Stock, 1934, 68 U.S.L.Rev. 169.

and participating shares * * *" Morawetz, The Preemptive Right of Shareholders, 1928, 42 Harv.L.Rev. 186, 193–194. See, also, Drinker, The Preemptive Right of Shareholders to Subscribe to New Shares, 1930, 43 Harv.L.Rev. 586, 605–606, 609–616; Frey, Shareholders' Pre-emptive Rights, 1929, 38 Yale L.J. 563, 563–578; Hills, Preferred Stockholders' Right to Subscribe to New Shares, 1927, 5 N.Y.L.Rev. 207; Notes, 1913, 13 Col.L.Rev. 146; 1912, 26 Harv.L.Rev. 75; see pages 332 to 355, supra, on preemptive rights.

STONE v. UNITED STATES ENVELOPE CO.

Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1920.
119 Me. 394, 111 A. 536, 13 A.L.R. 422.

On report. This is a bill in equity brought by Carrie M. Stone, one of the holders of common shares in the capital stock of defendant corporation, seeking an injunction to restrain defendants from issuing to the preferred and common stockholders in proportion to the number of shares held by each, 2500 shares of common stock $100 par value. The cause was heard and reported to the Law Court for determination. Bill sustained; decree to be signed by single Justice in accordance with this opinion.

DEASY, J. Equity. The part of the by-laws of the United States Envelope Co. material to the present case is as follows:

"Article XVI. Capital.

"The shares of this corporation shall be divided as follows, viz.: 10,000 common shares, 40,000 preferred shares.

"The preferred shares shall be entitled to cumulative dividends payable semi-annually out of the net earnings of the corporation, at the rate of seven per cent., per annum, before any dividends are declared or paid on the common shares, and in case of non-payment in full of any such semi-annual dividends, the portions unpaid shall be paid out of subsequent net earnings prior to the claims of the common shares, but without interest on deferred payments, and the preferred shares shall have preference over the common shares in any distribution of the assets of the corporation in liquidation."

The by-laws also give to the common and preferred stockholders equal voting power share for share and provided that "any shares of stock not subscribed for at the first meeting may be issued by the Board of Directors." [35]

All the stock has been issued and sold for cash at par except 2500 shares of common stock. A vote has been passed to issue this stock and to offer it to stockholders both common and preferred, in proportion to their holdings, at $150 per share, a price which the case shows to be materially below its value.

The plaintiff holding 1000 shares of the common stock asks that the defendant may be enjoined from carrying this vote into effect on the ground that to give the preferred shareholders a preemptive right to purchase common stock at less than its value is in effect to pay them a dividend in addition to the seven per cent. provided for in the by-laws and which they have received. The defendants contend that the preferred stockholders notwithstanding that they have received their preferential dividends are entitled to share in the surplus equally with the holders of the common stock.

35 Sed quaere, in view of this by-law, may not the directors sell unsubscribed shares to whom they will?

The respective rights of holders of common and preferred stock are fixed by contract. Spear v. Rockland-Rockport Lime Co., 113 Me. 285, 93 A. 754, 6 A.L.R. 793.

The contract is commonly contained in the corporate by-laws. Within wide limitations any preferential rights provided for in the by-laws will be given effect to by courts.

The question at issue in this case relates to the extent and limits of the rights that prima facie belong to preferred stock as such i. e. rights and limitations that, in the absence of express provisions, are implied.

The plaintiff contends that where a say seven per cent. preferred stockholding is created with no stipulation in reference to participation in surplus, the preferred stockholder is entitled to seven per cent., and that all the rest of the profits available for distribution belong to the holders of common stock; on the other hand the defendant says that after payment of the seven per cent. dividend and perhaps an equal dividend upon the common stock, the balance of profits to be distributed must go to all the stockholders both common and preferred in proportion to their holdings and without discrimination.

Both parties present authorities sustaining their respective contentions. There are two opposing theories each of which has judicial support. One theory is that the preferred stockholder presumptively yields nothing in compensation for the benefits which he receives; that he has and holds all the rights of the common shareholder and in addition has his preferential rights. * * *

Independent reasoning as well as what we deem to be the preponderance of authority sustains the plaintiff's position. Words in contracts, as well as in statutes, should ordinarily be construed "according to the common meaning of the language." Surely the phrase "preferred stock" holds out to the ear of the ordinary investor no promise of participation in earnings beyond his preferential dividend. That this is true has been recognized by authorities.

"It is generally assumed that where preferred shares are given a fixed preferential dividend at a specified rate, that impliedly negatives any right to take any further dividends." Palmer's Company Precedents, 11th Ed., 814.

"Preferential shares and stock are ordinarily spoken of and regarded, and I think properly regarded, as shares or stock which carry a fixed preferential dividend and are not entitled to anything more." Will v. United Lankat Plantations Co., L.R. [1912] 2 Ch.Div. 571.

Even Cook whose work on Corporations is repeatedly and confidently cited by the defendant says: "Theoretically it is difficult to justify this conclusion, but practically it is true that the investing public assume and understand that preferred stock is never entitled to more than its specified and fixed dividends." Cook, 7th Ed., § 269 note.

There are disclosed in this case significant circumstances showing that the above opinion harmonizes with the actual intention of the persons interested in the organization of this corporation.

We put the decision however upon the ground that where nothing to the contrary appears the creation of preferred stock prima facie implies that the preferential rights of the stockholder are given in lieu of and to the exclusion of the equality in participation which would otherwise exist.

Some cases indicate a distinction in respect to the relative rights of common and preferred stockholders, between an earned surplus and an "unearned increment" i. e., a surplus arising from an increase in value of corporate property.

It is not necessary to here consider this distinction inasmuch as the surplus in the present case is admittedly an accumulation of corporate earnings.

Bill sustained with costs.

4. CONVERTIBLE PREFERRED STOCK [36]

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW

§ 27. Convertible shares. 1. A stock corporation by its certificate of incorporation or by a certificate pursuant to section thirty-six, may provide that any of its authorized shares, issued or unissued, with or without par value, shall be convertible at the option of the holders thereof into shares of any other class or classes, or into shares of any other series of the same class, with or without par value, upon such terms and conditions and with such limitations as may be stated in the certificate; but no convertible shares so authorized shall be issued, nor shall issued shares be changed into convertible shares, nor shall the conversion privileges of issued convertible shares be changed, unless at the time of such issuance or such change in issued shares the capital represented by the convertible shares plus the additional value, if any, which must be paid upon conversion, is at least equal to the contribution to capital required by law for the shares to be issued pursuant to the conversion.

2. The certificate authorizing the convertible shares may provide for a change in the basis of conversion upon the taking by the corporation of certain action which is specified. Such action shall not be taken, however, or, if taken, shall not be effective, unless after the action has been taken the capital represented by the convertible shares plus the additional value, if any, which must be paid upon conversion for the shares to be issued, is at least equal to the contribution to capital required by law for the shares to be issued pursuant to the conversion.

3. Where any part of the capital of the corporation has not been allocated to any class of shares or consists of amounts transferred to capital by resolution of the board of directors, in determining for the purposes of this section the capital represented by the convertible shares, the board of directors may allocate to the capital represented by any class of convertible shares, all or any part of such unallocated or transferred capital. Such allocation of capital shall be effective solely for the purpose of determining whether the requirements of this section have been complied with, and shall not have any other effect. The capital represented by each convertible share, for the purposes of this section, shall be determined by dividing the total capital represented by all the issued shares of the same class, including any amounts allocated thereto under the provisions of this section, by the number of such issued shares. If the statement respecting capital is that prescribed in paragraph B of subdivision four of section twelve, (a) the capital represented by each class of convertible shares without par value shall be the aggregate amount of consideration received for all the issued shares of such class, together with any other amounts allocated to such class by the directors, and (b) the corporation shall be deemed to have received for the issuance of the shares resulting from the conversion, the amount of the capital of the corporation theretofore represented by the converted shares, plus such part of any additional value paid upon conversion as may be required by the certificate or this section to be capital.

---

[36] See, Berle, Convertible Bonds and Stock Purchase Warrants (1927) 36 Yale L.J. 649; Hills, Convertible Securities-Legal Aspects and Draftsmanship (1930) 19 Calif. L.Rev. 1.

4. No conversion shall result in a reduction of the corporation's capital. So much of the capital represented by converted shares, and any additional value paid to the corporation upon conversion, as together shall equal the contribution to capital required by law for the shares issued pursuant to conversion, shall be deemed to be capital represented by the shares so issued. Any additional capital represented by converted shares, and, if so provided in the certificate, any additional value so paid, also shall be capital, and shall be deemed, in computing the corporation's capital and for the purposes of this section, to have been transferred to capital as if by resolution of the board of directors.

5. Shares which have been converted shall forthwith revert to the status of unissued shares and shall not be reissued. The corporation may eliminate any shares so converted by filing a certificate which shall be entitled and endorsed "Certificate of elimination of converted shares of (name of corporation) pursuant to section twenty-seven of the stock corporation law." Such certificate shall contain the statements prescribed by section thirty-six for like certificates under subdivision (C) of said section and shall be filed as provided in section thirty-eight in respect of certificates under section thirty-six; it need not, however, state the designations, preferences, privileges and voting powers or restrictions or qualifications, of previously authorized shares. The certificate shall be subscribed and acknowledged by the president or a vice president and the secretary or an assistant secretary, who shall make and annex an affidavit stating that they have been authorized to execute and file such certificate by resolution of the board of directors, adopted at a directors' meeting duly called and held on a date specified in such affidavit.

6. The corporation at the time of authorizing convertible shares shall provide for and at all times thereafter shall retain unissued, sufficient shares of appropriate classes to satisfy the conversion privileges of all its issued convertible shares.

7. The corporation shall not in any manner decrease the capital represented by issued convertible shares, nor change such shares nor the shares issuable pursuant to the conversion thereof, nor increase or reduce the number or par value of any such shares, unless thereafter the capital represented by the issued convertible shares plus the additional value, if any, which must be paid upon conversion, shall be at least equal to the contribution to capital required by law for the shares to be issued pursuant to the conversion.

8. Nothing contained in this section shall confer any powers or impose any duties upon moneyed corporations or in any way affect the powers and duties of such corporations.

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW.

§ 13. Classes of stock, supra, p. 224.

MARONY v. WHEELING & LAKE ERIE RAILWAY COMPANY.

District Court of the United States, D. New York, 1929. 33 F.2d 916.

At Law. Action by Robert J. Marony against the Wheeling & Lake Erie Railway Company. On plaintiff's motion to strike out certain allegations of the answer, and defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint. Plaintiff's motion granted, and defendant's motion denied.

BONDY, DISTRICT JUDGE. This action was brought to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by defendant's refusal to convert preferred into common stock. In the two causes of action set forth in the complaint it is alleged that the certificate of incorporation of defendant provides that its preferred stock shall be convertible into common stock, dollar for dollar of par value, and that on presentation and surrender to the corporation at its stock transfer agency of certificates of shares of preferred stock so to be converted, the holder of such stock shall be entitled to receive in exchange therefor certificates for shares of common stock at the rate aforesaid, and that the certificates representing the shares of preferred stock provide likewise that shares of preferred stock are convertible into common stock upon surrender to the company at any transfer agency of the certificates for shares of preferred stock so to be converted. * * *

The statement by the defendant, in its certificate of incorporation and stock certificate, that any holder of preferred stock may convert such stock into common stock, imposed the obligation on defendant to use reasonable diligence to do everything necessary to keep itself in readiness lawfully to comply with its promise to convert its preferred stock on presentation and surrender, and therefore imposed the obligation on it to obtain with diligence the approval of the Commission. * * *

The complaint alleges a breach of contract by the defendant, giving rise to a cause of action. If the plaintiff did anything after the cause of action arose, whereby he waived his right of action or released defendant from liability to him, or ceased to be a party in interest, these facts should be set up as an affirmative defense. * * *

Motion to strike out first affirmative defense is therefore granted, and motion to dismiss complaint denied.

HILLS, GEO. S., "CONVERTIBLE SECURITIES—LEGAL ASPECTS AND DRAFTSMANSHIP" (1931) 19 Calif.L.Rev. 1, 20–22:

"Instruments creating or evidencing the conversion privilege generally anticipate such changes in the corporate structure as might cause a dilution, change or destruction of the privilege, and provide adjustments and restrictions for its protection. Unless protected the conversion privilege may be changed or diluted upon the happening of the following events to the shares issuable upon conversion: A split-up or consolidation of shares; an exchange or substitution of shares; the payment of stock dividends; the issuance of additional shares for less than a fixed consideration; the issuance of other securities convertible into the same class of shares at a lesser rate or price; the issuance of subscription rights with or without a contemporaneous cash dividend; the distribution of assets to the holders of senior securities; or the issuance of other classes of shares having a preference upon redemption, liquidation or dissolution. Furthermore, the privilege may be destroyed upon a consolidation, merger, sale of assets or dissolution unless it is protected in the conversion instrument, by statute, or by the agreement of reorganization.

"There are few decisions on this subject and they are not helpful except as a warning against careless draftsmanship of the conversion instrument. These decisions indicate that the conversion privilege attached to a convertible obligation is subject to dilution and change at the will of the corporation, as the privilege holder is not a stockholder and has no voice in the affairs of the corporation. Mr. Justice Holmes held in a Massachusetts case that the conversion privilege 'imposes no restriction upon the obligor in regard to the issue of new stock, although the issue may be upon such terms as to diminish the value of the right. It is simply an option to take stock as the stock may turn out to be when the time for choice arrives. The bondholder does not become a stockholder by his contract in equity any more than at law.' [37] It has also been held that the holder of a convertible obligation has no vested right or title to any particular shares of stock and is not legally or equitably entitled, upon conversion, to the benefit of an issue of additional shares.[38] Under similar reasoning it has been held that the holder of a convertible bond has no ground of complaint against an adjustment in capitalization amounting practically to the splitting up of shares ten for one,[39] and that a privilege

[37] [Footnotes, author's] Parkinson v. West End Street Ry. Co. (1899) 173 Mass. 446, 53 N.E. 891.

[38] City of Aurora v. Cobb (1863) 21 Ind. 492; Pratt v. American Bell Telephone Co. (1886) 141 Mass. 225, 5 N.E. 307; Gay v. Burgess Mills (1909) 30 R.I. 231, 74 A. 714.

[39] Gay v. Burgess Mills (1909) 30 R.I. 231, 74 A. 714. In that case a corporation having an authorized capitalization of 10,000 shares of the par value of $10 per holder, upon conversion, is not entitled to the benefit of any stock dividends paid prior to the conversion date.[40] There seem to be no related decisions upon the rights of holders of convertible stock, but except as changed by preemptive rights the rules should be the same.

"All convertible obligations of the same issue and all convertible stocks of the same class should be treated alike with respect to adjustments, whether such obligations or shares be outstanding or not at the time adjustments are made. It is a common practice of corporations to have authorized shares of convertible stock not yet issued, and not infrequently to have authorized but unissued convertible obligations. Unless such obligations or shares, when issued, carry the same conversion privilege as all others theretofore issued, confusion is bound to follow as the difference in conversion value would not appear upon the face of the stock certificate or upon the obligation. It is well to provide in the certificate of incorporation that all shares of a class of convertible stock shall be considered to have been issued and to have become outstanding immediately after the incorporation of the company notwithstanding that such shares may actually be issued and become outstanding on a subsequent date. A similar provision may be made for convertible obligations of the same issue in case all of such obligations be not issued at the same time.

"As the law affords no protection, the conversion instrument has taken its place and has covered every contingency within workable limits."

5. CHANGE OF CONTRACT RIGHTS OF PREFERRED STOCK

GOLDMAN v. POSTAL TELEGRAPH, INC.

District Court of the United States, D. Delaware, 1943. 52 F.Supp. 763.

Suit by Sidney Goldman, on behalf of himself and all other non-assenting stockholders, against the Postal Telegraph, Inc., to enforce liquidating rights. On defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a cause of action.

Motion granted.

LEAHY, DISTRICT JUDGE. Diversity and the requisite amount establish jurisdiction.

---

share, and an issue of bonds convertible into 'Ten (10) shares of the Capital Stock of the Burgess Mills of the par value of $10 each,' reduced the par value of its shares from $10 to $1 and then increased the number of its authorized shares from 10,000 to 1,000,000 shares. Proceedings were brought primarily to enjoin the payment of certain dividends, and the corporation offered to issue, upon conversion, 100 shares of the par value of $1 per share in lieu of 10 shares of the par value of $10 per share. The court confirmed the offer, but took occasion to state that the bondholders had no grounds of complaint against a diminishing of the value of the conversion privilege.

[40] Sutliff v. Cleveland & Mahoning R. Co. (1873) 24 Ohio St. 147. A corporation, having outstanding convertible bonds, paid a stock dividend of about 47 per cent on its outstanding shares. The plaintiff demanded conversion of his bond into stock and also demanded the 47 per cent stock dividends theretofore paid, but it was held that he was limited upon conversion to the number of shares designated upon his bond without benefit of the prior stock dividend.

The occasion has never arisen for the Delaware courts to determine where a certificate of incorporation provides a preference stock is to be paid $60 per share upon liquidation before any distribution is to be made to the common stockholders whether an amendment under Sec. 26 of the Delaware Corporation Law [41] which attempts to provide that such preferred stockholder shall receive on dissolution less than the stated figure of $60 a share is valid.[42] Absent a precise holding by the state court, a federal court must examine all the available data as to what the state tribunal would probably decide under such facts.[43]

I. The Plan. Postal Telegraph, Inc., incorporated under the laws of Delaware in 1939 (herein called "Postal"), agreed to transfer to Western Union Telegraph Company (herein called "Western Union"), another Delaware corporation, all its assets. At the time of the agreement plaintiff owned 500 shares of non-cumulative preferred stock of Postal which, by the terms of Postal's certificate of incorporation, entitled all preferred stockholders to a payment of $60 a share on liquidation before any distribution could be made to its common stockholders. On July 5, 1943, defendant Postal proposed to its stockholders three resolutions authorizing (1) the sale of all its assets to Western Union, conditioned upon the approval by Postal's stockholders of an amendment to its certificate of incorporation referred to in (2); (2) the amendment of Postal's certificate of incorporation so as to provide that the holders of defendant's noncumulative preferred stock would receive in lieu of $60 per share on liquidation one share of Western Union B stock;[44] and (3) formal dissolution of Postal. At the stock-

---

41 Rev.Code of Delaware of 1935, c. 65, Sec. 2058, p. 469.

42 The proposition was present in the plan approved by the Delaware Supreme Court in Shanik v. White Sewing Machine Corp., Del.Ch., 19 A.2d 831, but, in fairness to the Delaware courts and counsel for plaintiff in that case who are also counsel for plaintiff in the case at bar, the proposition raised here was not even suggested in Shanik.

43 It has been suggested, however, that the federal courts do not look to the state law where the corporate action taken constitutes a destruction of a right secured by the federal Constitution. See, Hottenstein v. York Ice Machinery Corp., 3 Cir., 136 F.2d 944, at page 953.

Whether the right affected in the case at bar falls within the dicta of the Hottenstein case will be discussed and ruled on in this opinion.

44 Prior to the amendment under Sec. 26, the provisions of Postal's certificate of incorporation with respect to the liquidating rights of the non-cumulative preferred stock provided: "(e) In the event of any liquidation, dissolution or winding up of the affairs of the Corporation, whether voluntary or involuntary, the holders of shares of the Non-Cumulative Preferred Stock shall be entitled to be paid, before any distribution or payment shall be made to the holders of the Common Stock or of any other class of stock ranking junior to the Non-Cumulative Preferred Stock, $60 per share plus all unpaid dividends thereon to the extent that the same shall be deemed to have been earned, as provided in subdivision (a) hereof, to the date of payment. In the event that at such date of payment the amount, if any, of the dividends deemed to have been earned on the shares of the Non-Cumulative Preferred Stock for the period between the dividend payment date next preceding such date of payment and such date of payment cannot be determined, dividends on the shares of Non-Cumulative Preferred Stock shall be deemed to have been earned at the full rate of $2.40 per share per annum for such period.

"After the making of such payment to the holders of the Non-Cumulative Preferred Stock, the remaining assets and funds of the Corporation shall be distributed among the holders of the Common Stock and of all other classes of stock ranking junior to the Non-Cumulative Preferred Stock according to their respective rights and shares. If, upon any such liquidation, dissolution or winding up of the affairs of the Corporation, whether voluntary or involuntary, the assets of the Corporation holders' meeting held on August 10, 1943, these resolutions were passed by a requisite vote over plaintiff's express objection. This suit followed.

The Postal-Western Union agreement provides that for the transfer of all the assets of Postal to Western Union, Postal will receive as part consideration 308,124 shares of Class B stock of Western Union. The entire amount of Class B stock to be received from Western Union will have a value substantially less than the aggregate liquidation preference of the preferred stock of Postal. Consequently, under its certificate of incorporation Postal's common stockholders—whose equity is deeply under water—would be entitled to receive nothing if ordinary liquidation occurred. Subject to various adjustments which do not have my immediate attention, Western Union will assume approximately $10,800,000 of Postal's liabilities. Postal's economic position is shown by its steady losses, aggregating over $13,500,000 from February 1, 1940, to May 31, 1943. These losses have been financed, in part, by advances from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. In facing further corporate existence, two courses were open to Postal: (a) To submit to government ownership or (b) to seek some type of merger with or absorption by Western Union.

In order to complete the proposed transfer of assets to Western shall not be sufficient to provide payment in full of the amounts to which the holders of the Non-Cumulative Preferred Stock shall be so entitled, the amount distributable to the holders of all shares of the Non-Cumulative Preferred Stock shall be apportioned among them ratably, in proportion to the amounts to which they are respectively entitled."

---

The certificate of incorporation as amended provides: "(e) In the event of any liquidation, dissolution or winding up of the affairs of the Corporation, whether voluntary or involuntary, the holders of shares of the Non-Cumulative Preferred Stock shall be entitled to be paid, before any distribution or payment shall be made to the holders of the Common Stock or of any other class of stock ranking junior to the Non-Cumulative Preferred Stock, $60 per share plus all unpaid dividends thereon to the extent that the same shall be deemed to have been earned, as provided in subdivision (a) hereof, to the date of payment. In the event that at such date of payment the amount, if any, of the dividends deemed to have been earned on the shares of the Non-Cumulative Preferred Stock for the period between the dividend payment date next preceding such date of payment and such date of payment cannot be determined, dividends on the shares of Non-Cumulative Preferred Stock shall be deemed to have been earned at the full rate of $2.40 per share per annum for such period.

"Provided, however, that notwithstanding the provisions of the next preceding paragraph in this subdivision (e) contained, if substantially all of the assets of the Corporation or of its operating subsidiaries are sold to the Western Union Telegraph Company then upon any liquidation, dissolution or winding up of the affairs of the Corporation the holders of shares of the Non-Cumulative Preferred Stock shall be entitled to receive for each share out of the assets of the Corporation (in lieu of the cash payments in said next preceding paragraph specified) one share of the Class B Stock of The Western Union Telegraph Company before any distribution or payment shall be made to the holders of shares of Common Stock; but they shall be entitled to no further or other participation in any distribution or payment.

"After the making of such payment to the holders of the Non-Cumulative Preferred Stock, the remaining assets and funds of the Corporation shall be distributed among the holders of the Common Stock and of all other classes of stock ranking junior to the Non-Cumulative Preferred Stock according to their respective rights and shares. If, upon any such liquidation, dissolution or winding up of the affairs of the Corporation, whether voluntary or involuntary, the assets of the Corporation shall not be sufficient to provide payment in full of the amounts to which the holders of the Non-Cumulative Preferred Stock shall be so entitled, the amount distributable to the holders of all shares of the Non-Cumulative Preferred Stock shall be apportioned among them ratably, in proportion to the amounts to which they are respectively entitled." (Italics supplied.)

Union, the vote of a majority of the outstanding stock of Postal was required under the Delaware law, sec. 65. See Rev.Code of Delaware of 1935, c. 65, Sec. 2097. Postal's outstanding preferred was 256,769.9 and the number of shares of common was 1,027,076.6. Hence, if all the preferred voted in favor of the plan, it would still be necessary to obtain the affirmative vote of approximately 400,000 shares of common. In order to obtain such vote, Postal's directors determined it advisable that the preferred's rights on liquidation be modified, so as to provide that out of the 308,124 shares of Class B stock of Western Union to be received by Postal, 256,770 shares would be distributed share for share for each of Postal's preferred and the balance of the Class B—51,354 shares—would be distributed to Postal's common stockholders, which was to be in the ratio of 1/20 of a share of Class B Western Union stock for each share of common stock of Postal.

As part of the plan, Western Union would also change its present 1,045,592 shares of capital stock into an equal number of shares of Class A stock without par value, which stock would be entitled to a non-cumulative dividend of $2 per share in each year before any dividends could be paid upon the Class B stock. After such dividend payment, the Class A and Class B stock are to participate on an equal basis in any dividends. I shall not pause, at this moment, to discuss certain collateral factors which entered into the considerations for the adoption of the plan, such as the former duplication of Postal's facilities with those of Western Union, the elimination of competitive factors, the more efficient utilization of personnel and equipment, the reduction of expense, improved service to the public, or the more effective means to compete with other methods of communication.

Plaintiff here seeks, on behalf of himself and all other non-assenting shareholders,[45] to enforce the liquidating rights which he contends are secured to him by the certificate of incorporation of Postal prior to the adoption of the resolution to amend it under Sec. 26. Defendant moved to dismiss on the ground that the complaint failed to state a cause of action.

Two issues are raised by the pleadings: (1) Whether the amendment to Postal's certificate of incorporation is authorized under Sec. 26 of the Delaware Corporation Law, and (2) if Sec. 26 authorizes the present amendment whether the statute to this extent is constitutional.

II. The Delaware Law. The national and Delaware bars generally together with the legal literature[46] especially have been unwilling to look directly at the radiations from the Delaware opinions which disclose what reclassification acts may be accomplished under Sec. 26 of the Delaware Corporation Law.

After much contemplation I concluded this is not the occasion to

---

45 In addition to plaintiff's 500 shares, several hundred other shares are opposed to the plan.

46 The Delaware decisions, as well as the decisions of other states and federal courts, involving corporate action taken under the Delaware statutes are discussed at length in Meck, Accrued Dividends on Cumulative Preferred Stocks: The Legal Doctrine, 55 Harv.L.Rev. 77; Dodd, Fair and Equitable Recapitalizations, 55 Harv. L.Rev. 780; Latty, Fairness—The Focal Point in Preferred Stock Arrearage Elimination, 29 Vir.L.Rev. See, too, Note: Corporate Recapitalization By Charter Amendment, 46 Yale L.Jour. 985.

trace in limine the growth of the Delaware law in the field of corporate reclassification or rearrangement of stockholders' rights in order to show the development of a logical pattern of judicial thought on this and allied questions. Because the Delaware decisions are so crystalline in outline, I am mildly surprised there could be disagreement of interpretation as to just what may not be accomplished under the corporation statutes of that state.

Defendant's certificate of incorporation provides that, in the event of liquidation or dissolution, the holders of preferred stock are entitled to be paid $60 per share, plus all unpaid dividends (of which there are none), before any distribution is made to the holders of the common or junior stock. Sec. 26 provides that an amendment to a certificate of incorporation may alter or change "preferences" theretofore provided for a preferred stock, if the vote of a requisite majority is had. Because at common law, in the absence of agreement to the contrary, all shares of stock, by whatever name they may be known, stand upon an equal footing, preferences, being in derogation of the common law rule, must be strictly construed. Gaskill v. Gladys Belle Oil Co., 16 Del.Ch. 289, 146 A. 337; Machen, Corporations, Sec. 517. Historically, preferential rights consist generally of two classes of preferences, viz.: (1) Preferences as to dividends and (2) preferences in distribution of assets upon liquidation, or winding-up.[47]

The right of preferred to priority in distribution of assets upon liquidation is clearly a preferential right within the meaning of the Delaware statutes. In Morris v. American Public Utilities Co., 14 Del.Ch. 136, 122 A. 696, 705, there was involved the right to reduce by amendment the redemption price of preferred stock from $105 per share to $100, the par value of the shares. In holding the amendment valid, the late Chancellor Wolcott wrote: "Whether such a change may be said to be the alteration of a preference within the meaning of, and therefore authorized by, section 26 I need not pause to consider, for section 13, which authorizes the issuance of preferred stock supplies sufficient authority for the change here involved. That section provides that any or all classes of preferred stock may be made subject to redemption at such price not less than par 'as may be expressed in the certificate of incorporation or an amendment thereof'". The Morris case is, in principle, applicable, since an analogous provision exists in Sec. 13 (Rev.Code of Delaware of 1935, c. 65, Sec. 2045, p. 464) with respect to the rights of the holders of the preferred stock upon distribution of assets. Sec. 13, after providing that every corporation shall have the right to issue one or more classes of stock with such preferences as may be stated and expressed in the certificate of incorporation or any amendment thereto, provides that "The holders of the preferred or special stock of any class or of any series thereof shall be entitled to such rights upon the dissolution of, or upon any distribution of the assets of, the corporation as shall be stated and expressed in the Certificate of Incorporation, or any amendment thereto * * *." (Italics supplied.)

---

[47] In Starring v. American Hair & Felt Co., 21 Del. Ch. 380, 191 A. 887, 890, affirmed 21 Del. Ch. 431, 2 A.2d 249, it was said: "It [preferred stock] is of course a stock which in relation to other classes enjoys certain defined rights and privileges. These rights and privileges are generally associated with specified dividend and liquidation priorities." See, too, Garrett v. Edge Moor Iron Co., 22 Del. Ch. 142, 194 A. 15, affirmed sub nom. Pennsylvania, etc., Co. v. Cox, 23 Del. Ch. 193, 199 A. 671.

It plainly appears, therefore, that Sec. 13 contemplates such rights are subject to amendment under Sec. 26. As the right of the preferred stockholder here involved is a preferential right within the meaning of the Delaware Corporation Law (i.e., the stock is preferred on dissolution), I hold such right is subject to the amendment here involved under the particular language of Sec. 26. Peters v. United States Mortgage Co., 13 Del.Ch. 11, 114 A. 598.

III. The Constitutional Question. Plaintiff's main contention is that if Sec. 26 authorizes the action taken by Postal it is unconstitutional, because such action will result in the destruction of what plaintiff calls his "vested" or "property" rights. Obviously, the determination of this question depends upon whether one accepts or rejects plaintiff's primary postulate of what is a "vested" or "property" right.

A person buying into a Delaware business corporation does so subject to the provisions of the particular charter and the Delaware Corporation Law. Delaware law assumes such person realizes Sec. 26 provides that preferences may be changed by a requisite majority vote. And preferred stockholders of a Delaware corporation when they buy into the particular enterprise accordingly consent in advance that whatever their preferences may be at the time they are subject to change by vote of the proper majority. See Morris v. American Public Utilities Co., and Peters v. United States Mortgage Co., supra. This is not a harsh rule. When parties purchase preferred stock in Delaware corporations, they are charged with knowledge that Secs. 13 and 26, as well as other sections, are impliedly written into their charter, Peters v. United States Mortgage Co., supra.[48] It is one of the fundamental concepts of the Delaware law that protection is afforded against arbitrary action in the requirement that a majority of those affected by the amendment must vote in favor of it. This democratic principle, based, in reality, on a worldly or practical necessity, is that the voice of a majority must be accepted as an expression of what is best for the whole. Moreover, another concept established by the Delaware decisions is that, assuming a grant of power by statute, the action proposed by the majority is not clothed thereby with a superior sanctity vesting such power with the attributes of tyranny. The exercise of such grant is always subject to the historical processes of the court of equity to gauge whether there has been an oppressive exercise of the power granted, Allied Chem. & Dye Corp. v. Steel & Tube Co., 14 Del.Ch. 1, 11, 12, 120 A. 486. This is "fair and equitable" language. Where, as here, it is admitted there are no questions of unfairness involved, the only question remaining is one of classic constitutionality, involving only the contract clause and due process. * * *

It is clear on principle there can be no constitutional objections to [48] To say that in fact they have no such knowledge is to ask the courts to indulge in a judicial paternalism that would be limitless. Fixity of legal principle would then be required to give way to judge-made theory of what should constitute corporate-stockholder cricket.

---

the present amendment. Since the corporation is the creature of the state, and since the corporation law is a part of the corporate charter (Peters v. United States Mortgage Co., supra), it is self-evident the state has the right to reserve to itself, or a majority or more of the stockholders, the power to change the contract between the corporation and its stockholders or between its different classes of stockholders by an amendment to the charter after such contracts are made, even if a particular class of stockholders must suffer slightly. If a rationale is sought for this reservation of power, then a more cogent reason than that which exists in the case at bar would be difficult to find. Here, the public interest has a stake. We are concerned with two of the great communicating systems of this country. Duplicity of effort gone, an attendant increase in efficiency and decrease in waste will naturally make the public beneficiaries, in part, by the absorption of Postal by Western Union. Viewed against the undoubted reservation of right by the state and the public interest involved, changes in liquidating preferences seem mild.

One reason why plaintiff has misinterpreted the Keller and Consolidated Film cases is that if plaintiff is right, those cases, in effect, overruled Morris v. American Public Utilities Co., and Peters v. United States Mortgage Co., supra, because there is no difference in substance in the nature of the rights involved in the various situations. I do not think the Delaware courts intended to overrule those cases in such indirect fashion.[49] For example, in Shanik v. White Sewing Machine Corp., Del.Ch., 19 A.2d 831, a plan was not disapproved which involved an amendment specifically reducing liquidating preferences, e. g., the old preferred was reduced on dissolution from $50 to $25.[50] * * *

Plaintiff argues, however, that execution of the contract of sale of assets by Postal and Western Union on May 13, 1943, gave to preferred a present right to payment of $60 per share, and that its right to such payment on dissolution or liquidation then became a "fixed and vested right". But, the agreement of May 13, 1943, was not binding upon Postal, since by its terms it called for authorization by the vote of its stockholders. Allied Chemical & Dye Corp. v. Steel & Tube Co., supra. A sale of assets does not constitute a dissolution or necessarily call for a liquidation. Cleveland Worsted Mills Co. v. Consolidated Textile Corp., 3 Cir., 292 F. 129. Here, Postal might have continued to hold the Class B shares of stock of Western Union without distribution to its stockholders. In fact, such a course was suggested in its proxy statement which it sent to all its stockholders.

---

[49] It is interesting to speculate that, in some situations, if the doctrine of the above cases has not been overruled by indirection, the result sought to be achieved in Keller v. Wilson can now be accomplished by sufficiently reducing the liquidating preferences other than the amount due for unpaid and accrued dividends by amendment under Section 26. This would not require appraisal and since the corporation has the power there can be no question of validity, Federal United v. Havender United Corp., Del.Ch., 11 A.2d 331; Shanik v. White Sewing Machine Corp., Del.Ch., 19 A.2d 831, in the absence of fraud. See Porges v. Vadsco Sales Corporation, Del. Ch., 32 A.2d 148.

[50] See footnote 42, supra, for the proposition that, perhaps, the Shanik case may not be said to have contained such a precise holding.

I conclude the execution of the May 13, 1943, contract for sale of assets to Western Union did not accelerate the preferential right of Postal's preferred stockholders to $60 a share on dissolution into a "vested right" which could not thereafter be altered by amendment under Sec. 26. * * *

Accordingly, I conclude for the reasons hereinabove mentioned that defendant's motion to dismiss has merit. A form of decree for my consideration may be submitted upon notice.

(a) Reclassification or Amendment of Charter

(For New York and Delaware Statutes, see infra, p. 1329)

NOTE

(A) New York Stock Corporation Law, §§ 36–38, provides that any stock corporation may authorize the issue of new shares of any class of stock, may classify or reclassify[51] any shares of stock, and may issue preferred shares from time to time[52] by filing a certificate stating the proposed change and its authorization by a two-thirds vote[53] of the holders of the outstanding voting shares at a stockholders' meeting held for the purpose. Any holder of preferred stock who does not vote in favor of the alteration of preferential rights of any outstanding shares, may object in writing to such alteration, demand payment for his stock and have it appraised and paid for pursuant to statute.[54]

(B) "It has been held that an amendment authorizing the issue of preferred stock is valid. Although the effect of such an amendment is to place the common stockholders in an inferior position, the results reached in these cases would seem to be sound. The ordinary corporation has implied power to mortgage, and the effect on a common stockholder of an issue of preferred stock is hardly more serious than is the effect of mortgage bonds. It would seem, however, that, if the preferred stock has voting rights, the issue ought not to be permitted to be made without giving the common stockholders preemptive rights to subscribe thereto." Dodd, Dissenting Stockholders and Amendments to Corporate Charters, 1927, 75 U. of Pa. L.Rev. 585 and 723, 732–733. See, also, Curran, Minority Stockholders and The Amendment of Corporate Charters, 1934, 32 Mich.L.Rev. 743, esp. 765 et seq.; Levy, Rights of Dissenting Stockholders to Appraisal and Payment, 1930, 15 Corn. L.Q. 420. To the effect that a corporation may amend its certificate to create cumulative prior preference stock having priority over existing preferred stock in respect of principal and dividends, see Note, 1925, 11 Corn.L.Q. 78.

---

[51] Notes, 1933, 42 Yale L.J. 952; 1938, 38 Col.L.Rev. 511, deal with reclassification of outstanding stock.

[52] Cf. N.Y.Stock Corporation Law, § 11, supra, p. 223.

[53] See, also, N.Y.Stock Corporation Law, § 51, infra, p. 1121.

[54] Cf. Cal.Civil Code, §§ 362, 362a(5); Sterling, Amendments to California Corporation Laws, 1937: Readjusting Stock Structure, 1937, 26 Calif.L.Rev. 76, 76–83; Del. Rev.Code 1935, § 26 (only majority vote necessary to effect a change in share structure; no provision for appraisal and sale of shares of dissenting stockholders); Ill.Business Corporation Act 1933, §§ 52, 53, Smith-Hurd Stats. c. 48, §§ 157.52, 157.53; N.J.Rev.S.A. 14:11–1(i), 14:11–2, 14:11–4; Pa.Business Corporation Law 1933, §§ 801–809, 15 P.S.Pa. §§ 2852–801 to 2852–809. None of these statutes contain any provision for appraisal and sale to the corporation of shares of dissenting stockholders; some of them provide only for a majority vote of all the outstanding shares, some for a majority of the voting shares, and some, like New York, require a two-thirds approval of the proposed amendment.

WHEATLEY et al. v. A. I. ROOT CO. et al.

Supreme Court of Ohio, 1946. 147 Ohio St. 127, 69 N.E.2d 187.

Action by Mary Wheatley and others against the A. I. Root Co. and others to enjoin defendants from carrying out a proposed plan of recapitalization. The Court of Common Pleas found for defendants and an appeal was taken to the Court of Appeals, and the cause came before the Supreme Court upon allowance of motions to certify the record of the Court of Appeals submitted by plaintiffs and defendants.—[Editorial Statement.]

Affirmed in part and reversed in part, and cause remanded. * * *

MATTHIAS, JUDGE. The parties to this action agree that the purpose and object of the proposed "plan of recapitalization," among others, was the alteration of the original agreement made by the corporation with the preferred shareholders, which agreement, incorporated in both the articles of incorporation and the certificates of shares, provided that the holders of such preferred shares were entitled to receive dividends on such shares of five per cent per annum annually out of the surplus profits of the company for each year, in preference to all other shareholders, and that such dividends should be cumulative.

The record in this case shows that as of July 31, 1943, which date was prior to the recapitalization, the financial statement of the corporation stated the earned surplus account as follows:

Balance at August 1, 1942	$42,584.43
Balance transferred from profit and loss	52,480.96
	$95,065.39
Dividends paid cash:
First preferred—$6.25 per share	$17,062.50
Balance at July 31, 1943	$78,002.89

The record shows also that as of July 31, 1944, after the recapitalization had been carried out, the first preferred five-per-cent cumulative shares having been canceled, and the 2,750 shares of five-per-cent noncumulative preferred shares and the 2,750 shares of class A common stock issued in place thereof, the earned surplus account stood as follows:

Balance at August 1, 1943		$ 78,002.89
Balance for the year transferred from profit and loss		31,260.65
		$109,263.54
Cash distribution and dividends:
On first preferred—5% cumulative stock (changed under plan of recapitalization)—$11.25 per share (includes $10 special distribution under plan)	$30,543.75

On preferred 5% noncumulative stock—$2.50 per share..........	6,787.50	$ 37,331.25
Balance at July 31, 1944		$ 71,932.29

A comparison of these financial statements clearly discloses the effect of the plan of recapitalization. As of July 31, 1943, there was in the earned surplus account the sum of $78,002.89 to which the holders of preferred shares had a preference in that their unpaid cumulative dividends were to be paid from such funds before any dividends could be declared and paid to the holders of the common shares. As of July 31, 1944, there remained in the earned-surplus account the sum of $71,932.29, but the holders of the first preferred shares no longer had a claim thereto for their cumulative unpaid dividends, for the reason that such sum became available for distribution to the holders of the common shares subject only to the requirement of payment of current dividends upon preferred shares.

To succinctly state the proposition presented: The preferred shareholders were required to accept additional shares of stock, and the common shareholders were accorded the right to the accumulated earnings.

The plan of recapitalization is alleged to have been evolved pursuant to and in conformity with the provisions of Sections 8623-14, 8623-15 and 8623-72, General Code. Counsel for the defendants concede that the effect of the proposed plan is "to adjust and eliminate undeclared cumulated dividends of $50 per share on the preferred shares and to recapitalize the company."

The general corporation laws of Ohio were revised, consolidated and codified in 1927, 112 Ohio Laws, 9; in 1929, 113 Ohio Laws, 413 extensive amendments were made; and again in 1939, 118 Ohio Laws, 177.

These statutory provisions expressly conferred upon corporations the power to make substantial amendments to their articles of incorporation, which amendments were not theretofore authorized, particularly by changes in the classes of outstanding and issued shares of stock, and provided a specific remedy by way of appraisal and ascertainment of the fair cash value of shares held by any dissenting shareholder and payment therefor upon demand. The amendment of 1939 expressly authorizes a corporation to "change any or all of the express terms and provisions or designations of issued or unissued shares of any class or series; which change, if desired, may include the discharge, adjustment or elimination of rights to accrued undeclared cumulative dividends on any such class" Section 8623-14 (3) (i), General Code.

The plan of recapitalization involved in this proceeding was proposed and effectuated after the 1939 amendment, and neither party complains of any failure to fully comply with the requirements of the statutes. The issue here presented arises out of the claim of the plaintiffs that these statutes, as amended in 1939, can have no application to their shares; that the plan of recapitalization requires a retroactive application of the terms of these statutory provisions; that no plan is valid which affects their rights under their contract to earnings accumulated either before or subsequent to the effective date of the 1939 amendment; and that, therefore, the action of the Court of Appeals in holding that these statutes affected such rights of the plaintiff to dividends accruing after 1939 is erroneous.

On the other hand the defendants claim that the plan of recapitalization was fully authorized and that all cumulative dividends were thereby legally canceled. They further claim that the Court of Appeals erred in holding that only the cancellation of dividends accruing subsequent to 1939 is valid and lawful.

The authority granted by Section 8623-14(3) (i), General Code, is clear and unambiguous and is sufficiently broad to authorize the cancellation of dividends accruing either previous or subsequent to the effective date of that section.

It is clear that the particular effect of the consummation of the plan is to cancel the obligation of the corporation to pay to the preferred shareholders the unpaid cumulative dividends and to abolish the preferential rights of such shareholders, specified not only in their respective certificates of stock but also in the articles of incorporation under which the stock was issued. Therefore, the question of law presented is whether the provisions of the statute referred to may be applied retroactively to authorize a plan, the effect of which will be to revoke the contractual rights of preferred shareholders whose shares were subscribed for prior to the enactment of those statutes.

It is pointed out that the protective provisions of the contract involved herein are limited to cumulative dividend rights in earnings with priority over the common shares, priority rights in distribution of assets over the common shares in event of dissolution, and the right to par plus accrued dividends upon redemption. Such preferred shares are excluded from participation in the selection of the directors, and further there is no provision for a sinking fund for the redemption of the preferred shares, no restriction upon debts or encumbrances and no limitation upon the relative amounts of preferred and common shares. From these facts it is logically argued that the elimination of the cumulative-dividend provision would result in a serious impairment of the value of the shares and possibly even make them less desirable than the common. The conclusion is irresistible that the compulsory provision of the proposed plan would deprive the preferred shareholders of accrued dividends and require a sacrifice of the benefits secured to them by their contract.

If such retroactive legislation may be justified under the Constitution of Ohio, such justification must result from the application of the so-called "reserved power" provision as found in Section 2, Article XIII. This section provides as follows: "Corporations may be formed under general laws; but all such laws may, from time to time, be altered or repealed. * * * "

It is difficult to see how this specific grant of authority to alter or repeal corporation laws exceeds or differs from the power conferred upon the General Assembly by provisions of Section 1, Article II of the Constitution. Under the authority thereby conferred, the General Assembly unquestionably has the power to alter or repeal any statute theretofore enacted by it. The power and the authority of the legislative body, however, has specific and absolute limitations under the Ohio Constitution. It is specifically provided by Section 28, Article II of the Ohio Constitution that "The general assembly shall have no power to pass retroactive laws, or laws impairing the obligation of contracts * * *."

The provision of Section 19, Article I of the Ohio Constitution precludes the taking of private property even for public purposes except as therein provided.

The preferential rights of the plaintiffs to the accrued unpaid dividends under their contract were vested and absolute as between the parties and enforceable in a court of law until the corporation, a party to the contract, undertook to abolish and eliminate such rights of the preferred shareholders to the gain and profit of the common shareholders.

The constitutional limitations upon the power of the General Assembly to pass retroactive laws or laws impairing the obligation of contracts apply most aptly and with particular force to the present situation. If Section 8623-14(3) (i), General Code, were applied to the contract of these preferred shareholders the result would be to completely abrogate their contract, deprive them of the benefit thereof and presumably secured thereby, and enrich the holders of the common shares by transferring to them the outright ownership of the accumulated earnings in which, under the terms of their contract, the preferred shareholders had vested rights. * * *

There could be no basis for the contention in this case that the statutory provisions involved herein were enacted for or in fact served any public purpose. The provisions of the proposed plan, insofar as they undertake a retroactive application of these statutory provisions and thus impair the contract of the preferred shareholders and thereby deprive them of the rights stipulated therein, are invalid.

It should be observed that no question relative to the prospective application of these statutes is presented, and, therefore, is not considered or decided.

This being a class suit as defined by Section 11257, General Code, it was properly brought by plaintiffs for themselves and on behalf of those similarly situated. See Haggerty v. Squire, Supt. of Banks, 137 Ohio St. 207, 28 N.E.2d 554, where it was held in paragraph two of the syllabus:

"Where a number of persons have separate and individual claims and rights of action against the same party, but all such claims arise from a common source and represent a like interest, the whole matter may be litigated in a single action brought by all of the claimants as co-plaintiffs, or, in case the parties are numerous making it impracticable to bring them all before the court, by one or more of them suing for himself or themselves and on behalf of the other claimants."

The Court of Appeals held that the factual situation attending the acquisition of the preferred shares differed in each case as to the time of purchase, and that as to the various shareholders, different claims and defenses would be involved, and, therefore, the shareholders did not properly constitute a class for which a suit may be brought. However, the record shows that the parties, themselves, by stipulation in the Court of Common Pleas divided the preferred shareholders into classes in accordance with the attitude of each as to consent, acquiescence or opposition in connection with the recapitalization. The Court of Common Pleas, by reason of its dismissal of the petition of the applicants, did not consider the respective rights of these classes.

The determination of the question as to who constituted the class of shareholders "similarly situated" with the plaintiffs being undetermined, the case is remanded to the Court of Appeals for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion. In the respect indicated, the decree of the Court of Appeals is reversed and the cause remanded to that court.

Decree affirmed in part and reversed in part.

ANDERSON v. INTERNATIONAL MINERAL & CHEMICAL CORPORATION.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1946. 295 N.Y. 343, 67 N.E.2d 573.

Action by William C. Anderson, suing on behalf of himself and such other stockholders similarly situated as might choose to come in and contribute to the expense of the action, against the International Minerals & Chemical Corporation to require defendant to pay dividends on stock, for injunctive relief against paying dividends on any stock of consolidated corporation until plaintiff and others participating had been paid on their stock, and for other relief. From a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court entered December 18, 1945, affirming by divided court, 269 App.Div. 1017, 59 N.Y.S.2d 146, a judgment of the Supreme Court in favor of defendant, entered in New York County upon a decision of the court on a trial at Special Term, Schreiber, J., dismissing the complaint on the merits, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

THACHER, JUDGE. We are concerned in this case with the merger and consolidation of International Agricultural Corporation, a New York corporation, and Union Potash & Chemical Company, a Colorado corporation. These companies were consolidated pursuant to section 91 of article 8 of the New York Stock Corporation Law, Consol. Laws, c. 59, and the defendant, International Minerals & Chemical Corporation, organized under the laws of the State of New York, is the consolidated or continuing company resulting from the merger of the two constituent companies.

The plaintiff, William C. Anderson, owner and holder of 500 shares of 7% prior preference cumulative stock of International Agricultural Corporation, did not vote his stock for or against the merger and consolidation nor was he present or represented by proxy at the meeting of the shareholders of this company on March 30, 1942, when resolutions were adopted by the vote of more than two thirds of the issued and outstanding shares of each class of stock. These resolutions authorized the consolidation and merger of the two companies upon the terms set forth in the certificate of consolidation and agreement of merger. It was provided therein that each share of the 7% prior preference cumulative stock of International Agricultural, including all accumulated and unpaid dividend arrears thereon, was converted into one share of the 4% cumulative preferred stock and three and one-half shares of the common stock of the continuing corporation. At the time of the consolidation these dividend arrears aggregated $95 per share. The holders of the original common stock were to receive for each share of the old stock held by them one fourth of one share of new common stock. Action authorizing the consolidation and merger was taken by the Union Potash & Chemical Company as permitted by and in compliance with the laws of Colorado and also in compliance with section 91 of article 8 of the New York Stock Corporation Law. The merger and consolidation were consummated by filing the certificate of consolidation with the Secretary of State of New York and by filing the agreement of merger with the Secretary of State of Colorado.

Plaintiff received notice of the special meeting, presenting the details of the proposed consolidation and merger, more than five weeks before the meeting, a follow-up notice ten days before the meeting and knew of the consolidation proceeding at all times.

On April 7, 1942, the day after the consolidation was consummated by filing certificates of consolidation with the Secretaries of State in the two States, plaintiff was requested to present his old shares for exchange for the new shares. On June 1, 1942, a dividend of a $1 per share upon the new cumulative preferred stock was declared and plaintiff was again requested to present his old stock for exchange. On June 30, 1942, plaintiff received a similar request advising him that there had been forwarded under separate cover a check in the amount of $1 per share covering the first quarterly dividend on the 4% cumulative preferred stock to which he was entitled. This check was received, indorsed and cashed for plaintiff's account.

Subdivision 7 of section 91 of article 8 of the Stock Corporation Law provides that: "Any stockholder of a domestic corporation included in such consolidation, not voting in favor thereof, may object to such consolidation and demand payment for his stock, at any time prior to the vote, * * *. The objecting stockholder or the corporation shall have the right to have such stock appraised and paid for in the manner provided, and subject to the conditions imposed by section twenty-one. * * *"

Plaintiff never made demand under these provisions of the law and did not object to the proposed consolidation until almost three months after the first dividend check on the new 4% cumulative preferred stock had been received and cashed for his account. Under date of September 22, 1942, plaintiff wrote the following letter to the defendant corporation:

"I have just returned from the country where I have been since the latter part of June. I have just learned that in my absence a check for $500.00 was mailed to me purporting to be a dividend on shares of 4% cumulative preferred stock of your corporation. I have further learned that without any knowledge on my part and without any authorization from me said check was deposited in my account.

"Please be advised that I do not own any of the shares on which the check above mentioned purports to be a dividend and I therefore return herewith my check for $500.00 to the order of your company in repayment of the amount mistakenly sent me and deposited in my account in error while I was away."

Thereafter this action commenced. The amended complaint alleges that plaintiff is the owner and holder of 500 shares of the 7% prior preference cumulative stock, acquired during the years 1931 and 1932 and held and owned by him at all times since; that at the time of the consolidation and merger there were accumulated and unpaid dividends on the 7% prior preference cumulative stock of approximately $95 a share; that under the terms of the consolidation holders of the 100,000 shares of 7% prior preference cumulative stock were to receive in place of each of their shares and the accumulated dividends thereon one share of 4% cumulative preferred stock and three and one half shares of common stock of the consolidated corporation, and that upon receipt of the new securities the right to accumulated dividends amounting to $47,500 on plaintiff's 500 shares was to be canceled and extinguished. The relief prayed for includes judgment that defendant's action was void and unenforcible as to accumulated dividends on plaintiff's shares and similar shares of others who come in and contribute to the expense of the action and that such dividends be paid to plaintiff and others participating with him in the lawsuit. Injunctive relief is also requested against paying any dividends on any stock of the consolidated corporation until plaintiff and others participating have been paid the accumulated dividends on their 7% prior preference shares of the International Agricultural Corporation shares.

Plaintiff relies upon decisions in cases involving the reclassification of shares under article 4 of the Stock Corporation Law prior to its amendment in 1943, L.1943, ch. 600, and particularly upon Davison v. Parke, Austin & Lipscomb, Inc., 285 N.Y. 500, 35 N.E.2d 618, where we held that sections 36 and 38 of that article, before their amendment, did not confer power to deprive preferred shareholders of accumulated dividends without their consent. Under those sections of the law the right of a shareholder to object to a reclassification of capital stock and demand an appraisal was quite restricted. Matter of Kinney, 279 N.Y. 423, 18 N.E.2d 645; Matter of Duer, 270 N.Y. 343, 1 N.E.2d 457; Matter of Dresser, 247 N.Y. 553, 161 N.E. 179; cf. Matter of Silberkraus, 250 N.Y. 242, 165 N.E. 279, 78 A.L.R. 1113. The reclassification provisions of the statute as then written did not contemplate or expressly provide for reclassification which deprived shareholders of accumulated dividends. The reclassification provided for, therefore, presented problems very different from the problems of reorganization and merger which necessarily involve exchange of shares in an old company, with all their rights, for new shares with new rights in a new company. Our decision in the Davison case, supra, dealing with reclassification under the statute, before its amendment, went upon the failure of the statute to provide for a reclassification of shares which involved surrender of accumulated dividends. As a result of this decision the statute was amended to so provide.[55] * * * [Complaint dismissed.]

KELLER v. WILSON & COMPANY et al.[56]

Supreme Court of Delaware, 1936. 21 Del.Ch. 391, 190 A. 115.

Suit by Joseph Keller and another, on behalf of themselves and all other stockholders of defendant Wilson & Company, Incorporated, similarly situated, against Wilson & Company, Incorporated. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the bill of complaint and from a decree (180 A. 584) dismissing the bill of complaint, the complainants appeal.

Order and bill reversed, and cause remanded, with directions.

The bill of complaint was filed by the complainants on behalf of themselves and all other stockholders of Wilson & Co., Inc., similarly situated. It averred that the respondent was incorporated in Delaware on November 30, 1925. By an amendment of its charter on February 24, 1926, its authorized capital stock consisted of 500,000 shares of 7% cumulative Preferred Stock, each of the par value of $100; 500,000 shares of Class A. Stock of no par value; and 1,500,000 shares of Common Stock, of no par value.

By the amendment the Class A. Stock was made, in effect, a second preferred stock. It was entitled to noncumulative dividends at $5.00 per share up to October 31, 1930, and thereafter to cumulative dividends at the same rate, before dividends payable on the common stock; was entitled in liquidation to $75.00 per share plus accrued unpaid dividends, after full payment on the 7% Cumulative Preferred Stock, before distribution to the Common Stock; was callable at $75.00 per share plus accrued unpaid dividends; and was convertible at the option of the holder into Common Stock share for share.

On February 1, 1935, there were issued and outstanding 227,223 shares of the preferred stock, 315,205 shares of the Class A. stock, and 434,466 shares of the common stock; and on that date there were accumulated and unpaid dividends on the preferred stock amounting to $26.25 per share or a total of $5,965,260 on the outstanding shares, and accumulated and unpaid dividends on the Class A. Stock, amounting to $21.25 per share, or a total of $6,636,265 on the shares issued.

On December 14, 1934, the board of directors voted to submit to the stockholders a plan of recapitalization by which it was proposed to exchange the 7% cumulative preferred stock for a new 6% cumulative preferred stock of no par value, on the basis of 1.4292 shares of the

---

[55] Remainder of opinion appears, infra p. 664.

[56] Though not expressly overruled, can it be said that this decision is still law in Delaware in view of the subsequent cases?

new stock for each share of the old; and to cancel the Class A. Stock and all dividends accrued thereon, the holders of said stock to receive in exchange 5 shares of common stock for one share of Class A. Stock. * * *

LAYTON, CHIEF JUSTICE, delivering the opinion of the Court:

The question presented is concerned, generally, with the nature and extent of the right of a holder of cumulative preferred stock in a going corporation, as to which dividends have accrued through lapse of time. Specifically, the questions to be determined arise under the amendment of section 26 of the General Corporation Law (Delaware Laws, vol. 38, ch. 91, § 3) and the questions are, first, whether the State, under its reserved power may authorize a corporation created by it at a time when the law, as then existing, did not permit the abrogation of dividends on cumulative preferred stock accrued through passage of time, to abolish such dividends by virtue of a statute passed after the creation of the corporation and the issuance of such stock; and, second, conceding the power of the State to enact such law, whether the statute should be construed to operate retrospectively.

It is not contended by the complainants that preferential rights attached to such stock may not be changed in future, but it is submitted that dividends accrued by lapse of time on the stock must be paid before any dividends may be paid lawfully to the holders of the common stock, for the reason that the rights of the dissenting holders of Class A. Stock are vested, and that the amendatory statute, if construed so as to confer the power of annulment upon a majority of the stockholders by appropriate charter amendment, is repugnant to State and Federal constitutional prohibitions against impairment of contractual obligation and deprivation of property without due process of law (Const.Del. art. 1, § 7; Const.U.S. art. 1, § 10; Amend. 14).

By this contention the state of the law existing at the time of the birth of the corporation and the issuance of the stock is held to control, and, therefore, the rights of the shareholders are fixed, or as it is said, vested, in the sense and to the extent that dividends accrued by lapse of time must be paid before distribution to the common shares.

The defendant insists that the state of the law existing at the time of the corporate action complained of must determine the rights incident to the stock for the reason that the State has reserved the power of amendment, and all amendatory statutes are declared to be a part of the charter.

By this contention the right of a holder of cumulative preferred stock, as to which dividends have accrued through lapse of time is not fixed or vested, except in a defeasible sense.

Modern corporation laws, very generally, contain provisions conferring upon the majority, or some other fraction, of the shareholders the right to amend the articles of incorporation so as to affect intracorporate rights, and the increasing latitude of this power has caused serious thought and comment. * * *

In the instant case the question was stated to be the narrow one, "whether it was in the power of the Legislature by way of amendment of the act, to enlarge the scope of the subjects which corporations theretofore existing might themselves alter by self-amendment of their own charters, so as to effect changes which, when the corporations were created, they could not effectuate against the will of an objecting stockholder."

The question, as put, may not be answered categorically. The answer must depend upon the extent of the enlargement of the "scope of subjects," and the nature and character of the right affected. A vested right may not be destroyed. Therefore, the question to be determined is, what is the character of the right of a holder of cumulative preferred stock in a going concern as to which stock dividends have accrued through lapse of time? Is the right, in a real sense, a vested right, or is it a defeasible right, subject to destruction by corporate action under subsequent legislation?

It is difficult to define the term "vested right" with exactness; but, generally speaking, a vested right is property, as tangible things are, when it springs from contract or the principles of the common law. 2 Sutherland Stat.Cons. (2d Ed.) § 671. Judge Cooley observes that the term, vested right, "in its application as a shield of protection is not used in any narrow or technical sense, or as importing a power of legal control merely, but rather as implying a vested interest which it is right and equitable that the government should recognize and protect, and of which the individual could not be deprived without injustice." 2 Cooley Cons.Lim. (8th Ed.) 745. * * *

The right of a holder of cumulative preferred stock, issued at a time when the law did not permit of the cancellation of accrued and unpaid dividends against the consent of the holder, to such dividends, is, and ought to be regarded as a substantial right. It may reasonably be supposed that one who invests his money in cumulative preferred stock relies largely upon the right to receive the stipulated dividends at some time. Speaking generally, the investor seeks certainty as against a speculative rise in price. The right to such dividends gives value to the stock, easily recognizable even during periods when the dividends are not paid. As the right is an inducement to buy, so oftentimes is it an inducement to retain. To say that cumulative dividends can not be paid where there are no profits at hand from which to pay them is not to say that they do not accrue under the contract; and unless the corporate surplus and the financial condition of the corporation are such that it would be an abuse of discretion on the part of the management not to declare and pay a dividend on cumulative preferred stock, there seems to be no more reason to view the right of the shareholder as vested than in the case where no surplus exists at all, for in either situation the shareholder has no immediate assertable right, nor may he ever have such right.

If, as this Court reasoned in the Penington Case, that the right to have paid at some future time the accumulation of dividends on preferred stock, was, as between the shareholders, a fixed and vested right, having the nature and character of a debt, postponable in enjoyment until the creation of a fund from which payment legally could be made, it is difficult to perceive the justice of permitting the corporation to destroy the opportunity to create the fund by action under a subsequent amendment to the law which, when the corporation was formed and the stock issued, did not permit of such destruction.

It may be conceded, as a general proposition, that the State, as a matter of public policy, is concerned in the welfare of its corporate creatures to the end that they may have reasonable powers wherewith to advance their interests by permitting adequate financing. It may also be conceded that there has been an increasing departure from the conception which formerly prevailed when the right of individual veto in matters of corporate government operated as a dangerous obstruction to proper functioning. But in determining whether the rights of the complainants herein are such as ought to be regarded as property rights, all aspects of the question must be considered to ascertain what is conducive to the best interests of society. The State is concerned also with the welfare of those who invest their money, the very essence of generation, in corporate enterprises. Some measure of protection should be accorded them. While many interrelations of the State, the corporation, and the shareholders may be changed, there is a limit beyond which the State may not go. Property rights may not be destroyed; and when the nature and character of the right of a holder of cumulative preferred stock to unpaid dividends, which have accrued thereon through passage of time, is examined in a case where that right was accorded protection when the corporation was formed and the stock was issued, a just public policy, which seeks the equal and impartial protection of the interests of all, demands that the right be regarded as a vested right of property secured against destruction by the Federal and State Constitutions.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the amendment of the corporate charter, in so far as it assumed to destroy the rights of the complainants to dividends accrued upon their stock up to the time of the accomplishment of the amendment, is null and void. Accordingly, the arrears of such dividends accumulated upon their stock must be paid to them before distribution may be made to the holders of the common stock.

Quite apart from the constitutional question involved, the same conclusion must be reached.

Section 26 of the General Corporation Law is the section authorizing amendments of corporate charters. It authorizes nothing more than it purports to authorize, the amendment of charters. The cancellation of cumulative dividends already accrued through passage of time is not an amendment of a charter. It is the destruction of a right in the nature of a debt, a matter not within the purview of the section. The cancellation of the right to such dividends is foreign to the design and purpose of the section. The effect of the charter amendment, in so far as it concerns the status of the shares and the rights of the owners, speaking from the time of its accomplishment, is not denied by the complainants; but there is nothing in the language of the section, as amended, which compels a retrospective operation. The rights of cumulative preferred shareholders to the stipulated dividends accrue to them by virtue of the contract. That right exists and persists. When the necessary corporate action, under the amended statute conferring the power is taken, the status of the shares may be changed, and the right thereafter to claim the dividends as originally stipulated may be cancelled, but the amended statute under the general rule of construction, ought not to have a retroactive effect. * * *

It is contended by the appellee that the defendant, in altering its capital structure, merely exercised an amendatory power which the complainants, when they accepted their stock, voluntarily stipulated it might exercise. This contention is based upon the third paragraph of the certificate of incorporation which, in part, reads,

"It is also the intention that said clauses be construed as powers as well as objects and purposes; and, generally that the Corporation shall be authorized to exercise all other powers, rights and privileges granted by the aforesaid Act entitled 'An Act providing a General Corporation Law,' approved March 10, 1899, to corporations of the character of the Corporation, and all powers conferred upon such corporations by the then existing laws of the State of Delaware, in so far as not in conflict therewith, or which may be conferred by all acts heretofore or hereafter amendatory of said Act of March 10, 1899, or of said laws, or supplemental thereto; but the enumeration herein of certain powers is not intended to be exclusive of, or a waiver of, any of the powers, rights or privileges granted or conferred by said Act of March 10, 1899, or of the laws of said State now or hereafter in force. * * *"

This is language of the most general character. On its face it would seem not to purport to affect the contractual relations between the corporation and its stockholders, or the contract of the stockholders inter sese, but only the powers and objects of the corporation. There is no reference to stockholders at all, and it is impossible to view the provision of the corporate charter, under which the stock was issued, as constituting an express or implied assent by purchasers of stock to every corporate action under subsequent amendments of the general law resulting in the cancellation of all contractual rights. Although the Chancellor regarded the provision as similar in substance, though not in terms, to the provision of the charter in the Davis Case, and while we express no opinion upon the correctness of his conclusion as rested upon the provision of the charter there before him, we think the provisions here are quite dissimilar. In that case the provision was,

"This corporation reserves the right to amend, alter, change or repeal any provision contained in this certificate of incorporation in the manner now or hereafter prescribed by statute, and all rights conferred on stockholders herein, are granted subject to this reservation."

The defendant contends also that the complainants have no vested right to the dividends accumulated by time and unpaid for the reason that when section 26 was amended in 1927, the dividends upon Class A stock were not cumulative. It is a sufficient answer to this contention that the power conferred by section 26, as amended in 1927, was but a permissive power. From October 31, 1930, the stock was entitled to cumulative dividends. The dividends accumulated in accordance with the provisions of the charter under which the stock was issued. The amendment of 1927 granted a power only. It might never have been exercised. If exercised, it cannot destroy rights already vested.

Finally, the defendant urges that the complainants have not pleaded the unconstitutionality of section 26, as amended, and cannot now rest their case on that ground. The bill of complaint alleges that the amendment to the charter, filed on February 23, 1935, is null and void in so far as it fails to provide for the payment of cumulative dividends on Class A stock. It also charges that the payment of dividends, declared by the defendant on February 26, 1935, to holders of common stock without paying or providing for the payment of the accrued dividends on their Class A stock is destructive of their rights. These allegations are sufficient to raise the constitutional question. The Chancellor, undoubtedly, passed upon it. There is no merit in this contention.

The order of the Chancellor sustaining the demurrer to the bill of complaint, and his decree dismissing the bill are reversed, and the cause is remanded to the Court of Chancery for such further proceedings and orders which, in conformity herewith, may be necessary.

BAILEY et al. v. TUBIZE RAYON CORPORATION.

District Court of the United States, D. Delaware, 1944. 56 F.Supp. 418.

Action by Frank Bailey and others against Tubize Rayon Corporation to enjoin defendant from enforcing an amendment to defendant's certificate of incorporation, which changed Class A and common stock into a single class of new common stock.

Complaint dismissed.

LEAHY, District Judge. Holders of an aggregate of 1137 shares of Non-Cumulative Class A $1 seek to enjoin the defendant from enforcing as to them an amendment to defendant's certificate of incorporation, adopted under Sec. 26 of the Delaware Corporation Law, Rev. Code 1935, § 2058, as amended by 43 Del. Laws, c. 132, § 5, which changed its Class A and Common stock into a single class of new common stock. The present action was commenced after the amendment had become effective. No temporary injunction was sought. The matter is here on pleadings, testimony and oral argument.

Plaintiffs' action is predicated upon two primary contentions: (1) That the reclassification effected by the amendment was unfair to plaintiffs and (2) that the amendment was accomplished by a group of stockholders who owned a majority of the Class A and Common stock and who acted for their own benefit, in breach of their fiduciary obligations to the minority. Plaintiffs do not contend that defendant lacked the power to effect the amendment or that there was a failure to comply with the Delaware Statute. Before discussing the contentions, a reference must be had to the facts.

Prior to the amendment, defendant had outstanding $4,465,000 principal amount of Fifteen Year Sinking Fund Bonds, 24,395 shares of 7% Preferred Stock $100 par, 138,814 4/7 shares of Class A $1 par,[57] including 523 6/7 shares held in the treasury, and 300,050 shares of Common $1 par, including 636 3/4 shares held in the treasury. Capital structure and asset situation of defendant appears from its balance sheet as of September 30, 1943, which is set forth in the margin.[58]

---

57 Plaintiffs advance the argument that this Class A stock really had an effective par of $100, or that it was $100 stock, because it had a preferential right to $100 per share on liquidation and was entitled to a $7 non-cumulative dividend. The Class A stock was also redeemable at $105. While I agree with this particular contention of plaintiff, for reasons hereinafter stated, I do not believe that it is of sufficient importance to militate against the fairness of the plan.

58 TUBIZE RAYON CORPORATION BALANCE SHEET, SEPTEMBER 30, 1943 ASSETS

Current Assets:
Cash on hand and demand deposits	$ 4,722,266.75
Cash on deposit for dividends	180,744.62
U. S. Government securities and accrued interest	4,011,785.69
Trade acceptances receivable	117,355.10
Accounts Receivable:
Customers (less reserve for doubtful accounts—1943, $68,852.14)	971,216.75
Other (including royalties receivable—1943, $40,637.71)	93,334.13
Inventories (at cost, which is not in excess of market):
Finished goods	193,974.32
Greige goods and work in process	705,535.54
Materials and supplies	1,222,270.24
Total Current Assets	$12,218,483.14
Accounts Receivable—U. S. Government post-war refund of excess profits tax	$ 354,435.79
Property, Less Reserves for Depreciation:
Land	$ 800,672.30
Buildings	5,797,800.55
Machinery and equipment	12,218,271.42
Uncompleted additions	199,252.15
Other fixed assets	218,328.25
	$19,234,324.67
Less: Reserve for depreciation	10,192,797.36
	$ 9,041,527.31
Patents, Licenses and Other Intangibles	$ 7,501.00
Deferred Charges:
Unexpired insurance premiums	$ 204,304.14
Other	119,227.30
Total Deferred Charges	$ 323,531.44
Total	$21,945,478.68

LIABILITIES

Current Liabilities:
Accounts payable:
Trade creditors	$ 497,204.24
Other	82,890.62
Dividends payable	180,768.25
Accrued liabilities:
Taxes:
Federal—current year:
Normal income and surtax	491,329.95

The Class A stock entitled holders thereof to non-cumulative dividends, when and as declared by the board of directors of the defendant, at the rate of $7 per share per annum before any dividends could be paid on the Common stock. While Class A was also entitled to $100 per share on liquidation in priority to the Common stock, it and Common stock had a par value of $1 each and entitled the holders thereof to one vote per share at all stockholders' meetings. The reclassification amendment changed the shares of these two classes of stock into 705,282 shares of new Common stock, including 2,414 treasury shares, of which the Class A stockholders were given 78.7% and the Common stockholders 21.3% or, stating it in another way, the holder of one share of Class A stock received eight times as much new Common stock as the holder of one share of old Common stock—each share of Class A stock was changed into four shares of new Common stock and each share of old Common stock was changed into one-half share of new Common stock. Plaintiffs contend that the reclassification amendment was unfair because the old Common stock had merely a token value and the old Common stockholders were entitled to no substantial recognition in the reclassification. True, prior to the amendment the Class A stock had an asset value of $71.85 per share, and the old Common was under water to the ex-

---

Excess profits (less current reduction due to debt retirement: 1943 $110,000,000)	1,855,319.78
Declared value excess profits	....
State income	44,050.27
Federal and State income and excess profits—Prior years	1,367,974.04
Federal and State (other than income)	196,486.30
Interest:
On debentures	65,114.55
Other	....
Salaries and wages	64,229.76
Other	47,290.55
Total current liabilities	$ 4,842,658.31
Reserve for Contingencies	$ 257,486.12
Funded Debt—3½% Sinking Fund Debentures, due November 1, 1956 (sinking fund payments due within one year from September 30, 1943—$380,000.00)	$ 4,465,000.00
Capital Stock:
7% Cumulative Preferred—authorized, 50,000 shares of $100 each; preference on liquidation, $110 a share plus accrued dividends; issued, 24,395 shares	$ 2,439,500.00
$7 Non-cumulative Convertible Class A—authorized 175,000 shares of $1 each; preference on liquidation (subordinate to Preferred Stock) $100 a share; issued—1943, 138,814 4/7 less 523 6/7 shares in Treasury	$ 138,290.42
Common—authorized, 700,000 shares of $1 each; issued, 300,050 shares, less 636¾ shares in Treasury	$ 299,413.50
Total Capital Stock	$ 2,877,203.92
Surplus:
Capital and paid-in	$ 5,120,193.68
Earned	4,382,936.65
Total surplus	$ 9,503,130.33
Total	$21,945,478.68

tent of $12.96 per share. Subsequent to the amendment the new Common had an asset value of $14.14 per share. The question for determination is, therefore, whether on the basis of defendant's business, assets and earnings, the respective rights of the holders of the two classes of stock, and the market value of the two classes the amendment was fair.

Manifestly, on an asset basis the Common stock was under water. I shall not pause to discuss much of the statistical data offered at the trial; but I wish to state that it was of great help to me when I came to study the case, and counsel are to be commended for preparing for the court's benefit the lucid tables and diagrammatic charts symbolizing the corporate and financial factors called into action.

1. Fairness of the Plan. Defendant is engaged in the manufacture of rayon yarn and of knitted fabrics made therefrom. Since 1936 defendant has expended approximately $10,000,000 for plant expansion resulting in increased capacity of its plants of approximately 150%. There was much testimony that the manufacture of rayon is a growth industry. The management of defendant, according to the testimony, made an exhaustive study of the post-war prospects for the industry and developed plans for further increase of defendant's productive capacity. The reason given for the amendment is that the possible post-war expansion program could be more easily effectuated if defendant's capital structure were first simplified. This is clearly an adequate business reason for the amendment, irrespective of whether the post-war expectations of the directors are ever realized. The directors are endeavoring to prepare defendant to take advantage of any post-war expansion opportunities which may arise. But, the reasons for the amendment or the business necessity behind it are not matters for judicial determination. Allied Chemical & Dye Corp. v. Steel & Tube Co., 14 Del.Ch. 1, 120 A. 486; Cole v. National Cash Credit Association, 18 Del.Ch. 47, 156 A. 183; MacFarlane v. North American Cement Corp., 16 Del.Ch. 172, 157 A. 396; MacCrone v. American Capital Corp., D.C. Del., 51 F.Supp. 462, 463. Yet, in passing, it seems to me the amendment was planned with constructive intent.

Where a majority of the stockholders and directors of a Delaware corporation, acting in good faith, speak for the corporation by taking action under appropriate statutory and charter provisions, a presumption of fairness arises in favor of such action. Under the Delaware decisional and statutory law an amendment will not be condemned unless it is so unfair as to amount to constructive fraud. Allied Chemical & Dye Corp. v. Steel & Tube Co., 14 Del.Ch. 1, 120 A. 486; Cole v. National Cash Credit Association, 18 Del.Ch. 47, 156 A. 183; MacFarlane v. North American Cement Corp., 16 Del.Ch. 172, 157 A. 396; Porges v. Vadsco Sales Corp., Del.Ch., 32 A.2d 148. Clearly, the plan sub judice would not be condemned under the Delaware decisional law. I prefer, however, in this case to leave the limits of the "gross unfairness" or "constructive fraud" tests as fixed by the Delaware decisions and look at the facts of the case before me to see if the amendment is fair in the light of the practical adjustments inherent in this particular transaction. Cf. MacCrone v. American Capital Corp., D.C.Del., 51 F.

Supp. 462, 466; Barrett v. Denver Tramway Corp., D.C.Del., 53 F.Supp. 198.[59] Unless the act of the majority of the directors and stockholders is so palpably unfair as to afford no basis for a difference of opinion among reasonable men, the court should not substitute its judgment for that of the stockholders and directors. I think the amendment meets any independent test of fairness.

It is plaintiffs' theory that the right to $100 in liquidation is deemed to have matured as a result of the amendment. This theory has been rejected in this court and in this circuit. Goldman v. Postal Telegraph, Inc., D.C.Del., 52 F.Supp. 763; Hottenstein et al. v. York Ice Machinery Corporation, D.C.Del., 45 F.Supp. 436, affirmed, 3 Cir., 136 F.2d 944. Cf. In re United Light & Power Co., D.C.Del., 51 F.Supp. 217, affirmed In re Securities and Exchange Commission, 3 Cir., 142 F.2d 411. The rule in this circuit is clear that the preferential right of the Class A stockholders to receive $100 in liquidation gives them no present interest in any portion of the defendant's assets. That right would arise only upon the liquidation of the defendant and, since defendant is engaged in a profitable going business, it is impossible to foresee ultimate liquidation values of the company.

Consideration of the factors usual in testing a plan will show that the amendment was fair to the Class A stockholders.

(a) The amendment was fair in the treatment of the interests of the Class A stockholders in the assets of the defendant. The defendant's balance sheet as of September 30, 1943, shows that it had a total surplus of $9,503,130. The only right which the Class A stock had to such surplus was the right at some indefinite future time to receive $100 per share on liquidation. But this right is contingent upon liquidation. Plaintiffs ignore the fact that a great portion of the assets which they now claim could have been declared as dividends to the old Common. Clearly, the Class A stockholders, prior to the amendment, could not claim any portion of the defendant's surplus by reason of the fact that all of the earnings available for dividends on the Class A stock up to $7.00 per share had not been declared and paid to them as dividends. Under the rule of Wabash R. Co. et al. v. Barclay et al., 280 U.S. 197, 50 S.Ct. 106, 74 L.Ed. 368, 67 A.L.R. 762, where earnings available in any year for dividends on the Class A stock are not paid but are plowed back into the business "the right for that year was gone" and the Class A stockholders would not be entitled thereafter to assert a claim in respect to such unpaid dividends. Prior to actual liquidation, the right of the Class A stockholders to the $9,503,-130 of defendant's surplus is no better than the claim which the old Common stockholders had therein.

